In a spirit of universal toleration, let us ignore them and their dates altogether, except as mere matters of history. But whether or not it be thus agreed, must Bruno be raised to the position of chief saint, or martyr, in the new calendar? Whence, then, comes the fitting recognition due to Julian, to Spinoza, to Galileo, to Copernicus, to Voltaire, to Paine, and others who helped the world out of the mental and physical slavery into which it had been cast? And in dating from the birth or death of either of these martyrs, heroes, or philosophers, the same difficulty arises. Is it proposed to institute an Infidel calendar? Then I must ask, Where is the Atheist's calendar? where the Materialist's calendar? where's my calendar? Shades of oblivion! what added homage would we be thus showing to the memories of Confucius, Socrates, Plato, Pythagoras, and others of the few (out of the undoubted many) ancient worthies who wrote and spoke and acted well their parts, we know, though only the veriest fragments of their histories and works hav escaped the "wreck of time" and the desecration of fanatics? Will chronicling them with a B.B. instead of a B.C. improve their standing? How many possible Brunos has the world known! And moreover, Freethinkers not agreeing, where is this hero-worship to end? Better, until future astronomers and geologists shall definitly coincide, date from the adoption of our Constitution. In one hundred years, judging by the ratio of past results, the United States will dictate the fashions and set the standards for the world. Ours is the first purely non-religious government of any account ever offensivly and defensivly established; and, although a compromise in its formation, and with errors and omissions that the accrued intelligence of a hundred years has not been able to correct, yet I am constrained to believe that it was, everything considered, the greatest achievement of all recorded time. Yours, J. D. HUNTINGTON.

No Falsehoods in the Declaration of Independence.

The Declaration of Independence contains no lies. The fathers of the republic did not stultify themselvs when they certified historical facts. Therefore the "Pantarch" was too previous in his address at the Paine anniversary, when he confessed that Mr. Denslow had made out a strong case against the truth of the indictment against George III., in the Declaration of Independence.

That the king had "prostituted his negativ for suppressing every legislativ attempt to prohibit or restrain this execrable commerce" in men, was the subject of complaint in 1774. In October, of that year, the colonial congress unanimously adopted a declaration, containing among other things this article:

"That we will neither import nor purchase any slave imported after the first of December next, after which time we will wholly discontinue the slave trade."

And in August of the same year Jefferson himself drew up a resolution of instructions to the deputies, when assembled in Congress, in which he said that the repeated attempts to stop the slave trade had "been hitherto defeated by his majesty's negativ."

Again Mr. Denslow says the Declaration of 1776 contains such falsehoods as "abolishing the free system of English laws in Canada;" and he quotes the blundering historian Bancroft to prove it false. Now the colonial declaration of October 20, 1774, above referred to, mentions, among other offensiv acts of Parliament, "an act extending the province of Quebec, so as to border on the western frontiers of colonies, establishing an arbitrary government therein, and discouraging the settlement of British subjects in that wide extended country," etc. The whole clause is reproduced quite literally in the Declaration of 1776. If therefore these two complaints were "false in fact," as Mr. Denslow asserts, they were repeatedly made and attested by every colonial congressman of 1774 and 1776.

These are but two of Mr. Denslow's numerous blunders in his essays on Paine. They are all mischievous, and some of them baseless calumnies. In the character of Thomas Paine I find no smirch.

What a Catholic May Eat During Lent.

The following order has been promulgated by "his eminence the cardinal archbishop," regulating what the faithful may eat during Lent. It seems almost incredible that there are people in the United States who will heed such insolent interference with their private affairs, but illustrates the tyranny exercised by the church in matters small as well as great.

"1. All the week days of Lent, from Ash Wednesday till Easter Sunday, are fast days of precept, on one meal, with the allowance of a moderate collation in the evening.

"2. The precept of fasting implies also that of abstinence from the use of flesh meat. But, by dispensation of the Holy See, the use of flesh meat is allowed in this diocese at the principal meal on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays of Lent, with the exception of Holy Thursday.

"3. There is neither fast nor abstinence to be observed on Sundays of Lent.

"4. It is not allowed to use fish with flesh meat at the same meal in Lent.

"5. A custom of this country tolerated by the church permits the use of eggs, butter, or cheese, provided the rules of quantity prescribed by the fast be complied with.

"6. Lard and dripping may be used in preparing fish, vegetables, etc.

"7. The church excuses from the obligation of fasting (but not of abstinence from flesh meat, except in special cases of sickness or the like) the following classes of persons: First, the infirm; second, those whose duties are of an exhausting or laborious character; third, persons who are attaining their growth; fourth, women in pregnancy or nursing infants; fifth those who are enfeebled by old age."

The way this works is forcibly illustrated by a scene which occurred in one of our police courts last Sunday. A man was arrested for beating his wife, and to the judge's rebuke made the following excuse:

"She'd provoke a saint, your honor."

"That does not warrant your beating her."

"You'd a done it yourself only yesterday."

"And why?"

"Ye see, I tould her this mornin' when she was goin' out for the breakfast to buy herrings, and in she walked with mutton chops, knowing full well it was a fast day and we couldn't ate the mate. 'Mary,' sez I, 'ye know it's a fast day.' 'I do,' sez she. 'An' don't ye know I can't ate mate? sez I. 'Ate mate or nothin',' sez she; 'you'll not go to hell for atin' a chop.' Wid that me timper arose and I gave her a welt wid me open hand."

That Irish woman has the germ of heresy in her composition, and the judge protected her by holding the meat rejecter in the sum of $100 to keep the peace.

Electricity and Magnetism.

Since the day that Franklin first drew the electric current from the clouds, the laws governing this useful element of nature hav been studied so closely that the various applications to which electricity and magnetism can now be applied are, even to us, wonderful.

First the telegraph, then the ocean cables, the electric light, and to-day the magnetic currents hav been so perfected and confined by armatures as to be of great value as a curativ agent when applied to the body. More of this interesting subject can be learnt—in contradistinction to the too common habit of swallowing patent nostrums—by consulting the advertisment of Dr. Thayer in another column.

Jesuitical Work.

The Catholic church is again to the front at Albany. Two years ago a bill passed the legislature and was vetoed by Cornell, but passed the Senate again last year, and again this, and is being pushed in the lower house, to "secure freedom of worship to the inmates of institutions for the care of the poor," the real and avowed object of which, says the Times, "is to compel the board of managers of the House of Refuge on Randall's Island to permit Catholic priests to establish in that institution the rites and ceremonies of their church for the assumed benefit of those inmates whose parents are, or were when they had any, adherents of the Catholic communion."

This, put into business language, means that the Catholics are willing to furnish the capital and "plant" necessary to manufacture Catholics out of all the unfortunate inmates of these institutions. The church would regard it as a paying investment, and only wants a charter for its monopoly to begin activ operations at once. She is willing to furnish the necessary altar, candles, holy water, virgin and child, and priest, in return for what Catholics she can make out of the raw material furnished by the courts.

Although the House of Refuge has now several able-bodied ministers officiating by turns, it is not in any sense a sectarian institution. Its inmates are children of Christian paupers, criminals, drunkards, and vagrants—no case of a Freethinker's abandoning his child occurring—sent there to reform and become virtuous members of society. It is maintained by the state, and has only been afflicted with so much religion as the city clergymen are willing to giv it for charity's sake—and the chance of making converts of the young. The brisk competition existing between the Protestant sects has so far rendered life tolerable to the inmates, but now the capitalistic Catholic church comes in with the proposition to establish a monopoly in religion, trusting to get its reward in increased membership and consequent increased income from its dupes.

This is in keeping with the character of the Jesuit church, and emphasizes the necessity of watching it more closely than has been heretofore done by the people. Evolution will work out the problem of the Protestant church much sooner than it will for the Catholic, for she cannot advance, and besides holds in her grasp the more ignorant and besotted of our population. It will be a long time ere the bulk of the Irish evolute even so far as Protestantism. The latter may be more oppressiv just at present, but the former is more dangerous because she is insidiously working, and will not strike openly until she feels sure to succeed. The Protestant church strikes wildly, and her acts recoil on her own head as often as anyway. The Republicans claim they can rely for their gains upon the blunders of the Democrats, and that is also one way in which Freethinkers gain upon Protestants. The Catholic church rarely blunders. Her organization is almost perfect, and it will require a tidal wave to drive her from power. The history of the Catholic church is a series of repetitions. As fast as she is driven from one country she invades another, and flourishes until her arrogance and greed exceed the power of the people to bear, and then her Jesuits are expelled—if need be, at the point of the bayonet. France is the latest example, and if the Americans are not wise in time another repetition will be seen in this country.

We protest against this use of state institutions as Sunday-schools for the church. Moral instruction is all that the state should provide. If the inmates want a preacher let them hav one. But freedom to worship means as well freedom not to worship. Protestant dogmas should not be forced upon these unfortunate children any more than Catholic ceremonies. The two branches of the same system seem to regard the criminals and paupers as common property, to be parceled out on the basis of the representation each has among them. But the state should know no religion. Its efforts should be confined to reforming, never descending to proselyting. When it assumes direction of the spiritual welfare of its prisoners and paupers, it exceeds its functions. It ceases to be a protector and becomes an oppressor.

The Case of Charles Bradlaugh, M. P.

From the tone of the dispatch printed in another column it appears that Mr. Bradlaugh is likely to win in his contest with the theological powers for a seat in Parliament, of which the church by its influence has so far deprived him. By agreeing to bring in an affirmation bill, the English ministry has conceded all that Bradlaugh claims. But Freethinkers of England—and of the world, for the world is watching the contest—must not be too sanguin. It is within the limit of possibilities for an English premier to lie, and Mr. Gladstone has shown in this matter a vacillation alike discreditable to him and disgusting to the friends of fairness and freedom. It was he who led Mr. Bradlaugh to believe that he had the right to affirm when taking his seat, which he was not allowed by Parliament to do, and he had it in his power to hav justice done at any time by allowing a bill to be brought in legalizing affirmation; but although he had helped to strike from the oath the words "on the true faith of a Christian," in order that a Jew might sit in Parliament, he refused to permit this to be done. Mr. Bradlaugh will conquer in time, and it may be the time is now. But we shall feel surer of it when Gladstone performs instead of promises.

Some Queries and Remarks.

WHICH IS THE SAFER?

Our poetical friend, Robert Swail, propounds the following:

Belvidere, Ill., Feb. 4, 1883.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In my discussions with Christians, they hav frequently brought forward an argument in favor of Christianity which they consider unanswerable. It is as follows: If your Infidel belief is true, then we Christians will be just as well off as you will be, but if Christianity is true, then we will be infinitly better off than you; consequently our belief is far better and safer than yours. If ours is true, you will be in a bad fix. Now I can answer that argument well enough to satisfy myself, but find that it takes a great deal to convince a Christian. Now I wish that you or any other champion of Infidelity would giv through your paper an answer to that argument that will satisfy these hard-headed Christians; and thereby oblige

A brother Infidel, Robert Swail.

We may not be able to do all that Mr. Swail requires, but we will giv a few of the reasons why the Christian is no safer in his belief than the Infidel in his unbelief.

The argument is old, and of no weight, for if the people of this world lived entirely to prepare for another, and a religious belief was to fit them for its glories, they would still be as uncertain as now as to which religion is the true one. If we decide by age, by practical works, or by the number of believers, certainly Christianity is not the one. There are others older, and with more followers, that hav accomplished more, with less cruelty. The argument that belief is safer would require a man to believe all religions, with all their absurdities and nonsense, and the more horrible they were the more necessity for believing them in order to be safe from their terrors. The Bible tells us that the very devils themselvs believe, but what Christian will assure us that the devils are safe? Before this argument, if it can be dignified by the name, can hav any force, it must be shown that Christianity is true; for if it be false and any other one true, then the Christian is not safe, but is damned with the rest. To be absolutely certain that he is safe, the Christian must put faith in the Koran, the Shasta, and all other so-called sacred books and deities, and then he might be wrong, for some religion which he could not possibly hear of might be the true one. To be "safe" a Christian has to sacrifice his reason, renounce experience, mistrust his own senses, and submit to what priests tell him about heaven, without a thought as to its truth or falsity. Can anything be more degrading than this "belief is the safest" argument?

A Christian is not as happy in this world as the unbeliever, for he is constantly tormented by the fear that he has offended his deity, or has not believed hard enough upon some particular point to escape the fires of hell. If Catholicism is true, and he is a Protestant, there is no help for him—he must burn. If predestination, foreordination, and all the rest of Calvinism are true, how is he to know that he is one of the elect? It is impossible for a Christian to know just what to do or believe in order to be safe, for there are so many conflicting sects, with different creeds and dogmas, all founded on one book, and who is to say which sect has interpreted the book aright? There is no safety in belief, while in unbelief, in total rejection of all superstitions, there is a peace and tranquility of mind. The unbeliever is not troubled by the fall of Adam, or the sins of Eve's children. Total depravity is the thing furthest from his thoughts, either of himself or others. He is not distracted by doubts or racked with terror. The "wrath of God" is to him a meaningless phrase.

The bad feelings and angry passions which distort the faces and wrench the hearts of sectarians are unknown to him. He does not care whether immersion or sprinkling is the "divine" order, nor does the "real presence" vex his spirit. Being freed from the vain effort of seeking his soul's salvation, he can devote his time and strength to making this world better, which with the true humanitarian is the main object of living.

Alum Rock, Pa., Feb. 10, 1883.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: After seeing how B. O. Fenton and Boss Winter, etc., talk, I think it is time for everybody to speak. For the last four years I hav considered The Truth Seeker the best paper of the class that has been published in the world. Without any disrespect to others, it is the very best, and that is saying a great deal, for there is quite a number of real good Freethought publications in the Union.

The copy before me now, Feb. 10th, is just as good, if not better than any previous one. It does not look much as if the paper would fail, looking at the editorials in the last two or three numbers, but be sure and keep making it better if anything. But I do not see how you can, and reduce the price to $2.50, for it was very cheap at $3.00.

Now, Mr. Editor, I want to ask one question, and it may be well enough to reply in the paper. Although it may seem old and foolish to you, it holds a great many Methodists and others in the shackles yet. It is the feeling that is in the heart when the Methodist becomes converted, when the Catholic returns from confession, and the thousand and one other ways of getting religion. They claim it is the holy comforter, the witness of the spirit, the joint heir with Jesus Christ, etc. It was not six months ago that a preacher—a Methodist—gave me this convincing argument: "If I should hit you in the face, how would you know it?" I confessed I should be quite likely to feel it if he hit hard enough. A Sunday-school superintendent told me the other day if it was not for that he would be the "biggest Infidel in the United States."

The Truth Seeker has been the means of giving me all the logic I needed on everything else.

By the way, do not you think Wakeman is about as eloqent as Ingersoll? I think so. I might just add I am a Spiritualist of the Denton school. G. W. Dinsmoor.

We are obliged to our friend for his good opinion, and hope The Truth Seeker may continue to be as good as it has been. We shall certainly strive to that end.

As to the feeling in the heart which the Christians claim is one of great joy and surpassing peace, we confess we know little, never having experienced it. When a boy of ten, a pious old lady, by long endeavor, convinced us that we were about the biggest little sinner that God was then allowing to liv, and with much trembling and fear we sought to be converted. But the Holy Ghost, probably thinking it not worth his while, went by, and so far the "divine influence" has not touched this unregnerate heart. To be a thorough believer one must hav the organs of wonder and veneration largely developed, and if the converts at camp-meetings are examined, they will be found without much education, but with a high "top-head," as the phrenologists say.

This feeling is born of long centuries of teaching. It is no wonder the Christians of to-day experience a sentimental awe of God, for they and their ancestors hav been taught it so long that it is a part of their natures. It is the same sentiment that a Mohammedan feels when he kneels at the shrine in Mecca, or the sun-worshiper when he sees the orb of day arise, or the Brahman when he prays to Indra, or that takes possession of the soul of the Buddhist when he feels that the fervor of his devotions has saved him from hell. It is this sentiment, too, that drives people crazy. The hand-clapping, shouting, jumping negro feels this "divine spirit" at his camp-meeting, as does the poor Methodist at the "protracted meeting." It is one side of the nature unduly and injuriously excited. It was Jephthah's awe of the Jewish God that led him to sacrifice his daughter; Freeman felt it when he plunged the knife to the heart of his child; the Mormon Smith had the same feeling when he felt inspired by the Lord to slay his boy; the Zimbrich woman in Milwaukee felt this peace after she had sacrificed her three children in obedience to the command of the Lord. It is a dangerous sentiment unless controled by reason. The most zealous persecutors hav been the most pious. When Torquemada came from confession he felt this "great joy." He was as pious a man as ever went unhung. Women are peculiarly susceptible to it on account of the delicacy of their organization. Men who exhibit it are usually considered "soft." Taylor, who was a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, says extraordinarily fervent people are "liable to madness and crackiness and confusion about the brains." It is a pathological phenomenon, not nearly so tangible as a vigorous slap in the face. Sentiment is good in its place, but, misdirected, it commits fearful excesses. Methodists may think they feel Jesus in their hearts, but the physician knows it to be hysterics. It lasts but a short time usually, and that is the reason why there are always so many "backsliders" among revival converts.

Homerville, Ohio, Feb. 5, 1883.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav never seen an explanation of the signs of the zodiac as we find them in the almanac. How did the signs of the zodiac come to be applied to different parts of the human body? As the earth passes over one sign or one-twelfth of the celestial sphere in one month, why do we find all the signs of the zodiac in one month, as recorded in the almanac, one sign for two or three days, and then another, etc.?

Thousands of people all over our country depend on these signs for sowing and planting, weaning children, and a hundred other things. A little light on the subject would be very acceptable. Henry E. Miller.

We hav no historic record of the division of the zodiac into signs. It has been thought that the names were suggested by the seasons. The spring signs (Aries, the ram; Taurus, the bull; and Gemini, the twins) are supposed to mark the bringing forth of young by the flocks and herds. Cancer, the crab, marks the time when the sun, having attained its declination, begins to go back toward the equator; and the crab having been supposed to move backward, his name was given to this sign. Leo, the lion, symbolizes the fierce heat of summer; and Virgo, the virgin, gleaning corn, symbolizes the harvest. In Libra, the balance, the day and night balance each other, being of equal length. Scorpio, the scorpion, is supposed to hav marked the presence of venomous reptils in October; while Sagittarius, the archer, symbolizes the season of hunting. The explanation of Capricornus, the goat, is very fanciful. It was supposed that this animal, ascending the hill as he feeds in order to reach the grass more easily, on reaching the top turns back again, so that his name was used to mark the sign in which the sun, from going south, begins to return to the north. Aquarius, the water-bearer, symbolizes the winter rains; and Pisces, the fishes, the season of fishes. The influence of the celestial bodies on the conditions and affairs of men has been believed in, and a superstitious importance has been attached to particular times and seasons by the credulous from the remotest times. The Egyptians seem to hav been the first applyers of these signs to the human body, assigning the ram to the head, the bull to the neck and shoulders, the twins to the arms and hands, the fishes to the feet, etc. Persons born under these signs were supposed to partake of their character. These fanciful assignments hav been carried much further by different peoples, notably the Persians, who gave their various gods a control over different members of the human body, and also by the Grecian astrologers. Before the invention of almanacs the risings and settings of the constellations were looked to by the husbandmen, shepherds, and seafaring men as the great landmarks of the seasons. The early almanac-makers used them, and the moderns hav copied the superstitions. These stars were supposed by the ancient astrologers to govern the days which they assigned to them.

In sending stamps to pay subscriptions or for books friends will oblige by remitting denominations of one, two, five, and ten cents, not threes, as we hav a sufficient supply on hand.

In the investigation now going on as to the condition and treatment of the prisoners at Sing Sing prison, Conrad Strueing, one of the convicts examined by the commission, gave a very amusing description of his visit to the chaplain, who, he said, was sitting with his feet on the desk, with his hat on the back of his head, a cigar in his mouth, and humming an operatic tune, and partly under the influence of liquor. Another time he saw the chaplain getting a prescription from the doctor for himself. The chaplain put out his tongue, and the doctor said, "Giv him No. 5." The fact was that No. 5 was a whisky cocktail. The chaplain undertook to cross-examin the witness as to how he could know he was intoxicated. The witness replied, "I smelt your breath." The state pays for the services of this man of God, and it is probable that it had to pay also for the cocktail.

A week or two ago we asked our friends who are in arrears to make a little effort to square up the accounts. A good many hav done so, but there are several hundreds whose tabs still indicate that they hav not thought of The Truth Seeker lately. We ask all these to remember us now, and let us hear from them.

And if in remitting you know of any Liberal people who do not take the paper, who would be likely to if called to their attention, please send us their names and addresses and sample copies will be forwarded. The reduced price of the paper makes it necessary that it hav more subscribers, and we hope friends will do this much to aid us in obtaining them.

"On Saturday morning, Jan. 6th, while the students were at chapel, a house near the college at Middletown was destroyed by fire. Five of the students roomed in the house, and they lost nearly all their clothing, furniture, and books, and one of them all the money he had." Is this not, according to the current method of theological argument, a plain warning against attending chapel on leaving effects unguarded? If these young men had had backbone enough to attend a Liberal lecture, and their clothes had been burnt, the ministers would hav seen in it the finger of God as large as a sled-stake. But now it is a "misfortune." Verily, it maketh much difference whose ox is gored.

The next meeting of the Heredity Society will be held at 120 Lexington avenue, on the evening of Thursday, Feb. 22d, at 8 o'clock. All interested are cordially invited.

"Answers to Christian Questions and Arguments."

Almost every Liberal, at some time, is asked nearly the very same questions that, in the neat pamphlet of 146 pages, above designated, are finely and correctly answered by our lamented friend and indefatigable worker, D. M. Bennett—hence this is a very proper and desirable work to hav at hand. I hav read it with great interest, sometimes with tears, as I thought of the talented author, in the stillness of death, and always with pride in the wonderful resources of knowledge that our friend possessed. Truly, "the good that men do livs after them," and this little book will be often used as a weapon of defense against Christian arguments, sneers, and ridicule.

The questions were asked, no doubt, honestly, and they are answered as honestly, and as only D. M. Bennett could answer, hitting and demolishing error and falsehood every time. Interspersed on many pages, are fine gems of thought, such as the following:

"Nature is too great, too grand, too universal, to ever hav had a beginning, or to hav been brought from nothing."

"It is wiser, then, to accept what is, rather than to spend our lives in imagining what is not."

"There is no virtue in a falsehood, though a thousand times repeated."

"Liberalism is only another name for naturalism, and everthing pertaining to nature is freer from difficulties than anything else in existence."

"Dying is just as much an act of nature, just as much a necessity, as birth, and it is an unfortunate and culpable system of religion that has filled it with horror, terror, and forebodings."

As a reply to Christian questions, this book is invaluable, and, without quoting more, I would urge every one to purchase a copy, and as the price is only twenty-five cents, without doubt it will reach a wide sale; and as it was written after Mr. Bennett's return from his trip around the world, and but shortly before his decease, this fact will add to its interest, and insure it a warm welcome everywhere.

Answers to Christian Questions and Arguments. By D. M. Bennett, editor of The Truth Seeker.

From the Radical Review.

These are a series of articles published in The Truth Seeker, in answer to letters and questions from Christians, the letters and questions being reprinted. The letters are interesting evidences of the almost incredible Christian credulity, illogical reasoning, and stupidity. Mr. Bennett's answers are clear and logical, as any intelligent Freethinker's answers to such superstitious trash cannot help but be, and his style is dignified and scholarly throughout. In the following passage he objects to the charge that Liberalism presents any great difficulties. He says: "So far as we are concerned we see no difficulties in Liberalism, or at least nothing to deter a brave and candid spirit. Liberalism is only another name for naturalism, and everything pertaining to nature is freer from difficulties than anything else in existence. Liberalism is easy to believe because it is so natural, so easy, and so true. It is the claims of supernaturalism, of ecclesiasticism, of myths, of superstitions—monstrous demands about gods and devils—that are so replete with difficulties. To accept them a man has to throw away his reason, stifle the spirit of investigation, close his eyes to the light of truth, and swallow like a young robin whatever is given, without a question or any clear perception. Here is where the principal difficulties are to be found. If these are only bravely cast aside, the light of truth will be sure to shine out clearly, and all difficulties and doubts will flee away." We still need such books to throw light into benighted brains.

Great Bradlaugh Demonstration.

A dispatch from London, dated the 15th, has the following:

A great popular demonstration was made to-day in Charing Cross in favor of the claim of Mr. Charles Bradlaugh to a seat in the House of Commons, to which he was reëlected from Northampton borough in March last. Delegates from the London workmen's clubs and others, representing about four hundred provincial towns, were present. Mr. Bradlaugh, in his speech at the meeting, announced that, if nothing was mentioned in the House of Commons by 4 p. m. about the bill allowing members to make affirmation who desire to do so, instead of taking the usual Parliamentary oath, he should then take his seat.

A crowd of about seven thousand persons gathered early in Trafalgar square. A hundred policemen were present, posted at the base of the Nelson column. The whole square soon became densely packed, the majority of the crowd wearing Mr. Bradlaugh's colors. Mr. Bradlaugh, accompanied by his daughters, arrived unexpectedly, and consequently was not greeted with much enthusiasm. Resolutions protesting against the exclusion of Mr. Bradlaugh were carried unanimously.

At the conclusion of the proceedings Mr. Bradlaugh, at the head of a great concourse of people, left the square for the House of Commons. The procession formed near the Nelson monument, got into line, and then marched in straggling columns along Whitehall to Westminster. The crowd was orderly, and there was no interference from the police. Many of the sections of the procession sang labor songs, a few were excitedly declaiming, while the larger part of the men tramped in silence. Mr. Bradlaugh's arrival at the House of Commons was the signal for great cheering from the host that followed him. He drove up to the entrance in Palace Yard in triumph, and as he entered the member's lobby he was again loudly cheered. Mrs. Besant and the Misses Bradlaugh were present in the great hall. Mr. Bradlaugh entered the House and took his usual seat immediately under the gallery. When the House assembled the speaker read Mr. Bradlaugh's letter asking leave to state his grounds for claiming his seat. At the close of the reading the government announced officially that it was the intention of the ministers to propose the Affirmation bill. Amid cries of "Oh! Oh!" Mr. Bradlaugh said he would postpone any farther action until this bill had been discussed. Mr. Bradlaugh and his friends then left the House.

The Rev. Joseph Cook's grapple with the theologians of Andover, who are trying to shake off the iron-clad pledge of that institution to ultra-Calvinism, bids fair to leave him in a worse case than any scuffle he has ever had with the Positivists or Materialists. The Rev. Egbert Smyth responds to his last in a four-column article to-day, which leaves Cook with the appearance of a worse charlatan in theology than in science.—Tribune.

The Issue to be Met.

I am afraid that Liberals throughout the country are not sufficiently interested in the battle now going on between E. H. Heywood and legal despotism. His methods are disagreeable to many, I suppose, and for that reason no doubt there is a lack of ardor; but such reasons should not bear a feather's weight in view of the all-important rights which are now at stake. It is not the methods but the freedom of Mr. Heywood which is in question; and concerning this there should be no question. It should be maintained, no matter what the consequences. If Mr. Heywood is struck down, then the freedom of all is imperilled. He is no criminal; he has violated no rule of justice. He has simply asserted his individuality, without in the least infringing upon the rights of others. If he is sent to prison it will be a most cruel outrage, and a disgraceful page will be written in the history of our country. Mr. Heywood is a reformer, and as a reformer he has been arrested; he is a philosopher, and as a philosopher he has been deprived of his liberty; he is a thinker, and as a thinker he is confronted with the dungeon. He is a thoroughly honest and able man. No word is spoken against his character. He is held in esteem by his friends and neighbors. He has wronged no living soul, and yet his life is now placed in jeopardy—for it does not seem possible that with his shattered body he again can endure the rigors of a prison disciplin. Let us think for a moment of the deadly blow that is thus being struck at human liberty. It is on a par with the burning of Servetus. It is the outcome of a new inquisition as fatal as that which flourished in the middle ages. It is the savagery of ancient morals. It is the barbarism of an effete theology.

But the cry is that Mr. Heywood has been injudicious in this matter—that without any just cause he ran his head into the lion's mouth, and if he is crushed it is his own fault. He had no business to be so foolhardy.

This is a begging of the whole question, and is a sad giving away by Liberals of their most fundamental principle — the right of private judgment. What is so sacred as that? Who shall condemn Mr. Heywood of folly unless we know the very innermost motiv by which he has been actuated? Every martyr has been called a fool, and it is dangerous even among wise men to be in a minority of one. Mr. Heywood has not been hasty in this matter. He has acted deliberately and conscientiously. Therefore he is to be most deeply respected for the deed that he has done. It is not a foolish deed. No honest and sincere act is ever foolish. That which a man thinks to be right is for him the noblest thing to do. He must do it in spite of danger and disrepute. It is a great wrong to scorn and flout such a man because he has acted differently from ourselvs. Suppose he had acted differently? Does that change the sacredness of his act? Are we so thoroughly enlightened that we can measure the exact value of every deed? By no means; for, as a great poet says, each soul is a mystery to every other, and the secret of its personal activity lies not within our vision. These snap judgments of outside parties are not allowable. They belong to the old orthodoxy. It is equivalent to saying, "I know what you ought to do, and you do not." This is not a liberal judgment. Every individual must decide for himself, and if what he does is a purely individual act, the expression of one's own intense life, then it cannot be a folly. It is the man doing what eternal nature impels him to do, as it impels the tree to bear the leaf, and the water to run down hill.

I hav no doubt that in this matter Mr. Heywood has acted according to his best judgment. He has done what he thinks most conduciv to human welfare. He has acted from a high sense of duty. He has obeyed the dictates of his manhood. He has been tremendously in earnest. No matter then, how his act may strike us, it has the sacredness and grandeur of his own individual conscience, and therefore its liberty is to be as intently guarded as that of the most heroic and splendid act in all human history. It is not the act itself alone that is to be regarded, but the spirit in which it is performed. It is the right spirit which elevates and ennobles every deed, and which givs even to the ludicrous adventures of Quixote a certain chivalrous beauty. Mr. Heywood has acted in the spirit of true devotion, of self-sacrifice, and his deed therefore is a great deed, because the outcome of a great ideal burning within his heart. Who can turn from such an exhibition of courage and magnanimity?

But it is said that Mr. Heywood acts in poor taste, and we don't wish to defend that sort of thing. Well, the question of taste is a very broad and deep one, and all its canons hav not yet been settled, and one can be as bigoted in his taste as in his doctrins. Who knows what "good taste" is? Even in the quality of food there is a vast difference of feeling, and when it comes to literature and art and all modes of mental expression, accuracy of judgment is still more difficult. What critic has ever been accepted without question? Almost every rule has been disputed, and one master genius in the realm of taste has been diametrically opposed by another. What a difference between Shakspere and Milton, Shelley and Wordsworth! They liv in different worlds of taste and imagination, yet all are conformable to the infinit beauty of nature.

Wherein has Mr. Heywood violated the canons of good taste? He has on certain subjects chosen to express himself without reserve, to use plainness of speech, to call a spade a spade. Is he alone in this method of expression, sui generis, an unheard-of new species of writer? Assuredly not. That same plainness of speech which is called such bad taste in Mr. Heywood is to be found in all the great masters of literary expression, in the Greek classics, in Chaucer, Shakspere, Milton, Dryden, Shelley, Goethe, Victor Hugo, as well as in our own Whitman, and even in Emerson, and likewise in the fountain-head of Christianity itself, the Jewish scriptures. This form of expression is found in all literature. So universal is it that one might pronounce it the voice of nature herself trying to vindicate the purity of every act of hers. I can match the most objectionable words of Mr. Heywood with something far more objectionable in the great writers of the world. Do you say that they were simply expressing the spirit of their age, and that if they wrote now they would write differently? That is not proven. Shelley, Goethe, Hugo are the most modern of writers, and they hav used the same expressions. Chaucer, Shakspere, Dryden, Swift, Fielding, Sterne were not the creatures of their day—they were its masters. They were creativ forces, and acted only in obedience to their own supreme genius. They chose in certain circumstances to use a coarse mode of expression—to speak the naked truth, and they must hav done so because their literary judgment approved of it. If Mr. Heywood has sinned against the canons of good taste he has done so with a most brilliant company. He need not be ashamed of his associates. If we condemn him, in the same breath we must condemn the most wise and capable men that hav ever adorned the history of the world.

And when we pass from literature to art—to painting and sculpture—we shall find this method of expression far more prevalent and glaring. The old painters, and the modern painters, too, like Turner, reveled in this nakedness of the truth. They believed in it as requisit to all high art. Everywhere in the old country where art has won its greatest triumphs, do we find this open expression of every feature of nature. Nothing is concealed. There is no appearance of shame. The human body has not been denied its rights upon the canvass or in the breathing marble. Mr. Heywood simply does in language what every artist has done in picture and statue. Shall we condemn him for poor taste in view of this almost unanimous verdict of the world of art?

But admitting that Mr. Heywood's taste is poor, and Shakspere's, and Goethe's, and Raphael's, and Turner's, it does not alter the sacredness of his individual judgment on the point. Even if one's judgment is wrong its freedom must be most strenuously preserved. That is a very lame liberality which allows toleration only for what one likes. That has always been the liberality of orthodoxy. No tyrant ever lived but what was perfectly willing to grant liberty to what was suited to his own taste; but the Liberalism of to-day must be something far more inclusiv. It must maintain not this or that man's liberty but universal liberty; not liberty for the majority, but liberty also for the minority, even if that minority be but one. Every man's thought and every man's taste must be thoroughly respected in this new age. Otherwise there can be no progress, for it is by the infinit diversity of human thought and sentiment that the largest truths are discovered. We must work as vigorously for the freedom of that which we don't like as for the freedom of what we do. One may be very disagreeable in the expression of his thought, but that very disagreeableness should make one more chivalrous in the upholding of his rights, and more charitable in the study of his opinions, for the fact that they are disagreeable may be the sign that they possess a hitherto unheard-of truth. Every new truth is apt to giv us a shock at first. We are all more or less the slaves of custom, and don't like to be too suddenly thrust forward.

The question of liberty is the all-comprehensiv question of to-day. To be free ourselvs and make others free to their own best truth is the one supreme issue. Right at this point Mr. Heywood stands. He is freedom's representativ, and if he falls freedom falls. Our dearest rights will be sacrificed in his condemnation. Human progress will be retarded if his right of private judgment is not maintained. We should not call him foolish, or reckless, or ill-judging, or unrefined in taste. We should simply say: "Like a brave man he has leaped to the issue. He has defied an unjust law. Let us by all means in our power giv him a fair trial before his countrymen. If he has such a fair trial he will certainly come off victorious." The battle of American liberty is but half won. The vision of a Paine or Jefferson is not yet fulfilled. Perfect liberty is not attained. So far it has only been the liberty of the majority, and what has that been but a new despotism? There must be liberty for all, respect for every man's honest opinion and natural taste. We must cease to condemn, and learn to appreciate even the most opposit thought.

This universality of liberty, not its particular manifestation in what we like, but its vast and essential life, this, I say, its infinit, its permanent value, seeks vindication in the attitude assumed by Mr. Heywood. We must defend him or the progress of the race will receive a wound in its dearest part. We cannot withdraw from that which implicates the profoundest conditions of truth and morality.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Paul Begins to Preach.

The statement in Acts that Paul forthwith began to preach seems to harmonize with what he writes to the Galatians:

> But when it pleased him who separated me from my mother's womb and called me by his grace, to reveal his son by me, that I should proclaim him among the gentiles; forthwith I did not open it to flesh and blood (Gal. i, 15, 16).

Or, as the Greek version has it, "I conferred not with flesh and blood." That is to say, he received no ordination. Indeed, how could he when there were no apostles at Damascus? Nor did he during the next seventeen years, if ever, confer with more than three of the so-called apostles, as he expressly says in Galatians i and ii, the book of Acts to the contrary notwithstanding.

But whether Paul forthwith began to preach in Damascus is not quite so certain; for after saying that he did not confer with flesh and blood, he adds:

> Nor did I go to Jerusalem to them who were legates before me; but I went into Arabia, and returned again to Damascus. And after three years I went to Jerusalem to see Kepha, and I remained with him fifteen days (Gal. i, 17, 18).

This is hardly consistent with the statement of Acts that he began at once to preach in Damascus. It seems rather that he began his ministry in Arabia. Nor does the book of Acts speak of but one sojourn at Damascus, and only by violent construction can that be extended to three years.

> But Saul was the more strengthened; and he confounded those Jews who dwelt at Damascus, while he demonstrated that this is the Messiah. And when he had been there many days the Jews formed a conspiracy against him to kill him; and the plot which they sought to execute upon him was made known to Saul, and they watched the gates of the city by day and by night in order to kill him. Then the disciples placed him in a basket to let him down from the wall by night (ix, 22–25).

Paul's persecutors were doubtless the law and order party, aided by "the powers that be." For he says: "The commander of the army of Aretas, the king, guarded the city of the Damascenes to seize me" (2 Cor. xi, 32). This was probably after his return from Arabia, and three years after his conversion.

PAUL AT JERUSALEM.

Let us now take the account in Acts of Paul's visit to Jerusalem, after his escape from Damascus, and parallel it with what he himself says about it:

Acts ix, 26–30.	Gal. i, 18–24.
And he went to Jerusalem, and he wished to join himself with the disciples, but they were all afraid of him, and did not believe he was a disciple. But Barnabas took him and brought him to the legates and related to them how the Lord appeared to him in the way, and how he conversed with him; and how in Damascus he had discoursed openly in the name of Jesus. And he went in and out with them at Jerusalem; and he spoke openly in the name of Jesus, and disputed with those Jews who understood Greek. But they wished to kill him; and when the brethren knew it they conducted him by night to Cesarea, and from there they sent him to Tarsus.	I went to Jerusalem to see Kepha; and I remained with him fifteen days. But others of the legates saw I not, except James, our Lord's brother. In the things which I am writing to you, behold, before God, I lie not. And after that I went to the regions of Syria and Cilicia; and the churches in Judea which were in the Messiah did not know me personally; but this only they had heard, that he who before persecuted us now preacheth that faith which in time preceding he subverted; and they glorified God in me.

The two accounts are at variance in the following particulars:

Acts.	Galatians.
Paul wished to join the disciples.	His obect was to see Kepha.
The disciples were all afraid to trust him.	Kepha received him as a guest fifteen days.
Barnabas introduced him to the apostles, and he went in and out with them, speaking openly.	Barnabas was not with him this time, nor did he see any apostles but Kepha and James.
He disputed with the Jews who knew Greek; or, as the Greek version has it, "disputed with Hellenists."	He was unknown to the churches in Judea, having only had a private conference with Kepha and James.
His Grecian opponents sought to kill him, and he escaped by night.	Being quite unknown, he was undisturbed, and went away peaceably.

That part about disputing with the Grecians we suspect to be an early interpolation. It is not likely that there were many Grecian proselytes in Jerusalem, much less that they sought to kill him, as the context implies, while the other nativ or orthodox Jews protected him and enabled him to escape.

PAUL IN CILICIA AND SYRIA.

After Paul's departure from Jerusalem to Syria and Cilicia—or, as in Acts, to Tarsus, which was the chief city of Cilicia—we hear nothing of him for an interval variously reckoned at from one to ten years. During this time it is said that the church in Judea, Galilee, and Samaria had peace and prosperity. At Lydda Simon Kepha healed the paralytic Æneas, and converted all the people of the town and adjoining district (ix, 35). Going thence to Joppa, he restored to life a dead woman named Tabitha—"which being interpreted," says the Greek version, "is called Dorcas," i.e., "gazel." Why a translation of this proper name should hav been made into Greek we cannot understand; but it is one of many evidences that the Greek version was translated from the Syriac or Aramaic. Simon then had a vision which caused him to go to Cesarea, where he found a pious Roman captain named Cornelius ready to receive baptism in the name of Jesus the Messiah, provided he did not hav to become a Jew. Providentially Simon's heavenly vision at Joppa revealed to him an open door for the gentiles, and Cornelius was taken in. But the new revelation had to be submitted to the church at Jerusalem; so Simon went up there and, after argument, obtained the sanction of the church. "And they glorified God and said: Now to the gentiles also doth God giv repentance unto life" (xi, 18).

And now those who were driven out of Jerusalem after the death of Stephen had spread the gospel as far as the island of Cyprus, and the city of Cyrene in Africa, preaching to Jews only. Cyrene was an old Greek settlement, and Cyprus doubtless contained many Greeks, though it was closely connected with Phenicia, and did not become a Roman province till 58 B.C.; but Jews abounded in both Cyprus and Cyrene, and some of them who had received the new faith went up to Antioch and preached to the Greeks who were there (xi, 20). Doubtless there were some Greek-speaking Jews at Antioch, for they were always a trading people; but the Syriac language prevailed at Antioch long after Christianity had spread among the Greeks. Many converts having been made in that city, the church at Jerusalem sent Barnabas there as a preacher, and after some time Barnabas went away to Tarsus to seek for Saul.

All these events happened, according to Acts, while Paul was in Tarsus. And now Barnabas brings Saul to Antioch, and for a whole year the two labor together as associate pastors of the church in that city.

This may be true, but the passage that follows is not true, to wit:

"From that time forth the disciples were first called Christians at Antioch" (xi, 26).

We reject the passage for the following reasons:

1. Christiana is not an Aramaic or Syriac word, but is borrowed from the Greek Christianos.

2. The proper Syriac word would be a derivativ of Mishiach, which means Christos in Greek, i. e., "anointed."

3. Paul never uses the word Christianos, or its equivalent in his nativ tongue; and his epistles are conceded to hav been written from eight to twenty years after the establishment of the church at Antioch.

4. The word Christian does not occur in any other book of the New Testament, except in 1 Peter, iv, 15, which epistle is of indeterminable date and doubtful authenticity. Dr. Davidson considers it spurious, and thinks it may hav been written after A.D. 75, when of course Simon Kepha, alias Peter, was dead.

5. The earliest use of the word Christian which can be authenticated is by the heathen writer Suetonius about A.D. 110; next by the emperor Adrian, 117–138; next by Justin, 147–161.

We are aware that the word appears seven times in a letter purporting to be written by Pliny to Trajan about A.D. 103, and once in the fifteenth book of the so-called "Annals" of Tacitus, supposed to hav been written after A.D. 117. But the "Annals" of Tacitus were forged by Poggio Bracciolini, a papal secretary, A.D. 1427; and the letters of Pliny to Trajan are evident forgeries of the latter part of the second century.

The Crime of Unbelief.

The church has always claimed and still claims that honest error is a crime. To every Infidel she says: "You are mistaken, and for that you deserve to be eternally damned." Now I would like some theologian to explain why any person should be punished for being mistaken. Should a man be damned for thoughts over which he has no control? Should a blind man be kicked because he can't see, or a lame man be burnt because he can't walk? If not, why should the skeptic be damned because he can't believe?

If there is no salvation except through Jesus Christ, if every one must be "cleansed in the blood of Jesus," or be "born again," what has become of the countless millions who hav lived virtuous, moral lives, and died without ever hearing of Jesus? When one reflects that all these noble men and women, who, without any knowledge of the "real God," were moral and humane, are now floundering in the shoreless lake of boiling brimstone, we cannot help seeing God's tender mercy. It will not do, Mr. Christian, to say they are saved through their ignorance; because if the heathen can be saved through his ignorance, there is no use in trying to convert him to your religion, for he is all right anyhow.

The god that is jealous of other gods, and flies into a rage whenever any one denies his existence, is meaner and more insignificant than the lowest devil conceived of by religious fanatics.

If God wants everybody to believe the Bible, why don't he stop counting hairs a while and explain his precious book? Has a man control over his own belief? No; he has not. If you look at a picture or a book, or anything else, you cannot believe it is not there. If you read a book, and the evidence seems in favor of its being true, you cannot help believing it; but if the evidence is against it, you cannot, under penalty of hell, believe it to be true.

Then, when we deny the existence of God, or the truth of the Bible, it is for want of proof—because we are not convinced. If there were evidence enough to convince us that the Bible is true, or that there is a God, we would hav to believe it. There would be no alternativ. Now, if God made us and made this book also, and has not given sufficient poof to convince our minds of its truth, the fault, I am sure, is not ours.

The church has always treated the Infidel as a criminal, and on his name has heaped every epithet in all languages of the world. She has tried to convert him by saying that non-belief is a crime; by putting him on the rack, and burning him at the stake; by abusing, slandering, libeling, and defaming him in this world, and threatening him with an angry God and flaming hell in the imaginary world to come.

WM. SCOTT.

Osceola Mills, Pa., Feb. 12, 1883.

Infidel Philosophy.

"Did you grind all the tools?" inquired a carpenter of his apprentice. "All except that long, broad, flat tool; I did not hav time to grind quite all the nicks out of that." Exemption from the taxation of church property; chaplaincies; the oath test; the Christian Sabbath, the cry for the Bible in the common school, and God in the Constitution, are ugly nicks in the old theological saw, which, I fear, with our best efforts, will take years of patient labor to grind out.

Thousands are put into the theological drill every year, as soon as they are old enough to make their way to the Sabbath-schools, and the training continued up to manhood. They are taught all about the six days of creation, the fall of man, the immaculate conception, the plan of salvation, etc. Hundreds of useless texts of scripture are committed to memory, which hav no other effect upon the mind than to dwarf it, and chain it to the dead past. Many of them pass through life without even a knowledge of the simple rules of arithmetic, which one-half of the training would hav imparted. The time thus wasted, and the consequent mental loss to the world, can never be estimated. Practically, a knowledge of the multiplication table is worth more than all the silly tales of gods, devils, and angels that hav ever been written.

The Christian claims that we are indebted to the Bible for our high state of civilization, that the moral standard of the Bible has never been equaled by any other book which has ever been written, that the Ten Commandments and the Golden Rule are found nowhere else except in the Bible, and that without them we would not know right from wrong, and would soon be reduced to a level with savages. All this I hav heard preached from the pulpit. In the first place, we know that true, noble, and heroic men and women hav lived, who never heard of the Bible. Moreover, it would seem that for a thousand years devils could not do much worse without a Bible than Christians did with a Bible. Could a devil do any worse than to bury a heavy lash in the quivering flesh of a helpless woman's bare back for opinion's sake? Among people who never read the Ten Commandments, as laid down in the Bible, a violation of the principles embraced in them has been visited with penalties. Even savages punish for the breach of some of them. Men could not dwell together without the observance of some of the rules embodied in the Ten Commandments. "Thou shalt not kill," grows out of the love of life implanted by nature in the human breast, and was observed long before it was written, or before there was a written language. "These are my berries because I picked them. These are my fish because I caught them. These rabbits are mine because I trapped them." These claims were voiced by nature at the first dawn of civilization. "Thou shalt not steal," is based upon and is as old as these claims. The Ten Commandments, or the principles embraced in them, would be the first to crop out from men who dwell together. To talk about the Ten Commandments being handed down by God to Moses is just as silly as to talk about "the evening and the morning" before there was any sun. The truth is, the Ten Commandments were hoary with age before Moses navigated his little wicker canoe among the bulrushes.

Is there a mother who would not blush to put the history of King David, as written down in the Bible, into the hand of her young daughter, and tell her that it is profitable for instruction, that his conduct was worthy of imitation, and that he was a man after God's own heart? The very thought is revolting to common sense and decency. Yet the Bible, containing not only this but many other narrations equally obscene and repulsiv, is put into her hand, and she is taught to regard it as the word of God; every child who attends the Sabbath-school is thus imposed upon, and few there are to rebuke the wicked act. Is it possible that God ever wrote a book which a modest mother cannot put into the hand of her daughter, or that her daughter cannot read to her mother without a blush? Instead of spooning around a young Jew girl, and writing out his holy word in language too indecent to be read in respectable circles, how much better it would hav been for him and for the human family if he had spent the summer months at some respectable watering place!

The Bible is the word of God. God is perfect, therefore he could not be the author of an imperfect law. Man is a progressiv being, therefore imperfect. If man were a perfect being, it would be as impossible for him to progress as it is for God. The natural tendency of an implicit faith in the Bible as the word of God is forever to hold man at a stand-still, and chain him to the errors of the past. It inculcates the idea that rulers are ordained of God, and that we are to submit to the powers that be. This forever shuts out the right of revolution, and makes evolution an impossibility. The Bible is suited to priestcraft and kingcraft, but is incompatible with a progressiv republic. The world saw its darkest day when governed most strictly by this so-called law of God. The highest position attainable by man can never be reached until the shackles of religious slavery are buried in oblivion. So long as man has the fear of God before his eyes, and believes the Bible to be his holy word, so long will his mental power be dwarfed. A belief in divine revelation, written down in a book, is to the human mind what the iron shoe is to the Chinese foot.

Christians claim to be greatly interested in my welfare, especially in another world. As far as my acquaintance goes, they are not to be trusted in the affairs of this world. I hav found them selfish, miserly, and grasping. They hav ever shown a disposition to persecute and proscribe all who differ from them, to smother down and misrepresent by lying and deceit every opinion in opposition to their dogmas. The Christian who robs, oppresses, and defames you in this world, lies, and is guilty of the blackest hypocrisy, when he pretends to be very much interested in your welfare in the world to come.

If Christ was God, he knew everything and had all power. Instead of sending out a dozen men without staff or scrip, on a forlorn hope, to Christianize the whole human family, why did he not start printing-presses in every quarter of the habitable globe, and not leave untold millions to perish for the bread of life? A good business man could hav told him the object could not be accomplished, by the means adopted, in all coming time. It would seem that infinit wisdom, joined to infinit power, ought to be capable of adapting means to ends; every year, from the crucifixion of Christ to the present time, thousands hav died who never heard of the plan of salvation, where one has heard a blast of the gospel trumpet. The absurdity of this plan of salvation is only equaled by the boy who attempted to let a barrel of cider down cellar by tying a rope around his shoulders and then attaching it to the barrel. When his mother heard the noise she ran down cellar and exclaimed: "Why, George, what a plan that was to get a barrel of cider down cellar!" The boy replied: "Why mother, I tell you that the plan was all right, but the rope was too short."

News from Elmina.

DEAR FRIENDS: I am sick with bilious fever, heavy cold, etc.; hav been declining in health ever since Christmas; am not bed-fast, but unable to write much, hence hav sent in no report of money received for Mr. Tuttle, but hav forwarded it all to him, and he, as well as Elmina, sends grateful thanks for your kind donations. I hope you will continue to send in what you can both for Hacker and Tuttle. Of late I hav received nothing for either, but hope this will bring them into your notice again. The old adage, "Out of sight, out of mind," is applicable here, so I am penning this, though suffering from a terrible neuralgic headache. Yours ever,

Snowville, Va., Feb. 11, 283. ELMINA.

PUTNAM'S "Golden Throne," says the Investigator, "is an interesting and amusing story, with a great deal of Liberal philosphy which cannot fail to be acceptable to Liberal readers."

THE TRUTH SEEKER will be sent to new subscribers three months for fifty cents. There is no better way of serving the cause than by extending the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

UTICA, Jan. 7, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 for the Bennett Monument Fund. I hope you will be able to erect a monument to our dead brother which will be a fitting tribute to his good and brave life.

Yours fraternally, A. J. STOUGH.

LUDLOW, Jan. 31, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Although we mourn the loss of the good, brave man Bennett, yet we feel confident that THE TRUTH SEEKER will prosper, for you are apparently enough like him to be his son.

GEORGE NEWKIRK.

NEW YORK, Jan. 29, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $10.50, to be used as herein directed. For my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, $2.50; for Mr. Bennett's monument, from a "Sister," $1.00; from a "Brother," $1.00; from Mrs. L. Miller, $1.00; and $5.00 from

Yours sincerely, ANNIE E. DEFRIESE.

PAOLA, Feb. 4, E.M. 283.

MR. EDITOR: I feel like pushing the good work of Freethought. My way of doing so will be to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER in advance, buy all the books I can, and induce all others to do likewise that I can. So please find inclosed $5.

Yours truly, W. A. LOWE.

SPADRA, Jan. 4, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5. We want it to go to help build a monument on D. M. Bennett's grave. You will please make a note of this in your paper and oblige the only two subscribers for your paper in this place. We hav a good many Liberals here, but they do not take your paper.

Yours truly, R. B. HEWITT.

SACRAMENTO, Feb. 2, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Through the kindness of N. D. Goodell, whom I am working under as draughtsman, I hav had the privilege of reading your valuable paper, which I hope will soon enter every truth seeker's library throughout the United States, and further hope that all will be truth seekers. Your time being valuable, I shall not say much. Inclosed you will please find $20, which apply as below, and you will greatly oblige a young truth seeker.

Yours faithfully, FRANK H. SCHARDIN.

ATWOOD, Jan. 23, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: I hav been away from home for a long time; hav felt bad that I had not the money that I could spare, seemingly, to pay up my arrears. This order will be acceptable I trust, and set us even till next January.

Rest assured you hav our heartfelt sympathy in your sad bereavement. Can his place be supplied? The world has lost more, it seems to me, in his death, than in any one before, I think; but we must submit to the inevitable.

Yours in love, H. W. BEACH.

LAKE CITY, Jan. 16, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Inclosed please find one dollar for your own use. I will not attempt to describe my feelings when I heard of your husband's death. I had become so much attached to him that he appeared to me as one of my nearest friends. I could hardly think it possible that he had passed away, never to giv us his honest, candid thoughts any more.

Please put me down for five dollars to the memorial fund. Believe me, my dear madam, you hav my deepest sympathy in your hours of trouble.

I am ever your friend, J. L. TOMPKINS.

BRIGHTON, Feb. 4, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Accept my sympathy in the loss of your kind and truth-loving husband, D. M. Bennett. I think it was his chief desire that THE TRUTH SEEKER should prove a success. I think he did all in his power to liberate the intellect of mankind from that cursed fraud, priestcraft and superstition, the greatest evil that exists in the world at the present time. I think it is the duty of every Liberal to aid in the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER for that purpose. You will find inclosed a draft for $9, to be applied as directed.

My kind respects to you and Mr. Macdonald,

C. A. SHATTUCK.

NEW YORK, Feb. 6, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER comes regularly to me every Thursday, and is looked forward to from week to week as a very welcome visitor.

Allow me to congratulate you on your success as editor of the same, and thank you for the repleteness of ts columns. I send by mail and giv away copies from time to time as I think they will be well received, hoping thereby to extend its circulation. I hav been intending to call and see you to personally extend congratulations, but hav not found time to do so, and thus substitute a letter for a personal visit.

With many kind regards for Mrs. Bennett, believe me as ever, Truly your friend, WM. M. MCLAWRY.

BENWOOD, W. VA., Feb. 8, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Believing that Liberals should assist each other by way of information and advice when they can do so with but little inconvenience to themselvs, I take this opportunity to ask those of your readers who reside in the West, and can do so, to inform me where a young man of small means, desirous of winning a home, could likely do best. I wish good government land, healthfully located. Would like to hear from Dakota and Nebraska especially. All information will be thankfully received, and stamps returned if desired. C. BURSEE.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., Feb. 3, 1883.

FRIEND MACDONALD: No. 3 of THE TRUTH SEEKER has not yet reached me as the other numbers of this volume hav. Will you please send it to me, while you remember that it is the only number I hav missed since the publication of the said valuable defender of Liberal thought? I am proud to be a constant reader of the paper, as well as a daily reader of all the Infidel papers, for I find them the best representativs of knowledge and general usefulness. My present desire for the said number is an evidence of the love I bear for the paper. Always call on me when I can be more useful to you than others in any cause you desire to put before the public. I will respond if possible, T. L. BROWN.

LIBERTY, O., Jan. 15, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: I sympathize with you in your bereavement. Words cannot express my sorrow when I opened my paper, and read of the death of Brother Bennett. May his good acts and his valuable publications ever liv, and be cherished so that with the aid of such as R. G. Ingersoll, George Chainey, Helen Williams, and many others, humanity may be brought out from under the bondage of theological slavery.

Inclosed find ten dollars; five for the Monument Fund, two and a half for the continuance of the paper, and the remaining two and a half for the poor brothers I saw a notice of in THE TRUTH SEEKER requesting aid. Yours respectfully, NOAH COLER.

FISHERVILLE, Jan. 30, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Words cannot express my great sorrow at the loss of so valiant a defender of Liberalism as D. M. Bennett. Yet he died at his post, and his most glorious work, THE TRUTH SEEKER, will liv and flourish as long as time lasts. Inclosed you will find my subscription fee for this year.

Freethought is rapidly advancing in our midst. Monday night I attended a lecture delivered by Reuben Daily, of Indiana. His subject was the celebration of Thomas Paine's birth. He spoke for over two hours, and every word he uttered was listened to very attentivly, and not one murmur of discontent was heard. He is a bright and shining light in our band of Liberals, and long may he prosper.

Respectfully, N. T. RAGLAND.

POPLAR CREEK, TENN., Jan. 25, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Words seem powerless to express the deep grief we feel, and the sympathy for your great bereavement. Though a stranger since Mr. Bennett's imprisonment, we hav loved and admired the noble and self-sacrificing spirit which upheld him through that trying ordeal. I hardly know which to love most. You were well worthy the companionship of such a noble man. But you must know that his life is not quenched in everlasting silence. He still livs and works for and with you, though unseen will tenderly guide and guard you until your spirit passes to his loving embrace in the beautiful beyond. You are enshrined in the affections of all true Liberals and Spiritualists, and will so remain forever. MRS. C. TAPPEN.

BRIGHTON, Jan. 24, 283.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: There is much to console us in the sudden departure of our well-beloved, honest, and able editor, in that THE TRUTH SEEKER still livs and prospers. Our dear friend still livs in several excellent books written by him, of which, last, but not least, is "A Truth Seeker Around the World." The second volume, showing up the Holy Land as it is, and containing the conversations between the Pilgrim and the king of Salem in the nightly visits of the latter, is alone worth the five dollars. And the others are filled with interesting facts of the other nations very entertaining to read. Please send me the four volumes, when ready, and the fourth volume of the set that I hav. I send one dollar for the Monument Fund.

Yours fraternally, E. E. CURTIS.

LINCOLN, Jan. 20, 283.

MR EDITOR: Although THE TRUTH SEEKER has come to me but six months, I hav learned to like it so well that I always want to take it. I frequently hav taken copies into the school-room, and read to my geography classes from Mr. Bennett's travels, and now the fifteen weeks I hav been with the school here is drawing to a close. I want THE TRUTH SEEKER to follow me home, so instead of Lee, Maine, my address will be Sandy Point, Me. I shall stop in Bangor a few days and hav all the copies which I hav put into a binding, and as my paper of to-day was cut in the lines between the columns in printing, please send No. 3, Jan. 20th, to Bangor, Me., where I can get it. When I get home I shall send cash for Mr. Bennett's round-the-world books, his greatest monument.

Hoping that I may prove one of the lion's whelps, I am for the present,

Yours truly, GEO. S. PERKINS.

GRAND VIEW, Feb. 10, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Myself and wife hav been constant readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER from the time the discussion commenced between the late D. M. Bennett and the three clergymen in our county. We expect to continue to read it so long as it is conducted by such able hands; in short, THE TRUTH SEEKER is our Bible, and, like good Christians, we cannot do without it.

The death of Mr. Bennett was sad news indeed to us; but when we reflect that THE TRUTH SEEKER is left in good hands, it somewhat consoles us. We say, Long may it prosper and much good may it do toward liberating the human family from superstition. Inclosed find order for $3, which dispose of as follows: For the Monument Fund—D. J. Sherer, $1; Mrs. Jane Sherer, $1; two new subscribers for three months, $1. Yours sympathetically,

D. J. SHERER.

DAVISVILLE, Feb. 2, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: It is my opinion that Mr. D. M. Bennett does not want a monument of marble erected to his memory. I never saw him, but I believe I know him, and I know I love him for the good he did for humanity. Only one man has done more for humanity than has Mr. Bennett, and that one is Andrew Jackson Davis.

What Mr. Bennett wants, as I think, is to hav a Bennett Hall built of such dimensions as to be suitable for publishing THE TRUTH SEEKER, book-store for sale of rational literature, etc. The lecture hall should be sufficiently commodious to seat at least four thousand people; and should be free to all progressiv thinkers to speak their thoughts in.

I am willing to pay $100 toward such a building; and if I hav a crop of good raisin grapes the coming season, I will pay $200, but nothing for a monument, as it has no earthly nor heavenly value. He wants something that will benefit humanity. I hope there are 5,000 truth seekers in the world who are willing and able to pay $100 each toward erecting a Bennett Hall. Yours truly, G. G. BRIGGS.

ST. JOSEPH, Feb. 12, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Herewith I inclose draft for $2.50 to pay subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year from Jan. 28 (I believe), 1883.

I, in common with all Infidels and seekers for truth, regret the untimely taking off of your late husband, the bold, iconoclastic, D. M. Bennett.

In his short lifetime his labors hav done more to emancipate man from superstition and despotism, the twin enemies of man's happiness and progress, than all the grasshopper priests that hav scourged and cursed the earth and all that thereon is since our ancestors advanced from the monkey to the form of man.

But I rejoice that his harness has been taken up by your worthy self and the brave, chivalrous, and clear-headed Macdonald.

The man's body has died, but THE TRUTH SEEKER still livs, and the friends of humanity must see to it that it not only livs, but, like a thriving tree, that it strikes its roots deep into the affections of the people, and spreads its branches over our entire continent of America. Yours, P. V. WISE.

SUSANVILLE, Jan. 23, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find order for $6—$5 for the Bennett Hall and home for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $1 for the Monument Fund.

If every admirer and lover of D. M. Bennett will do their duty we can erect a hall and home for THE TRUTH SEEKER that will be a lasting monument, to be seen and talked of by millions yet unborn. I wish I could giv thousands instead of dollars.

When I first saw the black lines on THE TRUTH SEEKER, the thought flashed through my brain, our brave and loved Bennett has gone. The shock has been so great to my nerves that I cannot get over it yet. My wife joins me in my heartfelt sympathy with Mrs. Bennett in her great trouble.

I was not personally acquainted with our Bennett, but through somebody that I presume had heard me talk, I got one of the first sheets of the little TRUTH SEEKER that was published at Par s, Ill. From that time we hav been faithful friends, and though Bennett in the flesh has gone, and has no need of my assistance, Bennett in THE TRUTH SEEKER still remains, and shall hav my support as long as I liv, and I hope every lover of truth will feel as I do, and endeavor to make the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER millions instead of thousands. And you, Eugene, who are so well qualified to fill your position, I hope will remain at your post till my wish is a fact. I was very glad to see a long letter in my last paper from friend Syphers. It was like reading a letter from an old friend. Let us hear from you occasionally, John; there are many TRUTH SEEKER readers besides myself that like you still.

Yours truly, V. J. BORRETTE.

MODESTO, CAL., Feb. 4, 283.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Several times since humanity met with that irreparable loss, the death of your noble husband, I hav tried to write to you words of comfort. As often, however, hav I abandoned the attempt, knowing so well as I do from unutterable bereavements of my own how totally inadequate words are to express all that the loving heart can suffer in its greatest bereavement, or to bring comfort to such a heart thus bereaved. All I will say, therefore, now is that I fully understand the greatness of your sorrow, and fully sympathize with you therein. Though I never saw Mr. Bennett, I had learned to love him as a brother and to regard him as the most heroic of all the mighty band of heroes who are to-day so nobly battling for truth and humanity.

Before his fall I thought I was doing my best. Now, however, I feel that I must do more, and I mean to do it. THE TRUTH SEEKER must go on carrying light and liberty to the millions groveling in the darkness of ignorance and superstition. Taking Mr. Bennett for my model in this respect, I hav determined to devote all the balance of my life and all my means to the glorious cause in which he fell.

Yours truly, JOHN R. KELSO.

EUREKA, WIS., Jan. 24, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find two dollars, one for J. M. Rounds and one for myself, toward the erection of a monument over the remains of one of the grandest men that ever lived. I say the grandest, for I verily believe he has done more for humanity during the last ten years than any other man, living or dead. Still we hav many noble men and women left to carry on the work he has left in their hands; and THE TRUTH SEEKER, the work of his hands and brain, must and shall be sustained, and I hav no doubt will be ably conducted as ever.

I hav not sent in my heart-felt grief on the death of Mr. Bennett, as I knew many others would do so in much better language than I could possibly use. Suffice it to say, I hav felt all that others hav expressed in their letters. Who ever before witnessed such an outpouring of heart-felt sorrow over the death of any other man as has appeared in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers? And yet the secular press of the country, as a general thing, hav hardly noticed the sad event. They dare not say anything bad of him, and yet say nothing good for fear Madam Grundy wouldn't like it, showing that the old lady is still to a great extent master of the situation. E. B. ROUNDS.

EARLVILLE, Jan. 29, 283.

MR EDITOR: When I think of your celebrations all over the country, I can only be with you in mind. The day is very beautiful here. It almost seems that the dear old sun is trying to celebrate the birthday of Thomas Paine; and I wonder to myself if one hundred and forty-six years ago to-day was as beautiful as to-day. I am glad I can hav my own mind free from dupedom, so I can honor the one that has done so much for mental liberty, so I can hav my own mind for my own church, and hav no priest to think for me. Of course, I am in the midst of believing Christians, and when I read the new version of the New Testament to them, and they can see that the Trinity is left out, so they hav only one God to worship, they must all be Unitarians, as was Thomas Paine, it brings sad countenances; but the rising generations will hail it with joy. I feel very much endeared to the cause by receiving so many Liberal papers, all over the country, although not able to support them all, but wish I could, for there are so many that are worthy of help in so good a cause. I am very much pleased with the second edition of the directory I hav received to-day to help me celebrate the hero's birthday. I close, hoping there will be no discussions that will mar the feelings of any one on Freethought. I remain, Yours fraternally, S. C. HILTON.

HOLYOKE, Feb. 12, E.M. 283.

MR. EDITOR: A friend kindly loaned me some old TRUTH SEEKERS, and among them I found extracts from Voltaire's "Pocket Theology." As I should like the work, I inclose 25 cents, the price given in the catalog sent me. I also saw among the TRUTH SEEKERS a piece taken from the Seymour Times, written to that paper by you in defense of D. M. Bennett ("He pleads earnestly for his absent chief"); and in that piece I read: "Is there no merit in fighting for another's right to differ from you," and also that this sentence was an inspiration. Now, I do not think it was an inspiration, but what I do think is that it was the honest, heartfelt, and outspoken thought of one who would himself at any time or place fight for another's right to differ from him. If the so-called "inspired" writers had written in all their writings even one sentence the equal of those eight words, then you and I and thousands of others would not to-day be truth seekers, for the truth would hav been found hundreds of years ago.

Now, I wish you would publish the above, as it is no flattery, but a just tribute to a braver and better man than the myth called God has ever yet (whatever he may do in the future) inspired.

With best wishes for the success of THE TRUTH SEEKER and all connected with it, I remain

MILES, Jan. 16, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Although a new subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hav had a chance to form an opinion as to the sterling worth of our lamented leader. The sad news was so unexpected that I could hardly believe the press dispatches. The names of Voltaire and Paine will forever be fresh in the minds of all Freethinkers, and likewise will the name of D. M. Bennett, when all his slanderers and traducers are forgotten, remain fresh in the minds and hearts of all the liberty lovers for centuries to come. How universal is the memory of Paine, although the names of his persecutors hav passed from the memories of men! And so it will be with Bennett. When Anthony Comstock's name has been buried for centuries with common things, D. M. Bennett's will grow brighter and brighter through each succeeding century. It is a question in my mind whether the Liberals of this country will push forth from their ranks so able a leader as Mr. Bennett for generations to come.

I hope the friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER will giv it their unbroken support. Although its able founder has passed away from the scenes of earth, let us not despair, but go into the fight with renewed vigor, and sweep from imagination all the dogmas that serve to corrupt the human mind.

Respectfully yours, C. E. THOMPSON.

HOULTON, MAINE, Jan. 24, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I feel to sympathize deeply with the Freethinkers of the world, and lament most sincerely the martyrdom of our great captain, D. M. Bennett, who so nobly and fearlessly defended the great principles of truth and justice, and charged so valiantly upon the abuses of the Christian world. I fear it will be a long day before we can duplicate him. I notice that the subscriptions for a suitable monument to be erected upon his resting-place are coming in thick and fast. I am glad to see so much interest manifested to immortalize his memory. When it is fully determined to erect a Memorial Building to his memory—one that will be used to promulgate the truth as we find it in nature—I will send in my contribution, although it will be small.

I hav recently contributed what I could well spare to giv our old friend, Jeremiah Hacker, an enjoyable thanksgiving dinner. I think it is well to remember the old war horses who hav battled for freedom, and spent their best energies and their material substance in battling superstition, and who hav become destitute of the necessities of life.

With best wishes for the spread of truth as promulgated by our fallen and much lamented leader, and sympathizing deeply with Mrs. Bennett for the great loss she has sustained, and also with the world for the loss to humanity, I am yours for the emancipation of the world from religious superstition and Christian barbarism, A. P. HEYWOOD.

SHERIDAN, MICH., Feb. 11, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.25 for the noble TRUTH SEEKER. Equal rights for all is our motto, and I believe THE TRUTH SEEKER more than any other Freethought journal is governed by this sublime sentiment. I hav no doubt these people who are creating ill-feeling between the different sections of our vast army of Freethinkers hav often felt angry and indignant at injustice from the hands of Christians who condemn without giving us a hearing, and yet they so far forget the law of justice as to pass judgment upon all who do not agree with their infallible opinions as to whether if a man dies he shall or shall not not liv again. If he is such an intolerant bigot as to refuse support to a paper that does not exclude all opinions but his own, it is to be hoped the latter will be the case. Christians are often eager for an argument because so ignorant as to suppose Infidelity can produce more, but after the first encounter they assume an "I am holier than thou" expression of countenance which is calculated to ward off all further discussion. Whoever feels his position to be a tenable one will not be so fast to get a law prohibiting all future investigation on the subject. I am not afraid Spiritualists will produce enough evidence to convert earnest investigators; neither do I think that any who read your paper will be compelled by overwhelming proofs to accept error or reject the truth. MISS E. A. GLEASON.

MULBERRY, PA., Jan. 29, 283.

MR. EDITOR: We inclose five dollars—two for a new subscriber. Truth seekers are scarce in our neighborhood, but priests and dupes are plenty. One dollar is for the Bennett monument. Let us try to build a home for THE TRUTH SEEKER as a monument for Bennett. I will do my share; let each one do the same. I will tell you how we spent Paine's birthday. Our anniversary was on a small scale, but it may still be interesting. We hav our room adorned with the Trinity—Paine's, Bennett's, and Ingersoll's fine large lithographs on one side and Garfield and a small book-case with Liberal works on the other. The lithographs we entwined with evergreens ornamented with immortelles. Below Ingersoll we had a motto nicely worked, "Kindness makes friends;" around Paine "Our Author-Hero," and his best saying, "The world is my country, to do good my religion." Our dear Bennett was draped in mourning, with a nicely worked motto below—"Thou art gone, but not forgotten."

We had some music and singing. One fine hymn was published in the last issue of the Liberal.

We had a kind of family reunion, and some dinner. We enjoyed the day very much. I hope that by another year we will hav better arrangements.

The church has done everything to blacken Paine's memory. I think every Liberal should try and do all that is possible to proclaim his good works. We wish you success in your undertaking.

Very respectfully yours,

MRS. AND MR. L. W. LIGHTY.

VINTON, IOWA., Jan. 22, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: While I would sympathize with the bereaved relativs and friends of Mr. Bennett, I would say let us each and all rally around the standard of truth, as thrown to the breeze by our great chieftain; and, if we can do nothing more, keep our great beaconlight, THE TRUTH SEEKER, before the eager public gaze, and it always shows best when paid for. And now let me say a few words by way of criticism, with reference to Brother E. C. Walker, on prohibition, or rather his idea of the sovereign right to choose. In THE TRUTH SEEKER, Jan. 13th, he says: Shall the citizen be debarred from the exercise of the right to choose, etc., under the absurd pretense that it is feared he will make bad use of that right? Then he sets up in support of the above:

1st. That each individual naturally possesses the right to control his or her own person.

2d. That each person has a natural right to obtain by purchase, etc., or any other honest way, such food, drink, clothing, etc., as he or she may desire.

3d. That each man and woman is the proper and sole judge of the extent and legitimacy of his or her wants.

Now the brother says, or implies, that the individual shall not be restraind in his choice, and as choice implies action, then we take it that he shall not be restrained in action. If the brother means anything, he surely means this, for he uses the term, that the man is the sole judge of his own wants, that he has a right to supply these wants by obtaining, etc.; that the person has the right to control his own person or actions, if you please. But unfortunately for Brother Walker, he used the word honest. Now we take it that where there is no law, there is no transgression, and as the word honest had its origin with that of law, statute, ordinance, etc., and as there is honesty, there must be the opposit, or dishonesty.

Again, shall the citizen be denied the right of choice? Brother Walker says no. And as choice implies action, the actor, we infer, has the same right to act as he has to choose; and if it is wrong to prohibit the choice, it is wrong to prohibit the act. And if this is the true condition that man occupies, then he is not responsible to any one except himself for any act he may choose to commit.

This being the case, the individual may commit any crime in the list of crimes, and if he can satisfy himself on the matter it is all right, for surely if any one did interfere it will tend to destroy his liberty, his right to choose or act in accord with that choice; for as soon as you qualify the right to choose or act, you take away that sole and absolute choice and control that Brother Walker prates about so much. When we introduced the word honest and set it up as a standard, by which our acts and choices are be tested, our first inquiry would be, Who is to establish this standard, and what are you going to do with those that do not come up to the standard? Certainly they do not forfeit anything of those "sole absolute rights and desires." Now then if I hav a transaction in business with a minor, or some person that is not of sound mind, and I am the gainer by the transaction and they are the losers, all I hav to do is to claim absolute, sole, and legitimate right, and then I am free from the interference of prohibitory or penal laws. For if Brother Walker can dispense with the restraining influence of law in one case we can in another, for if by law the right of action is abridged, of what use is desire or choice?

But I suppose Brother Walker's new system will so revolutionize and change the desires and wishes of the people when the restraint of law is removed that all will become of one desire, and their wishes will be one. Happy day that! if they follow the teachings of Brother Walker, and they surely will, for man is ever ready to embrace and secure to himself all that of right belongs to him; yea, even more, even the rights of the helpless women and children. Now, brother, all you hav said so far has been in favor of the unqualified right to use alcohol as a beverage, and you hav not as yet intimated that it is nature's own beverage, or that it was even a good substitute.

A little more and we are done for this time. I hav not as yet heard any complaint from you regarding nature's laws, and it is a wonder, for they are very arbitrary, yes, in many of its applications the penalty is death. And man claims the right (and I think justly) to pattern after nature and in everything take lessons from man.

The facts are, I think, that Brother Walker is away behind time. Such theories as his perhaps would hav suited in some prehistoric age. But still he and his theories are here with us, whether he has the chance to exercise his sovereign choice or not. Let us hear from you, Brother Walker.

Yours for the right, N. HAYS.

Poetry.

A Close-Fisted Economist.

From the Washington Post.

The farmer sat in his easy chair
Between the fire and the lamplight's glare;
His face was ruddy and full and fair;
His three small boys in the chimney nook
Counted the lines of a picture book;
His wife, the pride of his home and heart,
Baked the biscuit and made the tart,
Laid the table and drew the tea,
Deftly, swiftly, silently;
Tired and weary, weak and faint,
She bore her trials without complaint,
Like many another household saint—
Content all selfish bliss above
In the patient ministry of love.

At last, between the clouds of smoke
That wreathed his lips the farmer spoke:
"There's taxes to raise and int'rest to pay,
And if there should come a rainy day
'Twould be mighty handy, I'm bound to say,
T' hav something put by. For folks must die;
An' there's funeral bills and grave-stones to buy—
Enough to swamp a man, purty nigh;
Besides, there's Edward an' Dick an' Joe
To be provided for when we go;
So, if I were you, I'll tell you what I'd du;
I'd be savin' of wood as ever I could—
Extra fires don't do any good;
I'd be savin' of soap, and savin' of ile,
And run up some candles once in a while;
I'd rather be sparin' of coffee and tea,
For sugar is high,
An' all to buy,
And cider is good enough drink for me;
I'd be kind o' careful about my clo'es,
And look out sharp how the money goes—
Gewgaws is useless, nater knows;
Extra trimmin'
'S the bane of women.
I'd sell the best of my cheese an' honey,
An' eggs is as good, nigh 'bout, as money;
An' as tu the carpet you wanted new—
I guess we can make the old one du;
And as for the washer and sewin' machine,
Them smooth-tongued agents, so pesky mean,
You'd better get rid of 'em slick an' clean.
What do they know 'bout women's work?
Do they calkilate women was made to shirk?"

Dick and Edward and little Joe
Sat in the corner in a row;
They saw their patient mother go
On ceaseless errands to and fro;
They saw that her form was bent and thin,
Her temples gray, her cheeks sunk in;
They saw the quiver of lip and chin—
And then, with a wrath he could not smother,
Outspoke the youngest, frailest brother:
"You talk of savin' wood an' ile,
An' tea an' sugar all the while,
But you never talk of savin' mother!"

Before and After Marriage.

BEFORE.

My Maggie! My beautiful darling!
Creep into my arms, my sweet!
Let me fold you again to my bosom,
So close I can hear your heart beat.
What! these little fingers been sewing?
One's pricked by the needle, I see!
Those hands shall be kept from such labor
When once they are given to me.

All mine, little pet, I will shield you
From trouble and labor and care;
I will robe you like some fairy princess,
And jewels shall gleam in your hair.
Those slippers you gave me are perfect!
That dressing-gown fits to a T.
My darling! I wonder that heaven
Should giv such a treasure to me!

Eight, nine, ten, eleven! My precious,
Time flies when I am with you!
It seems but a moment I've been here,
And now—must I say it?—adieu!

AFTER.

O Mag! you are heavy! I'm tired!
Go sit in the rocker, I pray;
Your weight seems a hundred and ninety
When you plump down in that sort of way.
You had better be mending my coat sleeve,
I've spoken about it before,
And I want to finish this novel,
And look over those bills from the store.

This dressing-gown fits like the d—l,
These slippers run down at the heel,
Strange nothing can ever look decent;
I wish you could know how they feel.
What's this bill from Green's? Why surely
It's not another new dress!
Look here! I'll be bankrupt ere New Year,
Or your store-bills will hav to grow less.

Eight o'clock! Mag, sew on this button
As soon as you finish this sleeve,
Heigh ho! I'm so deucedly sleepy
I'll pile off to bed, I believe.

Press Notices of W. S. Bell's Lectures.

PROF. W. S. BELL, of Boston, Mass., delivered his lecture entitled "Liberty and Morality" to a very appreciativ audience last Sunday afternoon at the court-house. Mr. Bell is a brilliant and logical orator, handles his subject in a very entertaining manner, holds his audience as by magic, is never at a loss for words with which to clothe his ideas. All who missed his lecture missed a treat. However, he has it for sale, and many bought.—Mirror-Gazette, Kans.

OF the lectures of W. S. Bell too much cannot be said in their praise. They were learned, eloquent, and forcible. His lecture on "Liberty and Morality" has scarcely a peer in the realm of Liberal literature. The object or purpose is to show up the demoralizing tendencies of the Christian religion, and the ennobling tendencies of the Liberal doctrins, and this he does in a masterly and convincing manner. Throughout, this lecture was listened to with the profoundest attention and interest, and it cannot fail of doing much good.

The closest attention was paid to every utterance of the learned speaker throughout. Mr. Bell has given excellent satisfaction to the Liberalists who listened to him, and takes with him their best wishes for his success in his labors upon the Liberal rostrum.—Kansas Blade.

BROTHER W. S. BELL, of Boston, is with us now completing his program for lectures in Kansas and western Missouri, and I would say here that those desiring lectures from this distinguished speaker should write him immediately at this place and secure his services. He has been entertaining our people with lectures not a whit less interesting in matter then Ingersoll. Indeed, had Brother Bell the reputation of Ingersoll, his services would be as eagerly sought and no doubt the listener would be equally interested. I am sure his lectures are equally instructiv with those of Ingersoll, if not more so. Liberals will do well to secure his services. Keep him busy, friends.—A. C. STOWE, in Kansas Liberal.

DEITY ANALYZED AND
THE DEVIL'S DEFENSE.
By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.
Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. The colonel has made the sacredness of the scriptures appear as absurd as Cervantes made that of the knights of the age of chivalry. The singular audacity with which he attack. the foundations of Christianity shows the earnestness of his own convictions in regard to its fabulous origin.—L Hutchison.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion.
2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.
3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.
BENNETT affirms; MAIR denies. This is an exhaustiv discussion. Price, $1.50.

Trial of D. M. Bennett in the United States Circuit Court upon the charge of depositing prohibited matter in the mail. This givs a full history of this celebrated case, and shows what monstrous injustice was perpetrated upon MR. BENNETT. Price, cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

TESTIMONIALS:

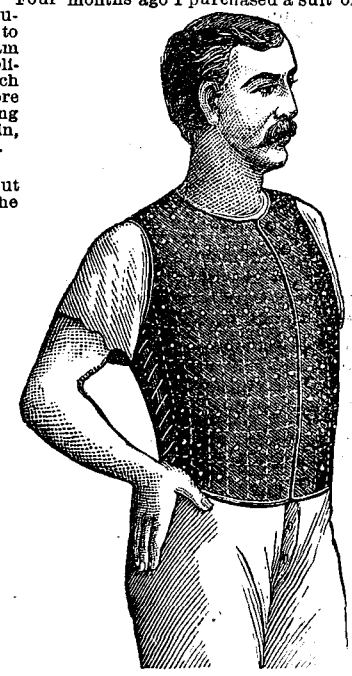
Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.



Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by any one desiring to communicate with her.

Children's garments upon application.

Any of the above garments sent to any address upon receipt of price, and we will return the money if they are not as represented in every respect. If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case, send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselves. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them at about

ONE-THIRD THE PRICE HERETOFORE CHARGED,

So that we can say with truth, None are so poor that they cannot procure them, being but a trifle higher than ordinary clothing.

Remember that we are offering you the cheapest and best magnetic appliances in the market, and if upon receiving the garments they do not meet your expectation, return them at our expense and we will refund your money.

Ladies' Abdominal Jackets and Gentlemen's Vests are made to order, and a fit guaranteed.

Gems of Thought.

MISS GLENCAIRN "went in for religion" bitterly; she employed it as the buttress of her misanthropy, and used Holy Writ, as an Irishman uses his shillalah, for purposes of assault and battery. The main article of her creed was that she was "elect," and—as is rather the way with the creeds of the "elect"—the spiritual eligibility of her neighbors did not bulk very largely in it. She also held that "whatever is pleasant is wrong," and certainly acted up to this article in so far that she denied herself the pactice of all those sweet and gracious charities which are [supposed to be] Christianity's pleasantest outcome.—Lockhart's Mine to Thine.

"WHAT," said the nobleman to the sage, "hav you got by your philosophy?" "Society in myself," was the answer. This answer was a pretty plain hint to the nobleman to get out of the way, to make himself scarce, and reminds us of the answer of Diogenes to Alexander the Great. "Can I do anything for you?" said Alexander." "Yes," said the cynic, as if anticipation of a teacher of another school who said, "Let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay;" "stand out from between me and the sun."—Hylax.

AS for our mis-education, make not bad worse; waste not the time yet ours in trampling on thistles because they hav yielded us no figs. Here are books, and we hav brains to read them; here is a whole earth and a whole heaven, and we hav eyes to look on them.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

HE that preaches to man should understand what is in man; and that skill can scarce be attained by an ascetic in his solitudes.—Alterbury.

IT is not an easy task to achieve liberty. It is far easier to acccept what is given us in blind, unquestioning faith without reason, against reason, above reason, as so many do. There are certain opinions that are deemed orthodox in the world, and only these hav general currency. To doubt them is to be cast out of many circles of society. So long as Christian orthodoxy rises supreme over all, to doubt it is deemed sinful, to accept it is deemed meritorious. Doubt has been stigmatized as the child of sin. But, in our times, the tables hav been turned. . . . What were esteemed everlasting certainties for ages are now no longer certain. We are launched on an unknown sea, sailing we know not whither, and when we shall arrive we know not. The mind is dazed and dazzled by the new vistas that dawn upon it. But we are to work out our own convictions and build up our own scheme of life; and it is a hard and laborious undertaking, requiring constant work and individual struggle.—Felix Adler's Radical Pulpit.

I SHALL treat of the devil entirely from a biblical point of view. Doubtless I ought to do this; the Christian devil is a Bible institution. I say, advisedly, the Christian devil, because other religions hav boasted their devil, and it is well to prevent confusion. But I frankly admit that none of these religions hav the honor of a devil so devilish as our own. Indeed, our Devil ought to be the best, it costs the most. No other religion besides our own can boast the array of popes, bishops, conferences, rectors, incumbents, and paid preachers of various titles. And all these to preach against the Devil!—Bradlaugh's Few Words About the Devil.

CHRISTIANITY is not the most widely spread of the religions of mankind. Buddhism is of earlier date, and counts more millions among its votaries. Islamism took its rise later, was diffused more rapidly, and rules over a larger area of the earth's surface. At one time it seemed as if Christianity would go down before its triumphant career. Some readers of history may even be disposed to argue that but for two men and two battles—possibly that but for a special charge of cavalry, or it may be a sudden inspiration of the leading generals—it might hav done so. The spread of Buddhism, the spread of Islamism, must hav had an adequate cause, as well as Christianity.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

MEN admit that all knowledge of "philosophy, politics, medicin, and the like," has been slowly gained by the experience of man and his own toil, some efforts, unaided by any supernatural power; but they say religion has been revealed to man direct from a perfect omniscient God. We find, however, that men are no more agreed about religion which has been revealed than about science which has not been revealed. Of what advantage, then, is revelation? And is it not derogatory to God to suppose he could reveal what men cannot understand? The fact that men differ about religion, philosophy, politics, and medicin, proves that God has never given direct, positiv instruction upon these subjects. . . . It seems, to my mind, that religion rests on just the same authority as science, namely, human experience and research; and God has never spoken about religion in any way that he may not be said to hav talked politics or given medical lectures. "The Lord spake unto" Solon and Galen as truly as unto Moses. When men recognize the truth that religious ideas hav no higher authority than medical ideas possess, they will become as charitable about theological differences as they now are about varying medical theories. Will it not be a social improvement?—E. E. Adams.

SO soon as a book is made sacred all that is weakest and worst in it becomes most prominent and influential, and overwhelms all that is best in it. So it is that although personal religion, personal conviction, direct intercourse of the soul with God, universal illumination of the Holy Spirit, without any sharp distinction of laity and clergy, of teachers and taught, pervade the whole New Testament, yet corporate religion and sacerdotal mediation has ever been the original doctrin.—Newman's Religion Not History.

WE hav said that we do not very well know what Southey's opinion about toleration is. But, on the whole, we take it to be this, that everybody is to tolerate him, and that he is to tolerate nobody.—Macaulay's Essays.

IT is a most earnest thing to be alive in this world; to die is not sport to a man; it is a stern reality, altogether a serious matter to be alive.—Carlyle.

Odds and Ends.

A MAN in Morrison, Col., has invented a patent oyster for church festival purposes. It can be boiled, taken out from the soup on a fork, chewed, laid by the side of the plate, washed and used month after month, so that customers get nothing but clear soup every time.

"WHAT luck did you hab las' night, parson?" asked Rev. Aminidab Bledsoe of Whangdoodle Baxter, two of the most popular colored clergymen in Austin, or in this section of Texas, for that matter.

"Didn't hab no luck at all. Dar was no chickens in reach. I found a lot ob shirts hangin' on a line, but de wedder was so inclement dat de shirts and udder close was froze to de line so tight I couldn't pull 'em off. Maybe de Lawd will temper de wind to de shorn lamb, and moderate de wedder, so I kin pull dem close offen de line ef dey am still out ter night."

"Why de debble didn't yer cut de line at bofe ends and go off wid de line, close, and all?"

"Brudder Whangdoodle, nex' time I'll be proud ter hab yer go along. You has studied de subject line upon line and precept upon precept."—Texas Siftings.

THE SPORTS AND THE STRANGER.

Three sports got on a railroad car,
A railroad car, with a pack of cards;
They called "here" "hyar," and "there" was "thar,"
And they always spoke to each other as "pards."
For sports they are, both good and poor,
Professional and amateur,
Where railroad trains are running.

They wanted a fourth at a eucher hand,
Three were they, and they were one short,
And they asked a stranger if he'd the sand
To try a little game for sport.
For strangers there are where men abound,
And you'll always find a stranger around
Where railroad trains are running.

The stranger didn't know the game,
But he was willing to liv and learn;
To him the cards were all the same—
"They was to all at first, he'd learn!"
And the sports laughed loud and dealt the pack,
And gave him four queens and a thick-legged Jack,
As they will, when trains are running.

And then they bet on the poker hand,
And fattened the pot to goodly pile,
And they asked the stranger if he would stand,
And the stranger stood, with a simple smile,
And one sport raised the other two,
And the stranger him, as strangers do,
Where railroad trains are running.

And then, in a solemn, breathless hush,
The three sports showed what they had got;
But aces won't beat a royal flush,
And the stranger gobbled that obese pot,
For strangers and sports are natural foes,
And the former carry cards in their clo'es,
Where railroad trains are running.

OSCAR WILDE'S LAMENT OVER HIS EXPERIENCE IN AMERICA.

Ah, me, as I brood in my boudoir here,
With its sumptuous dado half divine,
In thought I return to the time fell drear
Far away o'er the tame Atlantic brine.

A-weary the vision comes and goes—
Like a man attending high-art lectures—
And I ask, with a blush like a crimson rose,
"Am I, then, such a flat as the world conjectures?"

And what is the vision that moves me so,
As I languid lunch on a lightsome lily?
S'death, I'll confide to the world my woe
Though they call me a calfkin soft and silly.

Far away o'er the tame Atlantic brine,
Oh, the vision keeps growing clearer and clearer,
In the too high colored autumnal time
I met him—my baneful banco-steerer!

He wooed me with many a soft caress,
His smile was as bright as my lank, light hair,
In a moment I loved him, nothing less—
S'death that the false should be so fair!

As our souls commingled I told him true
That Niag'ra Falls were not to my taste,
And I saw that I thrilled him through and through,
As I named it a fluid, howling waste.

And then, with the air of a guileless child—
Oh, that sweet, bright smile and those eyes aflame;
He said, "If you'll let me, dear Mr. Wilde,
I'll show you a ravishing little game."

His smile was as bright as my lank, light hair,
And his eyes they were full of a tender glee,
So I linked my arm to his own, right there,
And softly whispered, "I'll go with thee."

What more? 'Tis the story that's oft retold
Of a trusting heart and its grief and shame
As it ponders the lesson so new, so old—
"You never should bet on another man's game."

We hied to his haunts in a Bowery bliss,
(Oh, his tender, ethical, mobile face!)
And he made me acquaint with "some friends of his,"
Who hailed me with many a fond embrace.

And then—oh, the picture I'll ne'er forget,
'Tis a tablet whose tracings naught effaces,
I ventured my pile on a king quartet
But my friend held five consecutiv aces.

With a deep, keen sigh I fled from the room,
With the flower mistrust enshrined in my heart,
With my pocket-book robbed of its opulent bloom,
And I muttered, "For England it's time to depart."

. . . . . .

The volupt'ous sunflower ever tries
To bring me surcease of my gnawing pain,
My nun-like lilies respond with their sighs,
As into their bosoms my tears I rain.

But they cannot assuage this woe of mine,
For my sad, sear heart grows searer and searer,
As my thoughts fly over the tame, wide brine,
And light on that untamed banco-steerer.

DR. THAYER'S
Magnetic Clothing

Is a stimulant and sedativ nerve tonic, identical with that dynamic force that is eliminated from the brain, and moves along our nervous tissues.
It penetrates and searches the blood, throwing off and out all poisonous matter through the pores of the skin, when all medicines fail.
It stimulates the absorbents to take up the nutrimen; and in its distribution to repair waste tissues.
It is quick in action, and gives permanent and ready relief to the afflicted in different diseases.
Do you suffer with functional, physical, or nervous debility? Are our female readers broken down in health and spirits from disorders peculiar to their sex, arising from a prostration of the nervous system?
Why then further neglect a subject so productiv of health, when there is at hand a means of cure?
Why not throw off the yoke of bondage altogether, and seek a remedy that has science and common sense to commend it?
It is a remedy of indisputable efficacy to the restoration of health and vigor.
Physicians indorse it, and the goods indorse themselvs.
During the past two years "Victoria" has been purchased by hundreds, and their united testimony is that it has no equal for curing disease.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER
Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last word penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

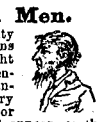
DR. FELLOWS



A REGULARLY educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove,
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES,

Spermatorrhœa and Impotency,

As the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions, (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an EXTERNAL APPLICATION in from 30 to 60 days. No medicine taken. It has never been known to fail!

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in cut. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.
☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

"PRIVATE COUNSELOR"

Sent to any address, securely sealed, for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhœa or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞Remember a radical cure is certain. Address, plainly, DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey, and say in what paper you saw this advertisement.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 10. No. 9. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY M. W. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, March 3, 1883. | NO. 21 CLINTON PLACE, NEAR BROADWAY. | $2.50 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

Both houses of the California legislature hav voted to repeal the Sunday laws of that state.

The mutual duties of the parson and the monkeys are to gather in contributions while the organ plays.

The old Congregational church at Litchfield, Conn., where the Rev. Dr. Lyman Beecher formerly preached, is now used as a skating rink.

The first Jewish marriage which has taken place in Madrid since the expulsion of the Jews from Spain, two centuries ago, was celebrated a few days ago.

An organist in a church at Providence, R. I., relieved the monotony of waiting for a belated bridal party by playing: "Oh, dear! what can the matter be?"

An article in the New Jerusalem Magazine is devoted to proving that the church lost the power of healing the sick in consequence of the adoption of the Athanasian creed.

The St. Louis Christian Advocate says that in wickedness Beecher is the superior of Ingersoll, though in skepticism they are equals. It describes Beecher as a "lovely monster."

Governor Alexander H. Stephens believes in the comforting theory of eternal punishment, and calmly writes that his "whole life is a standing contradiction of any other belief."

A Minnesota man had himself baptized in a hole in the ice when the mercury was down to thirty degrees below zero. That he still livs shows that all the fools are not yet out of existence.

The Rev. Dr. DePuy, assistant editor of the Advocate, has resigned his position on that paper. It is supposed that the exposure of his complicity in the Isabella mining swindle led to his retirement from public life.

A man told his friend the other day that he had joined the army. "What regiment?" his friend asked. "Oh, I don't mean that; I mean the army of the Lord." "Ah! what church then?" "The Baptist." "Why," was the reply, "that's not the army; it's the navy."

The Christian Register, Unitarian, says "the Bible is a Unitarian book." The Rev. George E. Ellis, D.D., Unitarian, says the Bible is an orthodox book, and that "only ingenious, special, and forced treatment can make the Bible teach anything but orthodoxy." The Christian at Work says: "Really the brethren ought to come to some agreement as to what kind of a book the Bible is."

Some of the better class of Jews in Roumania are making up colonies for Palestine. More than fifty colonies hav gone within the last six months. If the Jews can make a living in Palestine it should be given to them and their heirs forever, as it is worth nothing to anybody else. It was the judgment of Mr. Bennett that the soil of that country could be cultivated only by means of a crowbar.

The Rev. George H. Austin was not paid his salary regularly, at Madison, Ind., and in order to raise money he forged the name of a rich member of his church to a check, trusting to the man's forgivness for protection from exposure and punishment; but he was promptly sent to prison for five years. The life of a convict soon broke down his mind and body, and he died at the end of eighteen months.

An extraordinary sermon has been preached by the Rev. Thomas R. Bacon, of New Haven. He accuses the church of having borne false witness against many worthy persons, in that it has denounced all actors, card players, and billiard players, together with their actions and games. He says this denunciation is too sweeping, and is consequently unjust. He pleads for liberty that Christian people may enjoy such good and proper amusements as this world has to set before them.

John Phenix evidently was a little skeptical on the subject of miracles. Thirty years ago, in a humorous essay on the sun, he said: "Sacred history informs us that a distinguished military man named Joshua once caused the sun to 'stand still.' How he did it is not mentioned. There can, of course, be no doubt of the fact that he arrested its progress, and possibly caused it to 'stand still;' but translators are not always perfectly accurate, and we are inclined to the opinion that it might hav wiggled a very little when Joshua was not looking directly at it."

The Methodist brethren who took stock in the Isabella mining swindle, managed and puffed by the clerical editors of the New York Christian Advocate, are now firm believers in the doctrin of original sin and total depravity. All new stock schemes are held in great disfavor at the Methodist headquarters. No promoter of a new mining enterprise could obtain a hearing among the dominies now, even if he should present a prospectus setting forth three-foot veins of silver covered with two-foot veins of gold, and edged with all the precious stones spoken of in the book of Revelation.

Since Lord Beaconsfield's death the rumor has been periodically and persistently started that in his last hours the great Conservativ leader requested the attendance at Hughenden of a Roman Catholic priest and was received into the church. Of late this story has taken such substance, of the general gossip all through London, that Lord Rowton—Lord Beaconsfield's faithful and trusted secretary, "Monty" Corry—has deemed it necessary to giv the yarn a formal and categorical contradiction. The London correspondent of the New York World says: "I hav the best reason for declaring that there is not the slightest shadow of a foundation for the above story."

The Turkish woman is marriageable at the age of nine years, and, by Turkish law, at that age, if married, she is competent to manage her property and dispose of one-third of her fortune. The law allows her to abandon her husband's house for just cause, and will protect her in so doing. She cannot be compelled to labor for the support of her husband. On the contrary, he is compelled to support her; and it is a penal offense to insult or ill-treat her. Should he not furnish her with funds, she is authorized to borrow in his name, and even sell his property. After marriage she has the absolute control of her own property, which he cannot touch.

The following unique letter was received by a Kansas attorney, and is too good to be lost: "Several months ago I sent you an account against ——— for collection. I heard he was at work in some telegraph office in your city. Since I heard from you I see by the papers he has been 'struck by lightning' and 'is an angel now.' I know he is just as liable to be 'struck by lightning' as he was to pay his debts, and if that is a fact, and he is now engaged in pushing clouds, I am glad of it, and you need not collect it. If he is still on earth, then 'hump him;' but if he is an angel, 'giv him a rest.' He will make a good 'angel,' but he was 'never cut for a man.' He may fill the contract above, but he was a 'little off' here below. Please let me know if he is a man or an angel, and oblige your friend."

The Original Jubilee Singers, of Norfolk, Va., were arrested in New Haven, on a recent Sunday night, for singing in violation of a statute of 1786, which prohibits concerts, theatrical entertainments, etc., on the Sabbath, under a penalty of not less than $25. This is the second time the jubilee singers hav been arrested this winter for singing on Sunday nights. The audience, consisting of 700 persons, were frightened when the officers came in, and left by twos and threes when the performance was half out. Each member of the audience is liable to a fine of $4. The officers allowed the performance to conclude, and then arrested Clark Peck, owner of the house, and four male singers. City Attorney Pickett's course is much criticised, as the law is obsolete. The performance was given for the benefit of Zion Methodist Episcopal Sunday-school of that city. Bonds were furnished for each one of those arrested to appear for trial.—New York Times.

In New Brunswick, N. J., the Salvation Army made such a racket in the streets and so greatly disturbed the people in the vicinity of places where they held their meetings that their efforts had to be suppressed. The warriors who are carrying on the work of the army in the neighborhood of Christopher and Bedford streets hav become such a nuisance to the quiet residents that there is a loud call for their suppression. The opinion of many good Christians who are so liberal in their views as to welcome all proclaimers of gospel truth is that these enthusiasts do more harm than good. They hav no other idea of proclaiming the gospel than that which is associated with making a horrible noise, and with shouting "Hallelujah" in such a way as to resemble the Indian war-hoop rather than to convey the thought of praising the Almighty.

The Arkansas Traveler is responsible for the following prayer-meeting story: "Several of the brothers had related experiences highly improbable and ridiculous, but the stories were accepted as the mysterious operation of the eccentric spirit. Women shouted and were rejoiced that the truth had made itself gloriously manifest. Old man Gailsop sat for a long time in that depth of silence into which excessiv admiration frequently lowers a credulous human being. He lost sight of his religion insomuch that he resolved not to allow any of the stories to soar above his ripe invention. When his time came, he rose and said: 'Good brethren, you know that my hobnobbing with the devil was long, that he was my companion for years, and that it was only after a muscled exercise of grace that I succeeded in downing the old gentleman.' The church people looked curiously at one another and brother Gailsop continued. 'At last I concluded to make an effort. I didn't hav long to wait, for the next day, while I was down at the creek fishing, the devil came up and says he, "How are you?" "How are you?" says I. "Giv me a chaw of tobacker," says he. "Won't do it," says I. "Old fellow," says he, "we've been friends for a long time, and I hav done a great deal for you. I hav furnished you with whisky on numerous occasions, and I'll be blamed if I allow you to treat me in that way." I told him he couldn't help himself, and that I had resolved never to hav anything more to do with him. Then he hopped up, popped his heels together, and struck in. I grabbed him and we had it. First one and then another would be downed. I got in a good lick and cried "hallelujah." Then he weakened. I hallelujahed again and he sunk on his knees. Seizing this opportunity by the horns of fortune, I grabbed a rail and pounded him over the head until he begged for mercy. I let him up and he limped away, when I turned again and began to catch fish. Never saw fish bite so in my life. I couldn't pull them up fast enough, and they crawled up the line and hopped on the bank. A big turtle came along down the stream, came out, lifted me onto itself, and sailed around with me for an hour. Never had such an enjoyable ride in my life. When I got back to the place where I had been fishing I found that the fish were all gone, but when I reached home I found that they fluttered into the smoke-house, dressed, and that they had hung themselvs up, after building a fire under themselvs.' 'That will do,' said one of the preachers. 'We cannot indorse such a story, and now, brethren, I move that we take immediate steps toward expelling Mr. Gailsop from the church.' The unfortunate man was expelled at the next session of the church board, and when he was asked by a sinner why he left the religious institution, he replied: 'Well, you see, they started in one day to see who could tell the biggest lie. Well, I beat 'em; they got jealous and fired me.'"

From the Sun.

The great blue dome of the Halstead Observatory, rising boldly above the lofty walls of gray stone, which lift it out of the dust and smoke of the little town, is the most striking edifice in Princeton. It givs an air of erudition to the place. The traveler seeing it confronting him as he alights at the railroad station feels at once that he is in a university town, where the gravity of learning lends unwonted weight and dignity to all things, even to the chanticleer who, somewhat haughtily, though gravely and decorously, eyes him from a neighboring fence without indulging in any unscholarly and unmannerly crowing. One can imagin the Spaniards looking with something like awe upon the returned ships of Columbus. A great observatory seems to produce a similar effect. The magical charm of discovery hovers around it—discovery not among continents and islands on the other side of the earth, but among suns and worlds soaring in the heavens, many of which are far grander and more glorious than our own.

The new telescope which has recently been mounted in the observatory at Princeton is, with the exception of the one in Washington, the largest in this country. Its object glass lacks but one inch of being two feet in diameter, and the cigar-shaped tube of steel is about thirty feet long. It ranks with the half dozen telescopic giants which within a few years hav been placed in the hands of the astronomers of the world, but of whose astonishing achievements the public has heard but little. Sir William Herschel would hav thrown away his big reflectors in disgust if he could hav caught a glimps of the heavens through one of these telescopes. People who are not familiar with the progress of astronomy hav no notion of the work that is being done in the great observatory overlooking the battle-ground of Princeton—work that is changing the whole outlook for the human mind, putting the earth, as it were, into communication with its neighbors in the heavens, as steam engins and the telegraph have linked together the four quarters of the globe. People generally hav no conception of what modern astronomers hav achieved. Take, for instance, their studies of the planet Mars. If it were told of some ancient people, it would be set down as an idle fable, yet it is a fact that our astronomers to-day hav a more comprehensiv knowledge of the geography of Mars than anybody in the time of Columbus had of the geography of the earth. They hav made careful maps of the whole planet, filled with astonishing details, and if an astronomer were suddenly transported to Mars and set down at some given point upon its surface, he would not, by any means, feel that he was lost. Given his latitude and longitude, he would know that in a certain direction and at a distance of a certain number of miles lay the body of water named in his maps the Lake of the Sun, or Lockyer Sea, and that in another direction was the continent of Copernicus. He would know whether he was standing upon an island or the mainland, what the general shape of the land was, and which was the shortest route to the sea coast. If the inhabitants of Mars were not inclined to maritime enterprise and geographical exploration, he would be able to tell them more than they had ever known of the form and position of the lands and seas of their globe, and might, perhaps, earn a comfortable living in a strange world by opening a school for instruction in Martial geography. These same astronomers hav not only weighed the sun and discovered of what materials it is composed, but they hav also analyzed the stars and shown that in many of them the same elements exist with which we are familiar on earth. They hav proved that, so far from our sun being the only one, the universe is sprinkled with many millions of suns. They hav found that worlds and suns go through a process of development, and by looking at the spectrum of a star they can tell whether it is probably older or younger than the sun. They hav discovered suns, some larger than ours, which, grouped together in pairs and by threes and fours, are swinging around a common center. They hav found spots in the heavens that are fairly bedded and ablaze with suns. With their eyes one may look upon chaos itself, for they tell us that the so-called gaseous nebulæ are really portions of the universe which hav not yet been organized into solar systems.

In view of these facts, an account of the wonderful scenes which are opened up in the celestial spaces by the great Princeton telescope, and which are seldom enjoyed by anybody except an astronomer, must possess interest for all readers. The Princeton telescope is particularly interesting, because it is in charge of one of the foremost of living astronomers, Prof. C. A. Young, who has made some of the most important additions to astronomical science which it has received in modern times. An amateur astronomer, who recently spent an evening in the Princeton observatory, tells this story of what he saw:

"We began with Saturn. I hav often studied Saturn with a small telescope, and hav never known a person to look at that planet for the first time, even with such an instrument, without a cry of surprise and admiration. But Saturn, as shown by the Princeton telescope, was a revelation to me. Think of a globe almost 700 times as large as the earth suspended in space in the middle of three or four concentric rings, which are nearly 40,000 miles broad and more than 400,000 miles in circuit, but less than 100 miles thick, and turned edge-wise toward the planet's equator! This tremendous ringed world, together with the eight moons that revolve around it, appears to the naked eye only as a dull-looking star; but imagin it brought so near that its globe alone appears many times larger than the full moon, while all its surroundings are equally magnified, and you will hav some notion of the power of the great telescope. The question naturally arises in the mind of the observer, 'Is it possible that this marvelous planet can be inhabited?' It is easy for the imagination to picture the appearance of those rings as seen from different points on Saturn, here shining as enormous arcs of light, and there hiding the sun and burying a large portion of the planet in their shadow. There is some curious evidence tending to show that the rings are falling, or rather being drawn down toward the planet, and that in three or four centuries they will touch it and eventually fall to pieces, as it were, thus robbing the heavens of one of the strangest phenomena that man has ever looked upon. If Saturn were inhabited, what a tremendous event the destruction of the rings would be for the inhabitants to look forward to! But it seems to me that the revelations of this monster telescope show plainly enough that Saturn is not yet inhabited. Everybody knows that modern astronomers generally regard Saturn, together with Jupiter and the other larger planets, as not yet being cooled down and permanently crusted over like the earth. Geologically they are many ages younger than the earth. They are yet in a fiery and perhaps partly vaporous condition. But the effect of the mere reading of such statements bears no sort of proportion to that produced by actually looking upon a world which has not yet cooled down. Saturn's future oceans are suspended as mighty clouds in its atmosphere, tossing and heaving with a motion that is all but perceptible in the telescope. I was not fortunate enough to witness anything of the kind, but at times great telescopes hav shown the distortions in the planet's outline produced by the heaving of the vast sea of vapor surrounding it. Its future continents, yet burning hot, or perhaps mere expanses of liquid fire, are hidden heneath a veil of steam and smoke. But when it is ready to receive and nourish living beings, what a magnificent world it will be! All the earth's fifteen hundred millions of inhabitants would hardly more than suffice to people one of its islands. 'How many millions of years,' I asked myself, 'will pass before a race resembling man begins to explore Saturn, to settle it and cultivate it, to build cities and fleets there? It would be a flight worthy of a new Dædalus to reach the rings.'

"'Look at Enceladus,' said Prof. Young.

"The remark was so pat with the line of thought I had been following that for a second I half expected to see the old Titan of that name, who made war on the gods when the earth was young, preparing to renew the fight in this new world of Saturn. But the astronomer was not talking of demi-gods, but of the little moon named Enceladus, which hovers close under the wing of the ringed planet, and is only visible with such giant telescopes as this. It is one of the eight moons that will adorn the sky for future lovers in Saturn to swear by.

"We next turned the great tube on Jupiter, a still more gigantic planet than Saturn, though less wonderful, because it has no rings. Here I saw another world in its fire age. But there are indications that Jupiter, geologically considered, is older than Saturn; that is to say, further advanced toward the condition in which the earth now is. This conclusion, I think, is warranted by the appearance of Jupiter's surface, which contains many more conspicuous markings and spots than are seen on Saturn, and some of these spots remain almost unchanged for years. An ordinary telescope generally shows only two dark belts running along on each side of the planet's equator, a few spots, and the bluish tinge of the surface around the poles. The Princeton telescope shows that the whole huge ball is covered, and, in the neighborhood of the equator, crowded with belts, spots, and streaks. Jupiter's atmosphere, like Saturn's, is filled with clouds which present a most picturesque appearance. I regretted very much that the famous red spot which appeared on Jupiter in the summer of 1878 has faded almost to invisibility within a few months. This giant telescope would, perhaps, hav thrown some light upon the nature of the spot. But I saw enough to convince me that Jupiter has not yet developed into a habitable globe. With Saturn, Uranus, and Neptune, it forms a family of giant worlds which will in time bloom with life. That will be the age of great worlds, as this is the age of little worlds. Life will there, perhaps, assume forms of which we hav never dreamed,

"When the old hulk we tread shall be a wreck,
A slag, a cinder, drifting through the sky,
Without its crew of fools."

"Irrespectiv of the suggestions which it conveyed, Jupiter was a superb object, worth a long journey and the loss of a whole night's sleep to see. It hung before the eye, an enormous globe—not a flat disk, but round and full, and perceptibly bulged in the equatorial region through the effect of its rapid rotation. It was like taking a station off in space and watching the earth rotate, only Jupiter rotates much faster than the earth. In an hour you could plainly perceive how the greater planet had rolled on its axis, spots that had been near the edge being advanced toward the center, while new spots had come into sight along the edge of the ball. The shades, tints, and markings on the huge globe were indescribable. On each side of the equator was a great belt, the northernmost one being a pinkish red, while the southern belt was grayish. A delicate shade of pink was the prevailing color on both sides of the equator, and this beautiful background was diversified with light and dark spots and streaks. Rows of spots resembling the snowy white "thunderheads" that are often seen poking above the horizon as the advance guard of a summer storm flecked the surface in some places. A man must be destitute of all power of imagination not to see in some of these spots unmistakable clouds, and in the darker spots adjoining them the shadows which they cast. Beyond the irregular main belts which seemed to border the equatorial regions were other belts and spots without number running far up toward each pole, but around the poles the surface was shadowed with a tint recalling the lighter shades of a fine steel engraving. At times, when the air was particularly steady, all the delicate details of the planet's surface came out exquisitly defined. Once Prof. Young put on a magnifying power of 1,440 diameters, which means that the surface of the planet was magnified more than two million times! The atmosphere was not steady enough to giv good definition with such a power, but the gigantic and startling appearance of the planet; distorted and blurred by the tremendous magnifying, as it seemed to the observer (by the unsteadiness of the air, in fact), and the flickering forms of the belts and spots showing dimly like huge shadows, made a sight that I shall never forget.

"Below the well-known Belt of Orion everybody who watches the brilliant skies of our winter nights, must hav noticed a hazy-looking star. It is the famous Great Nebula. Very little telescopic power is required to show it as a luminous cloud through which stars are shining. But it is difficult to convey to one who has not beheld it with his own eyes an idea of the magnificent appearance of this nebula when seen with such a telescope as that at Princeton. The whole field of view, with the higher powers, is filled with a shining green haze broken up into flocculent masses, delicate clouds of light, sprays, and wisps. It is sprinkled with stars which glitter like diamonds in a bride's veil. It looks as though you could scatter it with a breath, but it fills a space, in comparison with which the solar system is a mere point. Many astronomers believe it consists of the stuff of which suns and worlds are made, and some think appearances can be detected in it which indicate that it is at this moment being molded into suns. One of the triumphs achieved by the late Henry Draper was the photographing of this nebula, and his photographs may enable future astronomers to determin just what changes are taking place, and whether in this strange object we really do behold the slow development of a new domain of solar systems. There is a black gap at one point in the nebula, and in this gap shine the four stars constituting the well-known trapezium. There are two other stars near these which small telescopes do not show. This is the central point of interest in the nebula. It seems clear that those stars are not there by accident, but that there is real connection between them and the nebula. They appear, as Prof. Young remarked, to be feeding upon the nebula.

"From the Great Nebula we turned to Sirius, or the Dog Star, the brightest of all the stars. It is easy to believe that the stars are suns when one looks at Sirius through a two-foot object-glass. It dazzles the eye like ten thousand stars combined into one. Yet a man must hav faith in mathematics to believe that Sirius is a sun at least a thousand times as great as our sun. If the earth were as near to Sirius as it is to the sun it would be burnt to a cinder in a moment. But, to me, the most interesting thing about this great star was its mysterious companion, the discovery of whose existence is one of the triumphs of modern telescopes. There it shone with a dull, pale, ghostly light, almost hidden in the overpowering rays of the star. In bulk it almost equals Sirius himself, and they swing around one another like two giants who hav grappled upon an icy footing. Prof. Young says the companion is rapidly approaching Sirius. But what is it? We can hardly call it a sun, for it has not the light of a sun. It may be the ember of a sun that is dying out. It may be one of those strange dark bodies with which space, it is believed, abounds, and which, having fallen within the attraction of Sirius, is dogging it through the sky. You know that the stars are all in motion—Sirius, as the spectroscope shows, is moving away from us at the rate of twenty miles a second—so that it is easy to conceive that the star may hav come across its dusky companion in this way. The laws of gravitation will never let them part, though the distance between them may vary; and so the greatest sun of which we hav any knowledge must go swinging through space with its skeleton comrade, until it itself becomes cold and dark. The greatest interest for us in all this lies in the possibility that our own sun may at some time, as it journeys on, fall within the attraction of one of these dark cosmical bodies and so come to hav a companion like Sirius. The disturbing force of a body, having a mass equal to or greater than that of the sun, and brought into the neighborhood of the solar system, would produce changes in the motions of the planets which might render the earth uninhabitable.

"I cannot stop to tell of what else the great telescope shows in the star depths; how it reveals shining beds of stars in the Milky Way; how, when turned upon a nebulous speck, it sometimes shows the astonished observer a veritable ball of stars, an innumerable multitude collected into a globular cluster, and at other times reveals thousands of stars arranged in spraying lines, and spirals, and all odd shapes. When I visited the observatory, the moon was not in a favorable phase for telescopic study, but I know what the big telescope would do with the moon. It would reveal the ragged mountains and craters, the tablelands, like those splendid ones surrounding the Bay of Rainbows, the peaks, and the old ocean beds with a distinctness that would make the startled observer fancy some supernatural power had suspended him directly above that old worn-out world preparatory to letting him drop down to perish in one of its airless and waterless wildernesses, or to be battered and crushed in the rocky bottom of one of its extinct craters. If I had such a telescope, I fear, though bound to this terrestrial dust-mote, I should spend my life in other, grander worlds."

John the Baptist a Myth.

"The Prophet of Nazareth," a learned and elaborate work of 650 closely-printed pages, was published in London in 1864 by the author, E. P. Meredith. We procured a copy in 1872 and read it. From 1874 to 1879, while making studious researches on the question of a mythical Jesus, we never once consulted this book, which assumed the historical existence of the gospel Jesus; and we had entirely forgotten that in a note of great length the author had proved that the paragraph in Josephus concerning John the Baptist (Ant. xviii, 5, § 2) is a clumsy forgery; and that the John of the gospels is probably a myth founded on pre-existing tales regarding John, the founder of the Hemero-baptists.

The principal reasons for rejecting the paragraph in Josephus are these:

1. It is entirely at variance with the gospel story. Herod Antipas imprisons John and puts him to death because he fears his influence over the people to excite them to rebellion. But in the gospels Herod imprisons John for reproving him because he had taken his brother's—Herod Philip's—wife; and he beheads him with sorrow to fulfil a promis made to his new wife's daughter.

2. The paragraph in Josephus is introduced abruptly, breaking the narrativ in a much more decided manner than the passage about Jesus. The preceding section ends with the statement that Tiberius ordered Vitellius to take Aretas dead or alive. The succeeding section begins with these words: "So Vitellius prepared to make war with Aretas."

3. The interpolated section is grossly tautological and otherwise clumsy and inelegant in style, unlike that of Josephus, and very much like the forged passage about Jesus.

4. It is very unlikely that Josephus would speak in such high terms of John, who, according to the gospel account, bitterly assailed the Pharisees, Josephus himself being a Pharisee.

5. Josephus was only about 38 years younger than John, according to gospel chronology. He had just described the leading sects of Jews then existing, in which he mentions neither John nor his followers.

6. Herod imprisons John in the citadel of Macherus, which was not only outside his own tetrarchy (Perea and Galilee), but was not within the Roman domain. The castle was in the possession of Aretas, king of Arabia, where Herod had no power.

7. Herod's lawful wife had gone to the same castle as soon as she knew of her husband's intention to take his brother's wife, whereupon war was declared between Aretas and Herod. How could Herod send John to a prison in the possession of his enemy, a hundred miles from the capital of Galilee?

8. The passage in Josephus is first mentioned by Origen in the third century.

9. No pagan writer mentions John before the third century.

10. There is a suspicion of a suppression by the early fathers of accounts of the real John and the real Jesus. Eusebius adverts to the alleged testimony of Josephus concerning John, and then gives the whole of the passage concerning Jesus, which is its earliest appearance, so far as we know. He than remarks:

"These things having been recorded in the writings of a historian who sprang from the Hebrews themselvs, regarding John the Baptist and our savior, can there be any further means of escape from conviction for those impudent persons who fabricated memorials concerning them?

What memorials? Justin Martyr, nearly 200 years before, frequently quoted from what he called "memorials," or "memoirs," which he said were composed by the apostles and called gospels. The Upomnemata which Eusebius denounces as forgeries are apparently the Apomnemoneumata, or "Memoirs of the Apostles," from which Justin derived all he knew about Jesus Christ.

But now let us see what Origen, midway between Justin and Eusebius, says about John the Baptist:

"I would say to Celsus, who represents the Jew as accepting somehow John as a Baptist, who baptized Jesus, that the existence of John the Baptist baptizing for the remission of sins is related by one who lived no great length of time after John and Jesus. For in the 18th book of his 'Antiquities of the Jews' Josephus bears witness to John as having been a Baptist, and as promising purification in those who underwent the rite. Now, this writer, although not believing in Jesus as the Christ, in seeking after the cause of the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple, whereas he ought to hav said that the conspiracy against Jesus was the cause of these calamities befalling the people, since they put to death Christ, who was a prophet, says nevertheless—being, although against his will, not far from the truth—that these disasters happened to the Jews as a punishment for the death of James the Just, who was a brother of Jesus, called Christ" (Agt. Celsus, i, 47).

In the above passage Origen has either made a singular blunder, or falsified the text of Josephus—perhaps both. The Jewish historian nowhere says that these calamities befell the Jews as a punishment for the death of James. And though he describes James as the brother of Jesus (both very common names), the best Christian authorities, from Dr. Lardner to the Rev. S. Baring-Gould, reject the additional words, "who was called Christ," as an early interpolation. Perhaps Origen did it.

The other passage about the crucifixion of Christ by Pilate (Ant. xviii, 3, § 3) did not exist in Origen's time, and it is suspected that Eusebius forged it A.D. 325.

John the Baptist, therefore, so far as he is said to hav existed in the reign of Tiberius, is undoubtedly a myth, though such a person may hav lived a hundred years before.

As to the death of James about A.D. 62, described by Josephus, Dr. Lardner says that this manner of the death of James, the Lord's brother, was unknown to the early Christians. And Dr. Whiston, in a note on the passage, says it cannot refer to James the Just.

And yet, in a very recent work on early Christianity, extensivly advertised in Infidel papers, the author quotes the passage in Josephus about the death of James, "the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ," as reliable testimony to the historical existence of Jesus Christ, and says: "We hav no good reason for doubting the authenticity of this passage!"

P.S.—Since writing the above we hav found an eminent Christian authority, more than 228 years old, for rejecting this passage in Josephus concerning John, as spurious. David Blondel was a French Protestant divine and writer, who died in 1655. In "A Treatis on the Sibyls," translated and published in English in 1761, he givs reasons for rejecting as an interpolation, not only the passage concerning Jesus Christ, but also this one about John the Baptist.

ANTICHRIST.

Infidel Philosophy.

"With God all things are possible." Thousands of times this sentence has been read without a challenge. Words could scarcely be made to express a greater absurdity. There are impossibilities for gods as well as men. All things are possible which can be accomplished without a violation of the laws of nature. All other things are just as impossible for gods as for men. If, as the Christians claim, these laws were established by the fiat of God, how can they be changed and their author remain unchangeable. The laws of nature will ever remain the same, God or no God. The product of ten multiplied by ten is one hundred, and all the gods known or unknown can make it neither less nor more.

This was just as true when the world was in its infancy as it is to-day. Strike the earth and the entire solar system out of existence (were it possible) and the relation of numbers would remain the same. The laws of nature were never created, and never can be abrogated. They are inseparably connected with matter and can no more be annihilated than matter itself. Gods are as impotent as men. God cannot annihilate space, nor fix a boundary thereto. Though all the gods imaginable should declare that time should be no more, simple duration would remain, even if there were no means of dividing it into periods. Notwithstanding all that has been said and written about the six days of creation, God cannot create one particle of matter, nor annihilate it. He cannot create a square globe nor send a three-cornered planet whirling through space. The same law that rounds a drop of water, or a shot which falls from a tower, fashions a world. All suns, planets, and satellites, as far as we know, are globular. And it is not impossible that other worlds at this time are in nature's great lathe, being rounded by the same tools which fashioned ours. Away out in the illimitable ocean of space, among the continents and islands of stars, if other worlds are being formed, the same laws which inhere in matter here will govern matter there. God Almighty himself, with all the little gods to help him, can neither alter nor abolish them. And any man who agrees to believe that God put the brakes on the solar system in order to giv a bloody old land-shark more time to cut the throats of his fellow-men makes a fool's bargain. And all the miracles recorded in the Bible, of men being brought to life after they had once died, and of a God being born of a woman, and of books being written by God, are a disgrace to any student of science who pretends to believe them. God cannot perform impossibilities any more than man can. He can't make two hills without a valley; he can't prevent water seeking its level; he can make but one center to a circle; he can't shorten a thousand years to a second; he can't make a clock strike less than one; he can't make two parallel lines meet; he can't make the diameter as great as the circumference; he can't make a child as old as its mother.

"Beyond the bounds of time and space
Look forward to that heavenly place,
The saint's secure abode."

If that is where heaven is located he can't change it nor make it possible for any human being ever to get there.

"Of God above or man below
What can we reason but from what we know?"

Since we hav no knowledge of God, and no means of obtaining knowledge, all time spent in trying to investigate will be lost. Better solve all the problems of earth before we push our investigations into the regions of the unknowable. Every new truth discovered is a step gained for humanity; but all that has ever been said or written about God has never benefited mankind one iota. So far as we know, man is the supreme being. The object of all our investigations should be his advancement and betterment. We cannot help God by trying to find him out, and all the time this spirit is misapplied, because every attempt must end in failure. I would rather attempt to explore every mile of the ocean, or giv all the coveted information in regard to the regions of the North Pole—I would rather undertake to solve any problem pertaining to earth or the solar system which to-day lies beyond the reach of human ken, than to attempt to giv any information about God. It is possible that every thing which lies within the realms of the natural may yet be grasped by the human intellect, but who shall tell us about God? The intelligent inquirer knows full well that, push his investigations as far as he may, make it the theme of study as long as he livs, he can find out nothing. The weak and the wise must ever remain alike ignorant. Then why strain our eyes to see the invisible—why attempt to analyze something which givs no answer to any test which human knowledge can apply? There is neither color, weight, sound, scent, texture, nor anything we can touch, taste, smell, see, hear, measure, weigh, or take cognizance of. There is not a man in the world who can tell us how or when to take the first step to find out God? Can we do God or the human family any good by trying to investigate that which it is not given for man to know? Three thousand years ago men talked about the unknown God. To-day they talk about the unknowable. The investigation of three thousand years has given us no light. The search after God will prove as fruitless as a search after the boundary of space. Mathematical science will fail us, chemistry will apply her tests in vain, philosophy and reason cannot assist us.

The Christian thinks we ought to reverence and adore his God. To speak irreverently or lightly of his Great Almighty Nothing is a great crime. Even some professed Liberals think we ought to show him some respect out of regard for the feelings of the pious devotee, who prefers the position of a crouching slave to the erect, bold, and independent attitude of a man. Now I believe that ridicule should be turned upon things which in themselvs are ridiculous. For this reason I think Bennett's "Open Lettter to Jesus Christ" is one of the best things I ever saw, because his ridicule was turned in the right direction and was properly applied. How ridiculous the idea of an omnipotent God being baffled by a few iron chariots! What better can we do than to aim our shafts of ridicule at an unchangeable God who repents, and gets mad and swears in his wrath? Pretty business it was for a God to be putting lying spirits into the mouths of his prophets. Fine time he had, sailing around for millions and trillions of years through nothing before he made the world. Wonder if he got mad because he had no place to go to. If he did get mad, what was there for him to deal out his curses upon? Why didn't he trot out his savior earlier and not allow millions of people to be damned without remedy, or did it take just so long for his wrath to cool off? Then think of a little God being born in Palestine. Wouldn't a little god in diapers excite our curiosity to-day? Such a show would attract a greater crowd than old Jumbo. Who can help but laugh at the idea of a mother trotting a little God on her knee to start the wind off his stomach? Wonder if it was ever troubled with worms. Christian, did you ever think how your little God suffered with belly-ache, and how far that poor mother had to go to find catnip? Palestine is an awful barren country. To treat such subjects with seriousness does not betoken a deep mind. Besides, it has a tendency to bolster up a Christian bigot in his bigotry. Ridicule is often a more effectual weapon than reason. If the shafts of ridicule may not legitimately be leveled at these Christian fallacies, then it is unlawful to ridicule the ridiculous. These things are worthy only of the scorn and contempt of thinking minds. He who enters into serious argument with a man who believes in a flat earth, the six days of creation, the fall of man, and the great plan of salvation, is not entitled to respect. A thousand years ago it might hav been excusable; to-day the old fossil who still believes in these old exploded notions should be made the butt of ridicule, and his babbling cannot be as effectually stopped by any other means. It is a mark of wisdom to deal with a fool according to his folly. JOHN PECK.

Naples, N. Y.

Peck's Infidel Philosophy.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In an article by Mr. Peck which appeared in your issue of January 27th he takes occasion to handle the church and ministry in a manner quite damaging to them, if true, and, if not true, quite against him and Freethought generally. His article is based on the assumption that what they preach is untrue—a statement that Freethought does not accept to the extent he teaches. That the church through which they work is an expensiv non-essential in human affairs is an assertion equally subject to criticism in view of the work it has done for man.

As to its expensivness, and how it might be appropriated to purposes he names, comes from us with bad grace. When we who profess greater freedom of thought and purer ambition for the welfare of mankind shall hav done as much, then, and not till then, will we be in position to consistently complain of expense.

When we shall hav so far felt man's need as to make sacrifice for his comfort, and the culture of his mind our delight, in the establishing of hospitals for him in his weakness and colleges for his intellectual development, then, and not till then, can we consistently assail those institutions that hav done this work. When we shall hav so far advanced in social reform as to be able to rid ourselvs of the excrescences of evil to the extent that religion has, and develop a class of men as intellectually strong and socially pure as the average Christian college professor and minister, then will be time for us to lay claim to be advanced agents in social science. There are some things in connection with the present system of the Christian religion that we are forced to admit are worthy of praise, and are a rebuke to us with our opposing, rather than aggressiv, policy. Look at their educational system, from the common school (a child of their thought) to the thousand colleges, the result of their effort and sacrifice. Look at their system of spreading the views they hold as being of divine origin; the churches built, the dangers incurred, the perseverance they manifest in spite of all opposition.

Look at their Sunday-schools with their millions of scholars and libraries, all tending to make the children what their parents hav been, only stronger physically and intellectually, and purer morally. And we, who claim to be so much farther advanced in thought, sitting idly by, or meeting in convention to criticise those who show by their actions a superiority of faith in their principles, are too much like "the dog in the manger" attitude. "Honor to whom honor is due." As to the expense these churches and ministers bring, we must remember that the expense is borne by themselvs; except it be in the way of exemption from taxes. Among the churches there is a division of sentiment as to the right or policy the church has or is pursuing to accept of this exemption. But let us, who hav no organization for charitable purposes, or system, or college for ethical teaching, be slow to find fault because a few mills a year are required of us, indirectly, to sustain these institutions; but rather let it stimulate us to outdo them in this regard, and thus share with them the benefits of this non-taxation.

As to the comparison of expenses, we are forced to blush for society outside of these institutions. How much hav we raised, and what proportion has been used to aid man toward freedom and right? Our dogs cost us more than our ministers. Our saloons, if closed, would giv us an educated teacher for every family. Our lawyers are secured and aided by law more than the churches and priests, and cost us perhaps three times what our preachers do. Physicians are educated by the state, and are sent out to play upon our fears and income.

These two honorable professions contain men no more moral than our ministers, and hence no more truthful. The lawyer says we hav a case when we hav not. It involves us in a law suit in which we are the cow, securing our own feed, and he the milkman. Our physician says he can help us and commences at our head in experiment, and goes to our toes; by that time we are better, nature having aided us through rest and quiet.

Yet who would want to do away with our lawyers and physicians because, forsooth, they bleed us once in a while? Your paper is going into our homes. Our children see such articles as this we take occasion to criticise. They naturally inquire, If this be true, why are these men respected and admitted into our homes, where they come as welcomed guests?

They must come to no other conclusion than that father's TRUTH SEEKER is a truth hider.

Not in a spirit of enmity, but for the sake of truth, which we are seeking in all ways, do we thus take exception to our friend in his assaults, which we think cannot be sustained from a standpoint of truth. Let the fittest survive. L. H. TOWN.

Breckenridge, Mich.

MR. PECK.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: My attention has been called to an article by Mr. L. H. Town, of Michigan, in which he criticises an article under the head of "Infidel Philosophy" published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 27th, which I think proper to notice.

Now, Mr. Town, there are only a few points in your article which I care to notice; the rest I pass by; the game is not worth the ammunition.

In the first place, the church seems to be your special pet ("in view of the work it has done for man"), and you intimate that my remarks in regard to it and the ministry are not true. If I failed in anything, it was in not painting them in all of their hideous deformity.

You are not posted in regard to what the church has done. It has done a thousand times more for man than you hav dreamed of in your philosophy. For the benefit of yourself and those you represent allow me to giv you a few illustrations, and when I get through, you will not only think that my former remarks are true, but that they are very tame and come far short of the whole truth.

In the first place, Constantine, the old bell-wether of the church, murdered his father-in-law, strangled his brother-in-law, cut the throat of his nephew, beheaded his son, and smothered his wife—a good start for Christianity and the Christian church.

It was at the bidding of the church that the Waldenses and Albigenses were persecuted. Hundreds were roasted alive and otherwise tortured in the most brutal manner. Their ears were cut off, their noses slit, their eyes dug out; in every way their bodies were mangled; women, after being stripped, clasped their babes in their naked arms and leaped into the flames rather than be thrown in by their Christian enemies. Splendid work for the church!

The Crusades—a holy war which lasted nearly three hundred years, and left millions of human bones to bleach unburied, and shed blood enough to fill a canal from the north of Europe to the Holy Land—must also be placed to the credit of the church.

The history of your own country will inform you of women being whipped upon their naked backs and then dragged at the tail end of carts through the public places. Need I tell you about hanging witches, banishing Quakers, and putting heretics to death? All this has been done in your own country by the church for opinion's sake.

If I should attempt to tell you about all the cruelties, outrages, and murders perpetrated by the church this article would fill an entire number of THE TRUTH SEEKER. A large volume would afford room for a few only of the bloodiest chapters. But I hav given sufficient to enlighten your mind in regard to the humane character of the church.

The dragon's egg of persecution was laid in the church and hatched out by the priesthood, and the monster can be tracked down through the centuries by mangled human carcasses. Thousands hav been crushed beneath its feet. The groans of dying heretics hav been sweetest music in its ears; bloody arms and legs are yet dangling from its ponderous jaws. And you are complaining of the Freethinkers because they refuse to giv it quarter.

You speak of the "hospitals which the church has built for man in his weakness." Be it known to you that the church has never built hospitals enough to hold its murdered victims if they were packed like sardines in a box.

You convey the idea that religion (I suppose you mean the Christian religion) has developed a class of men intellectually stronger and morally purer than has ever been found among Freethinkers. You intimate that our best men will not compare even with the average Christian college professor and minister. Now I would like to hav you refer me to an "average Christian college professor" with a brighter, cleaner record than Abraham Lincoln. I would like to hav you point to a minister who outranks Thomas Jefferson, either socially, morally, or intellectually. We are perfectly willing to compare such men as Darwin, Draper, Huxley, Spencer, Emerson, Longfellow, Parker, Phillips, and a long list of other illustrious names, with the best men in the church, or even the very best it ever did produce.

Did you ever stop to think how many Christians and how few Infidels are in the prisons and penitentiaries, and what a large proportion of ministers are accommodated with quarters in these institutions? How many Christians hav you known to be sent from the gallows directly to heaven?

Nearly every one who performs these fantastic tricks at the end of a rope receives a through ticket from the hand of a minister before he starts. In Pennsylvania a full dozen were started in one day from the scaffold on the highway of holiness, each accompanied by a priest, each sure of heaven, and each educated in your Christian school.

Are the most Christian countries the most advanced intellectually and morally? Rome is the most Christian city in the world. Yet for idleness, ignorance, perfidy, drunkenness, and mendacity, it has no equal on the face of the globe.

Spain and Portugal, two of the most Christian nations, are most held in contempt by nations most advanced in civilization. They persecuted and murdered their noblest and boldest thinkers, and bred from the pap suckers of the church until they hav become the scorn and contempt of enlightened men.

"Look at their" (the Christians') "educational system." And with all the Gods, and churches, and ministers to help you, I ask you to look at it. Do you know what you are talking about? Do you know that our "educational system" has flourished only as the church and the priesthood hav been beaten back? Do you know that science has ever been the deadly foe of the church? Do you know that the grandest models in history, in philosophy, in poetry, in art, and oratory, hav come down to us from pagan Greece and Rome? Certainly great men can be produced outside of Christian churches or Christian schools.

Do you know that as Christianity arose science and literature and the fine arts declined? Do you know that the darkest day the world ever saw was when Christianity had everything its own way? The church in hunting down heresy murdered some of the grandest men who ever lived, and destroyed some of the finest libraries in the world, so as to nearly sever the chain connecting modern with ancient times? The church has ever shown itself to be the inveterate enemy of letters. As it gained power the institutions of learning went down, until there was not one out of a hundred who could either read or write. This midnight darkness lasted over a thousand years. Bear in mind, during this long, dark, bloody period the church bore undisputed sway; scientific men were hunted down with the ferocity of a tiger; it was lawful to cut the throats of Infidels wherever found.

Let me call your attention to the manner in which the church has treated science and scientific men. It pursued Galileo with the malice of a fiend even in his old age. Poor Bruno was burnt alive; and what offense were they guilty of? Teaching astronomy and other sciences—nothing else. Guttenberg, who invented the art of printing, was declared to be in league with the devil. Chemistry was called the mysterious black act which had some connection with the infernal region. Astronomy, chemistry, geology, the printing-press, the steam engin, in short, whatever has had a tendency to benefit human kind, has been compelled to hav a hand-to-hand struggle with the church before its blessings could be enjoyed by the masses.

It is not necessary for me to go into particulars. When I show you that the church has opposed nearly every improvement calculated to bless mankind, and that the masses hav been plundered and tortured and murdered by a designing priesthood, I hav covered the whole ground of your argument. Moreover, it shows the inhumanity of compelling the people to pay taxes on church property which you claim is only a few mills for each individual. Do you know that church corporations are among the richest in the world? Do you know that church edifices hav cost more sweat and treasure than any other class of buildings ever erected? Look at the huge piles both in this country and in the old; do you think the taxes only amount to a few mills? Why should I be compelled to pay a lot of lazy chaplains who officiate in the army and navy, in legislatures and prisons? They hav no interest in my welfare, and I hav no interest in their prayers.

You say, "If our saloons were closed it would giv us an educated teacher in every family." No doubt you think about the temperance cause as you do about "their system of education," that it is "the child of the church." Nothing could be farther from the truth. The first temperance reformers were denounced by the church as the teachers of science were. It was the practice of the early ministers in this country to take a part of their pay in grain, and hav it distilled and then sell the whisky. Ministers hav been carried out of the pulpit too drunk to preach, and it was considered no crime by the church; no charges were preferred. So with nearly every reform; it has been compelled to run the gauntlet of the priesthood before it succeeded. When every church door in Boston was closed against William Lloyd Garrison, Abner Kneeland, whom the Christians imprisoned on the unmeaning charge of blasphemy, opened his hall to him, while a Christian mob sought to take his life.

Now, Mr. Town, before we part I am going to strip off your mask and show up the true inwardness of your article. In the first place, it was written in the interest of the church, and when you pretend that it was written in the interest of Freethought you are playing double. By your telling what "Freethought cannot accept" one would be led to think that you are the exponent of Freethought.

If you are as ignorant of church history as your article would indicate, I pity you. If you are trying to conceal its atrocities, I despise you. Next time you attempt to criticise a Liberal, I advise you to do it like an honest Christian, and not pretend to be what you are not. You are too tender-footed for a Freethinker, and know full enough for a Christian; and the sooner you join the church and get washed in the blood of the lamb, the better. Freethought conventions seem to gravel your kidneys terribly, while the church and the Sunday-school and ministry with you are all right. I never attended a Freethought convention outside of my own state; but here they are represented by such men as Wakeman, Ingersoll, Chainey, Leland, Bradford, Green, Palmer, Putnam, and others, men who tower as far above your "average college professor and minister" as the eagles soar above the bat and the owl.

And yet you compare these men to dogs in the manger, while the ministers are "ever welcome guests at your house." Get out of our camp, or you will be hanged as a spy. Hie away to your own Christian quarters, and ask your minister to forgiv you. "Honor to whom honor is due." Good-bye, Mr. Town. JOHN PECK.

In Answer to Dr. Dix.

About 175 persons assembled last Sunday evening in Frobisher's Hall, at 23 East Fourteenth street, to listen to Mrs. Lillie Devereux Blake's reply to the Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix's lectures on the duties of woman in society. Mrs. Blake said that, as Dr. Dix's three lectures had been founded mainly on two dogmas, his position could be overthrown by disproving their truth. One dogma was that, as women owe everything to the church, therefore they ought to be willing to spend their lives in upholding it. "It is amazing," said Mrs. Blake, "that a man of Dr. Dix's culture and learning should hav made such an assertion. It might better hav come from the lips of the Rev. John Jasper, of Richmond, Va., who said, 'The sun do move.' History teaches us better, for women are now more under the dominion of men than they were 4,000 years ago in pagan Egypt, where the sexes were absolutely equal, socially and politically and in religious life. In ancient Rome, in the time of the empire, too, women by their own endeavors gained their liberty. From the doctrin of celibacy of the priesthood came the degradation of women, which is felt to this day. It is that doctrin which the reverend gentleman preached and practiced. It is the bane of virtue. Every instinct of home life is struck down by it, and woman is made the slave of man.

"The other dogma is that by the sin of Eve all womanhood was afterward disgraced. That dogma is founded on the priest's interpretation of the account of the fall of man in the first chapter of Genesis. According to a woman's interpretation, Adam recognized his inferiority to the woman when he said that the man should leave father and mother and cleave to the wife; not that the woman should leave father and mother and cleave to the husband. Men stand in a very poor light in the account of the fall in Eden. Eve fell first because she wanted wisdom, but how did Adam behave? She offered him the apple and he took it. Did he assume the leadership on account of any supposed manly prerogativ? This monstrous doctrin has been iterated and reiterated from the days of Moses to those of the Rev. Dr. Dix."

Mrs. Blake said it was through the Rev. Dr. Dix's voice as chairman of the board of trustees of Columbia College that woman were kept out of the college class rooms. "Behind the ramparts of the college," she said, "stands this respectable relic of the middle ages. But as the walls of Jericho fell, so will the college walls fall down before the trumpet blast of progress. The Rev. Dr. Dix says the sexes will be thrown together. Shocking thought! One would suppose they did not meet each other now. What does he offer? He tells us women to go to church and listen to the singing of the 'Magnificat.' The language of that chant does away with the independence of woman. It says: 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord; do with her as thou wilt.' There is a greater word than 'Magnificat'—it is Liberty. It means not to sit and work altar cloths and listen to the 'Magnificat,' but to labor first for your children, then for your friends, and finally for the state."

Another Church Swindle.

SEVEN HUNDRED POOR FEMALE MILL OPERATIVS ROBBED BY PIOUS CATHOLIC PRIESTS.

The Archbishop Purcell affair has been imitated in Lawrence, Mass., by the priests stationed at that place. Dispatches of the 24th giv the following disgraceful particulars of a wholesale steal in the name of the church:

"Seven suits hav been brought against the Augustinian Society, a Catholic organization, formed here in 1870 to receive the deposits of the parishioners of the church. Attachments hav been issued for the sum of $27,000, and more are likely to follow. The society was formed by the priests, and subsequently chartered by the legislature, with authority to hold property not exceeding $200,000. Large amounts of real estate, including church property, hav been conveyed to the society from time to time. Since 1881, when Father Regan took charge of its affairs, depositors hav had difficulty in securing deposits, and several claims hav been entered against it. It has been selling real estate for some time past, and has been a large borrower of money from banks. At a meeting of depositors the latter were notified that no money was left, but that the society would endeavor to pay them at the rate of $24,000 per year. The indebtedness is placed at $500-000 to depositors, and $200,000 to mortgage-holders. The depositors number 700, a majority of them being poor female mill operativs. It is generally believed that this is the culmination of several years of a gradual depreciation of the affairs of the society. Father O'Donnell, who controled the society for some years before it was incorporated, invested largely in railroad stock, resulting in heavy losses. In addition to the poorer depositors there are several heavy deposits, from $16,900 down to $5,000. Much excitement exists, and a statement of the society's condition will probably be made at a meeting of prominent Catholics on Sunday.

"The Boston Herald says of the Augustinian Society that its actual debt is, in round numbers, $540,000. Deducting mortgages to the amount of $110,000, there remains due to the depositors $429,900. When the society was first formed Catholics began to deposit their savings with Father O'Donnell. His death occurred in 1861, and a deficit of $150,000 is said to hav existed then. The interest paid has always been large, equaling or exceeding 6 per cent, and as the deposits hav not generally been well invested, the result has been that a considerable portion of the deposits has been paid out in interest; but by far the greatest cause is found in the fact that in 1872—the society then having a debt of $150,000—it began a new church, adding to the debt $300,000, and using the money of depositors to meet this amount, with the exception of $84,000, which was raised by subscription. In addition to the burdens enumerated, there is another of large magnitude. For twenty-five years the society has maintained parochial schools at an estimated expense of $175,000, including $40,000 expended in remodeling the old church for school-rooms. To add to its load, the society, five or six years ago, accepted the charge of St. Lawrence's church, and the Church of the Immaculate Conception, which had their considerable debts.

"The clergymen now in charge make a full exhibit of the condition of the institution, and admit that the money of depositors is gone. They claim that by reducing expenses and strengthening the revenues of the church, they can eventually pay off the debt in full; but the question of interest must for some years to come be held in abeyance."

It seems that the managers of the institution hav known since 1881 that a deficit nearly as large as their capital has existed, yet they hav taken the deposits of the confiding people, knowing their insolvent condition. Poor, trusting dupes of the church hav been fleeced by these wolves without mercy. The crime is the greater that such people put more faith in the banks under the direction of "holy" men. In their ignorance they think the priests can save both their money and their souls, and blindly put their little savings into the Jesuits' capacious maws. The Japanese method of killing all officials of bursted banks, if tried in this country, would soon create a scarcity of deacons, Sunday-school superintendents, and Catholic archbishops and priests.

Who Unmasked Junius?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. Andrews's oration is full of a spirit of candor and large-hearted justice and appreciation, as well toward Paine, the American people, and Mr. Burr, as toward myself, and also toward Jesus Christ, which does him infinit credit. The only particular in which it advances views to which I cannot respond is in its implications that I ought to hav named Mr. Burr in connection with my mention of the book in which the theory that Paine was Junius was first advanced. At the time I wrote the essays on Paine and Junius I had seen nothing from Mr. Burr relating to the subject. I had then been told, or was shortly after told, that the book in question was written by a Mr. Moody, of Kansas, and that Mr. Burr had assisted in publishing it. Upon the publication of my essay Mr. Burr entered upon a series of letters to various newspapers, calling attention to the previous work, as if I had in some way made a claim of priority, whereas my own book cited the anonymous work as having already advanced arguments which I then deemed conclusiv. But in all these letters by Mr. Burr, if there has been any avowal that he wrote the book in question, it has escaped my notice. I hav only observed that he was willing to be regarded as a sponsor and friend of the book. If Mr. Burr will declare that he wrote the book, I will with great pleasure substitute such direct information from him for the indirect information received through a friend and editor of Chicago, who tells me, if I remember rightly, that Mr. Moody told him that he (Moody) was the author of the book. I will say that since the preparation of the essays in question further researches hav satisfied me that the hand of John Horne Tooke in the preparation of the Junius letters was greater than I had given him credit for in those essays, and that the handwriting of the Declaration of Independence is that of Thomas Jefferson. I was satisfied of the later fact by the publication made in Frank Leslie's the year after my essays were published of Jefferson's autograph letter presenting the writing-desk on which the Declaration was written to the city of Philadelphia or to some person there residing. This does not change my opinion that the rhetoric of the Declaration is so foreign from anything that Jefferson ever wrote, and so like Paine, as to leave the literary argument in favor of a previous draft written by Paine entirely unaffected. I hav not given the attention I would like to to Mr. Burr's later researches tending to show the publication, probably by Paine, of a series of "Crisis" papers in England, but I think they hav great value, and should be followed up by scholarly investigation. I know of no person so admirably fitted to make the researches essential to the preparation of a complete life of Paine as Mr. Parton. I wish he could be persuaded to undertake it.

Chicago, Ill., Feb. 19, 1883. V. B. DENSLOW.

Mr. Watts in Newark.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. Charles Watts, editor of the Secular Review, London, Eng., closed his fourth lecture, delivered before the Liberal League, here yesterday evening. When Mr. Watts was first introduced to my notice, through the kindness of T. B. Wakeman and Hugh Byron Brown, arrangements were at once effected to hav him entertain the Liberals of Newark, and regarding him as a comparativ stranger to our people, I took the necessary precaution to advertise his first lecture in such a way as to secure a good attendance. In this I was not disappointed, for before the opening exercises commenced we were obliged to add a number of extra seats in order to accommodate all who came.

Our League has now been in existence five years, during which time many able speakers of this country and several from abroad hav assisted us in the good work, but never within the history of our organization has any one aroused such enthusiasm or awakened such interest in the cause as did Mr. Watts upon the occasion of his first visit. From the moment this great apostle of universal liberty stepped upon the platform it was evident that we had a splendid treat in store. Mr. Watts is positivly the most forcible, eloquent, as well as the most logical, speaker ever heard in our city; and in the four lectures delivered has aided very materially in making the need for a larger and more pleasant place of meeting keenly felt by our members. A committee has been appointed to secure a new hall, and already between two and three hundred dollars hav been subscribed toward fitting it up.

I understand Mr. Watts will speak in several other cities in the United States and Canada before departing for England, and I would therefore, through the valuable columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, bespeak for him as cordial a welcome as he would be sure to receive should he visit Newark again. To such brave and able men as Mr. Watts the Liberals of the world must look, too, if they desire to hav their highest aspirations realized and bask in the golden sunshine of the brotherhood of man. JOSEPH W. FRANKEL.

Bismarck on the Strict Observance of Sunday.

From the London Standard.

On the policy of encouraging or enforcing a stricter observance of the Sunday in Germany, which is now part of the program of the German Conservativ party, Prince Bismarck recently had occasion to express his own opinions. In the course of his observations, the chancellor said: "The English and American mode of Sunday observance is a terrible form of tyranny. The first time I set foot on English soil—it was in Hull—I remember that I began whistling in the streets. 'Oh, pray do not whistle,' said an English fellow-traveler. 'Not whistle?' I asked. 'Why not? Is it prohibited?' 'No,' was the reply. 'It is not against the law, but don't you know it's the Sabbath?' I was so angry at such intolerance that I determined to leave the town at once, and I took the next steamer which conveyed me to Edinburgh."

The chancellor unfortunately omitted to mention whether he attempted to repeat the performance on a Sabbath day in the Scotch capital, or what his experiences may hav been in that case. He added: "In general, however, I am not an opponent of Sunday observance." A friend, who was present, remarked that Sunday in England was, after all, not so bad as it was often represented. He had liked it because it was quiet. It had always done him good after the bustle and hurry of the week in London.

"For my part," rejoined the chancellor, "as a landed proprietor I do all in my power to support the observance of the Sunday, but I would not hav people legally compelled to keep it rigidly. I would leave every one to prepare for a future life in his own way. But there ought to be no ordinary work on Sundays, and I think so not so much on account of the scriptural command, but because men must hav time for proper repose. To the service of the state, such as the answering of telegrams on diplomatic and other urgent affairs, this does not so strictly apply."

Communications.

What Is Prohibition?

It would not seem necessary to ask the above question at this late stage of the discussion, but Mr. Gage's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER. of Jan. 20th provokes the query.

What it is and is not may be determined before I close this article, but first I wish to say that Mr. Gage's letter is one to bring sadness to the heart of all men and women who would carry on a discussion with courtesy and good breeding. But, as I hav several times remarked, it is only natural that the apostles of force should esteem all those who cannot approve of their methods of reform as men to be browbeaten and abused as enemies of morality and good order.

This tendency crops out everywhere in George Gage's letter, though he throws a sop to me in the shape of a tribute of admiration of my conduct in the first Chicago Congress of the National Liberal League. I might say that the gentleman's praise is not so very desirable when taken in connection with some other portions of his article; but now I desire to call his attention to the glaring inconsistency manifest in his criticism of myself. With cutting sarcasm he felicitates the "saloonists, shoulder-hitters, bloodtubs," etc., upon my championship of free drink; then he turns about and praises me for favoring the repeal of the Comstock postal statutes. Can it be possible that he does not see that if the first part of his screed is anything more than mere abuse, is of any weight in the discussion, then the opponents of repeal were justified in all they said relativ to our defense of free publication and transmission? They did not slander us when they said that our constituency was composed of the venders of obscene literature, the abortionists, pimps, prostitutes, libertins, the vile and vicious of both sexes.

If Mr. Gage is right now, our enemies were right then. If his charges are legitimate now, their charges were legitimate then. If he reasons calmly and logically now, so did they then. It is amazing that he cannot see that the question now is what it was then —a question of liberty; that his insinuations are as much out of place as were those of Underwood, Spencer, Bundy, & Co.

Mr. Gage talks of "blear-eyed politicians." I pity his verdancy if he does not know the character and habits of the principal politicians who favor prohibition. If the gentleman will spend a few months in traveling over the prohibition states and familiarizing himself with the local reputation of the great political lights of prohibition, he will say nothing more like the above when referring to those who oppose his pet project.

Mr. Gage's allusion to Jesse James is exactly on a par with the Christian assumption that the act of Guiteau was the fruit of Freethought and Nihilistic teaching. Both assumptions rest upon nothing. Mr. Gage knows that no anti-prohibitionist logic involves such a deduction as Jesse James. He knows that this allusion of his is simply a begging of the question, that the whole philosophy of myself and of those who stand with me, rests upon the solid bedrock of individual rights—rights which Jesse James and his confreres held as naught.

By the way, let me call Mr. Gage's attention to the fact that the James boys were strictly temperate. To be sure it is rather hard-hearted of me to mention this fact, thus denying to the gentleman the great privilege of including them in the ranks of the "shoulder-hitters," etc., whom, with alleged wit, he congratulates upon my asserted defense of their course of life.

With a Jesuitical casuistry worthy of a father of Rome, Mr. Gage evades the point involved in my statement that not one man in five thousand people becomes a drunkard, and pathetically inquires if one "maudlin inebriate" in Iowa is to decide the question of prohibition in that state. This is one of the pet assumptions of the prohibitionists, that only "maudlin inebriates" oppose sumptuary measures. It was this falsity that I was combating. I showed that it was not an issue between the confirmed drunkards and the man of temperance—abstinence, if you will—but a question of liberty in which was involved the rights of millions who drink but never become "inebriates." I do not see how it is possible for an honest man to so dodge, and twist, and squirm, and misstate an opponent's position. The battle is not between drunkards and total abstainers, but between liberty and despotism. On each side are ranged many hard drinkers and many total abstainers. I hav seen more than one "maudlin inebriate" step up to the polls and vote for prohibition; more than one "politician" who regularly looked upon the wine when it was red giv his voice and ballot for state regulation of temperance and morality.

And Mr. Gage also well knows that I said nothing in favor of the consumption of alcoholic stimulants; but I did say that this form of intemperance is not the only crime-breeder, that avarice and jealousy, revenge and envy, ambition and malice, all combine to swell the crime list; that improper food, clothing, prenatal conditions, ill sexual relations, etc., all helped to fill our prisons and asylums, and hence that the cry that the drink habit was the chief cause of crime was simply bosh, and served to blind us to the other evils which afflict us. There was no contradiction in my various statements. The issue was this: Alcoholic intemperance is a terrible evil. You said, "Suppress the sale of intoxicants." I said, "But there are very many other perversions of natural appetites and desires which lead to crime; why not by law take from the victims all opportunity to commit these excesses? If prohibition is the proper preventativ in one case, why not in all?" I will leave our readers to judge whether or not you hav met my objection.

Mr. Gage coolly says: "The fewer there are who desire alcoholic liquors, the less number will be interfered with by prohibition. The more there are the more necessity for enforcing it, even though it does infringe upon their virtuous proclivities." Is it true, then, George Gage, that men who partake of certain fluids containing more or less of a chemical substance known as alcohol hav no rights which you are bound to respect? Is this the flower of American liberty? or is it not rather the dregs of the most odious despotism and the most insufferable insolence that ever had their origin in brains saturated with the pernicious idea that majorities hav any rights not possessed in equal degree by minorities?

The "breachy cattle" are on the one hand, the criminal invaders of the personal and property rights of others, and on the other the "moral" and prohibitory invaders of the same rights. The first class we do "confine in stanchions" sometimes, and the latter we shall restrain by so educating the people in the principles of natural right that they will keep the reins of power forever out of the hands of these moral and temperance policemen.

Slavery was born of coercion, sustained by coercion, and went down because of it; for he who takes the sword to oppress his fellow shall perish by the sword.

Prohibition has the same parentage, is sustained by the same liberty-destroying forces, and its destiny is the same—ignominious death. So much for Mr. Gage's suicidal illustrations.

My opponent says that when I deny that alcohol is valuable as a medicin I knock the last prop from under my own platform. This shows how completely he fails to sense the question at issue. The stability of my position is not at all affected, for the reason that it does not in the least degree depend upon any good qualities which may be possessed by alcohol. My position would not be affected were all true that is alleged by the prohibitionists. Mr. Gage's position is that where an article produces more harm than good it should be denied all rights on the sea of exchange. Will he tell me what good results follow the use of tobacco? And if the evil here overbalances the good, why should not the sale of that article be prohibited? I hav asked of all my opponents that they apply the principles of prohibition logic to every article used by man and to every mode of life which is productiv of evil. But they all shrink from the consequences involved in their own premises. Like all the others, Mr. Gage talk of "every other unimportant and irrelevant evil" as though the difference between the evils produced by alcoholic stimulation and all other evils is one of kind instead of being as it is one of degree only.

Let Mr. Gage answer these questions frankly and without the evasion characteristic of his present effusion. If the majority may this year rightfully proscribe the manufacture and sale of intoxicants because said majority believes them to be productiv of more harm than benefit, may not the same or another majority next year rightfully prohibit the culture, manufacture, and sale of tobacco and for the same reason? And is there any limit to the possibilities of invasion of personal rights which are thus involved in your primary assertion?

"The right of the majority to rule is inherent in our government," avers Mr. Gage. Per contra: The right of the individual to rule himself is inherent in the individual. The struggle of the present and future is between these two vitally antagonistic principles. It is a battle to the death. No compromise is possible.

The personalities contained in Mr. Gage's last paragraph but one I shall not notice further than to say that the man who makes such unfounded charges does so because of an utter lack of facts and a complete emasculation of argument. When Freethinkers cannot discuss the question of prohibition without using the language employed by Mr. Gage they had better drop the subject entirely. E. C. WALKER.

M. E. ROSE.

To THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I cannot help saying a few words upon prohibition after reading an article by Mr. Gage, in Jan. 20th, page 36 of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which is so unfair and so in style of dogmatic theology.

I can remember when the first (at least in my vicinity) organizations for temperance were started, called Sons of Temperance and Washingtonian Societies, and they did a great amount of good. They appealed directly to the reason and good sense of drinkers themselvs. They reclaimed many a one, and set them upon their feet again. Many so reclaimed became respectable citizens, and any one of sufficient age who will turn their thoughts back to those times will readily agree with me in the above declaration.

Temperance was advanced in a just and reasonable manner, and it accomplished a great amount of good. It was very seldom that a young man carried a bottle, and if he did, he forfeited his position in good society; or any one appearing among ladies at a public party intoxicated lost the respect of the fair sex. Whisky was sold everywhere, and only three cents per glass, or a quarter treated a barroom full.

Now why did not the influence of these true temperance reformers continue? I think the reason is very plain to be seen. The demagogs of a party, seeing an opportunity to secure political supremacy, conspired with the most fanatical leaders of the temperance cause, who wished to hurry up the reform by compulsion, and united, not religion with politics, but temperance with politics, where it has ever since remained—more of the demagog in it than true reform. The societies broke up, and some of the reclaimed went black to their old haunts.

Ever since there has been a strife upon the principle involved in the question, You shall not drink anything intoxicating. And the answer comes, I shall drink whatever I hav a mind to; and the liquor seller has waxed fat in the land.

The hypocrisy of a good share of these temperance howlers has placed the temperance question in about the same position the church occupies toward the people at large; and now, if I were a betting man, and both Mr. Gage's and Mr. Walker's homes were examined, I would not be afraid to wager that liquors would be found in Mr. Gage's and none in Mr. Walker's; and when Mr. Gage comes home in a cold storm, the good Mrs. Gage fixes up a nice hot sling, which he leisurely sips, quieting his conscience that it's medicin. I don't say it is so, but his mode of arguing would induce me to risk money on it if I were a betting man.

I hav taught district school a good deal, and boarded around, and hav seen the like on more than one occasion, among men who, it was thought by their profession of mouth, would rather their families and wife's relations should all die than furnish any liquor for them.

How is it now after these years of political temperance enforcement reform? I am sorry to say that at any young people's gathering in any country neighborhood that I know of, many of the young men carry bottles of liquor, and it is not frowned upon by the ladies as it should be; it is looked upon as rather smart. And that you may not think my observations are limited, I will state I hav seen the same in Iowa, Kansas, Wisconsin, Illinois, as well as in many parts of New York state. But I hear you say, "Desperate diseases require desperate remedies." That is old. The best physicians now rely more upon nature, and it is so in this case. Go back to nature. You hav been off on an experimental tour and only aggravated the case; it needs rest.

According to statistics, if I understand them, there is more liquor consumed per capita than forty or fifty years ago, when people had their liberty to use it as their judgment dictated.

The church howls over the great calamities that would befall the community if it should be "wiped out" and the people left to their own reason and general law for their guidance; but true Liberals are not afraid of anarchy and ruin if the church should "burst up" to-morrow. They hav faith in the people—their judgment and good sense; and I believe if you will stop your war upon equal rights in regard to liquor in a political, demagoguish manner, and appeal to reason in a sensible shape, that a traveler who will travel through this country ten or fifteen years hence would hardly recognize the streets for the want of saloons which now line nearly both sides of many of them.

A little corner and five dollars' worth of stock of whisky and tobacco, and the whisky and tobacco shop will support a family and lay up money if the proprietor does not guzzle up the profits himself. Why is this? I answer, Your prohibition laws. It could not hav been done forty or fifty years ago.

Mr. Gage uses the same argument that the church used which produced the "Dark Ages;" after tortures, imprisonments, confiscation, etc., they decided to kill off heretics, then they would hav only the pure stock on hand. Now are not those times known as the most corrupt and ignorant that we hav any account of? It proved that they should hav killed themselvs off, and left the proscribed stock to people the world with pure morals, honesty, and intelligence.

He says the majority has the right to rule. There he shows his narrowness. I claim the minority on any question hav rights and privileges that the majority are bound to respect, if it is the wish to hav a good government and not a tyranny. I hold that like methods will produce like results.

We are but just breaking away from arbitrary and tyrannical rulers who believed that they being in the majority had the right to even take our lives that we might not propagate our views, and to embrace a so-called reform, using the same methods, when scarcely able to stand alone, seems very inconsistent to say the least. I would throw open the door and allow any one to sell that had a mind to. The profits would cease immediately, and people, being thrown upon their own reason for a guide, would soon ignore the dram-shop, and it would cease to be respectable, not but that some liquor would still be sold, as all evils can not wholly be reformed.

We hav too many laws non-enforcible, and why are they non-enforcible? because when they come before an intelligent jury they (the jury) take a reasonable view of the matter, and discharge the case, and they become dead laws in spite of judges or lawyers, and I believe a prohibitory law would be the same, and only lead to filling the pockets of lawers and increasing the curse of taxation upon the people.

When we see petitions circulated among women and children (non-voters) to influence legislation, children not yet able to read or write, it seems there is something weak about it. I would favor any one voting, male or female, on arriving at the proper age. If I was to circulate a petition I would only accept such names as the law, if passed, would come before for enforcement.

I circulated one for the release of D. M. Bennett from an unjust law, enforced by an unjust judge, one of those majority laws, the minority having no rights or privileges. I did not accept any names but those of men and women who fully understood the case, or were able to upon an explanation of its merits, while the church, in all its immaculate purity, took the names of all Sunday-school children, Anthony Comstock traveling over the country at all such gatherings for names. How many responsible names did he hav? I don't believe one-tenth were able to understand the case. So much for such petitions.

Mr. Gage is unable to see the principle at stake, and accuses Liberals of being "beslimed over with filth of all the cess-pools and sinks of vice in the land, and the rum-holes finding champions among Liberals to do their dirty work for them." He could not see the principle involved by D. M. Bennett fighting the liberty-crushing Comstock laws, which are only another kind of prohibitory law. No; he has his hobby, and now he wants it enforced as the great panacea which will reform the world. I don't believe in hobbyites. I want general principles to govern the world, serving all alike, giving the utmost liberty to all. Why does he not say something about tobacco, or does he use it and does not want it interfered with? It is as great a curse as liquor, all things considered, and sold in the same "rum-holes," where he can get it over the same bar—he can smell the fumes of whisky and cigars together. In the above extract he uses the language that the church used toward D. M. Bennett, almost, because he fought for principle. No, Mr. Gage, you are only half a Liberal, and the rest is demagogism.

Yours for liberty and equality before all laws,
East Rodman, N.Y. M. E. Rose.

EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: There has been considerable space occupied of late in The Truth Seeker in relation to Prohibition. Mr. E. C. Walker has, I think, presented the anti-prohibition side with much force and ability, and I think his arguments are unanswerable.

In one number of The Truth Seeker is a communication from George Gage, of Osborne, Kansas, in reply to Mr. Walker. I hav read his reply in a careful and attentiv manner, and hav failed to discover any new facts bearing on the side of prohibition.

As long ago as the year 1852 the legislature of this commonwealth enacted a prohibitory law. It provided that in every city and town in the commonwealth there should be appointed one or more agents whose duty it should be to keep for sale all the various sorts of spirituous and intoxicating liquors, for medicinal and chemical purposes. The law was kept on the statute books for at least ten years, I should say. Each and every agent was to keep a record of his sales of liquors each day, specifying to whom he sold and whether for medical or chemical purposes.

After trying this law for a certain term of years (thus endeavoring to make men and women temperate by law), the legislators of the commonwealth came to the conclusion that this endeavor had proved fruitless, and the law was repealed. Since then we hav had a license law on our statute books.

I hav long since come to the conclusion—after witnessing the workings of the prohibitory enactment of 1852—that it is an utterly vain and useless undertaking to try to make people temperate by coercion; for I believe that prohibition amounts to nothing more nor less than coercion. Coercion is at war with the fundamental and underlying principles of our government. Ever since this state, Maine, Rhode Island, and all the other states that hav endeavored to make people temperate by law, hav introduced this system of legislation, the whole thing has been a failure. Where one person has been made temperate by this method, there hav been very many more who hav become the reverse. Mankind is about the same everywhere, and in our own town, where the prohibitory law was in operation, the fact was notorious that instead of making people temperate, it had quite the contrary effect. Reasoning from analogy, the fact is very apparent that in other places where the law prevailed the result was the same. "Like produces like" is a truism which we cannot evade or wink out of sight.

I am glad that Mr. Walker, in addition to his efforts in behalf of Freethought, has brought forward so many indisputable and unanswerable arguments in opposition to prohibition.

Very truly yours, Edwin H. Bartlett.

The Supremacy of Reason.

Lord Rochester said:

"Could I but choose what flesh and blood I'd wear,
I'd be a dog, a monkey, or a bear;
Or anything but that vain animal
Who is so proud of being rational."

How often hav we heard the priest say in addressing God: "What is man, that thou art mindful of him?" Mohammed said that "every man is born naturally disposed to become a Moslem; but his parents make him a Jew, a Christian, or a Magian." Since man came on the globe, the attempt of tyrants to control other men and make them subservient to their designs and purposes has caused more loss of life, bloodshed, imprisonment, and misery than all else combined. Many men abandon what little opinion or mind they once claimed to hav, rather than to endure the ignominy of being called fanatics; but the race has never been defaulted at trial; some one has always appeared in its defense.

"What is man that thou art mindful of him?" is easily answered when man is mindful of himself, recognizing the authority that is within himself as the highest. Milton said: "The mind is its own place, and in itself can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven." Who is there, or what, that can do more, or as much? The mind is the power that conceives, judges, or reasons. There can be nothing in the universe to compensate us for its loss. No words can adequately express its value; and yet how few, as compared to the whole, realize the truth of the statement! There is nothing that causes so much commiseration and pity as to hear of some one who by sickness or accident has been deprived of reason. If he was your enemy before, now you hav no invectiv for him. You feel and recognize that the manly part of the man has gone, and what a contrast is shown! The loss of anything shows its value more than its possession does. Nothing shows it more than the loss of a person's mind—his reasoning powers. What is the essential difference between a person who has been deprived of his reason, and has none to use on any subject whatever, and a person who, having his reason intact, denies himself the right to use it, and accepts conclusions and results the most momentous that can possibly be imagined? Buckle says: "Calamities may be inflicted by others, but no people can be degraded except by their own acts." It is equally true in personal affairs. While sympathizing with the first in his affliction by loss of reason, we instinctivly know that the second, by having such powers vouchsafed to him, and then by his own act giving up their use, has struck the bed-rock of degradation. There can be no lower depth. If there is an unpardonable sin, it must be this. Such instances of giving up the use of the mind and reasoning faculties on old-established traditions and theories is the rule, and they who make reason the arbiter of their belief unwaveringly trust to its decisions, and will not and cannot accept any other authority, are the exceptions. We hope to make the exceptions the rule. What an amount of time it will take, judging by what has been accomplished since time began! We shall hav time enough. Man has always in history been noted for subserviency to those in authority, especially in the church. They hear and obey the continual refrain of the preacher:

"Priests and kings are God's vicegerents;
Man must worship and obey.
Backward, ye presumptuous nations—
Back, be humble and obey!"

Everything in their life has constrained them to feel that if the authority of the priest is doubted, questioned, or examined, the wrath of a vengeful God will be their portion through the never-ending eternity. Nothing develops and strengthens like use. It is inculcated with reference to man's body; but as to the reason without which there is no man, its use is forbidden on the most important questions. We hav settled it for you; it is sacrilege to examin it. What a disinterested care they keep over the people. It is always so with tyrants; the care of the people is their cry, which is solved by caring for themselvs. What care was exercised over the colored man, keeping him in slavery because he could not take care of himself? Frederick Douglass always had one answer: "Let us alone. Giv us a chance to think and act for ourselvs, and let the law be equal over all; let us learn to do well." Tyrants and their abettors in church or state never agree to such conditions until by the force of circumstances, brought around by the persistent assaults of men with an indomitable will and great reasoning faculties—men who make the people see the great wrong that is being perpetrated—men whom laws made especially for that purpose will not constrain to stop their thoughts nor the expression of them to others, thus showing the supremacy of mind and unloosing the hold of tyranny. That which doubles up your fist is inferior to that which undoubles it; one is brute force, and the other is intellectual. Responsibility teaches as nothing else can. The mind is not taught to depend on itself. In the past these questions were asked:

What is mind? No matter.
What is matter? Never mind.
What is spirit? That is quite immaterial.

One thing is certain. It matters not what mind is or is not, if we cannot use it on all questions; and it is quite immaterial what the spirit is, if we cannot examin it to the best of our ability. Freedom of thought and opinion is never encouraged by any authorities of the world. They bend all their efforts to retain the past; they labor to perpetuate old prejudices and passions; they celebrate ancient and time-honored festivals; they use their powers striving to keep hereditary memories fresh and fragrant. On every hand are seen the results of these continued efforts. They satisfy the larger portion of the race who accept these conditions and save themselvs the trouble of solving and changing them. The salvation of the race is assured, not from celebrating the past, but because in all ages there hav been minds not satisfied with inherited wisdom, and not accepting the truth of any theory or science until proven, being altogether regardless of any sacred authority to believe what seems to them to be false. Such men hav made their marks in the world and the impression is retained; others follow in the same spirit, and we enjoy the result to-day. Without this breaking away of the mind from old-established traditions, customs, and laws, the world might as well hav retained its primitiv state, when men were naked and lived in caves; and were it not for the fact that all minds cannot be controled, it would hav remained in that state so far as the people were concerned.

Milford, Feb. 8, 1883. Charles C. Johnson.

Freemasonry.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I know of a great many Freethinkers who are Freemasons that are disgusted with the superstitions taught and perpetuated in the Masonic lodge. No true Infidel can consistently be a party to such ceromonies as are brought into requisition when the lodge is at "work." Anciently this was not the case. Masonry in its purity recognized no god but fides or fidelity. She knew no saint or Christ or Bible. When the church wielded the temporal power she forced a recognition upon every institution of man. At his birth the priest must be called in to christen. At marriage he must again be on hand or fornication commenced. At death he must hav the priest or his body is thrown to the dogs and his property confiscated. The priest must hear the confession of his wife and children, superintend the education of the young, guide and control political affairs, receive and dispense the finances. In short, the priest was the ruler of man in every relation of life. Every man or society among men must either recognize the creeds of the priest or die. Hence, the institution of Freemasonry, in response to the first great law of nature, combined herself with the Christian's God, saints, and Bible. In doing this she fitted herself exactly to the superstition and intellectual dwarfage of the dark ages. But man has been thinking. He has opened up new fields of labor and interest. With his telescope he has been to the stars. With the ship and compass he has circumnavigated the earth. With his hammer and chisel he has cut his way into the bowels of the Christian "pancake." By the discovery of the sciences, he has knocked the last prop from under theology. The church stands before men to-day without an unselfish, intelligent advocate, and must soon die for the want of brains and honesty. The best and greatest minds of the day are out of the church. Why? Because its creeds and theories are childish, foolish, impossible. Just so it is becoming with Masonry. The order is just what the church in its darkest days made it. Its creeds are too narrow for the scientific mind. Not a naturalist of our day can be made a Mason. Not a scientist can enter the lodge. Not a single one in all that grand array of names—scientists, protectionists, reformers—could hav their names enrolled upon the scrolls of Masonry. Is this "the solidarity of man," the universal brotherhood of the race? No, it is ignorance, superstition, and the worst kind of bigotry, and will do for masonry just what it is doing for the church. If the order is to be perpetuated into the distant future, it must adapt itself to progressions of the ages. It is a fact in evolution that a vegetable, animal, or institution which cannot adapt itself to the environments must get out of the way.

The Old and New Testaments Must Go Together.

The recent discussion of the Old Testament, precipitated by the startling position of Heber Newton, appears to hav subsided. It has been productiv of much good, and out of it a few things in regard to the Bible appear to hav been settled and accepted by the people. Among them are, that the Pentateuch is not the work of Moses or of any one man; that its account of creation is false; that the Jewish God should be called Yahweh—a name Dr. Stebbins, a Unitarian divine, says is as barbarous as Ojibway; that the Ten Commands are a plagiarism; that Deuteronomy was not originally one of the books of the Pentateuch, which was composed principally by Ezra and Ezekiel, and completed by Nehemiah. These facts entirely destroy the sanctity of the Old Testament, and many are willing to concede it, but they giv up none of their reverence for the New. Beecher accepts evolution and rejects hell, but still talks as though Christ was a savior, and many ministers follow his lead. But where is the consistency in this? The Old Testament rarely mentions hell, but the New preaches it all the time, and is the great authority for it. And unless the doctrin of man's total depravity as conveyed by the "fall" is accepted the very need of a savior is dispensed with, and the foundation of the whole Christian scheme falls to pieces. If the chief end of man is no longer to "glorify God and enjoy him," but to glorify Christ and "enjoy him," we want to know why. Not only without the Old Testament is the New Testament nothing, but its authorship rests upon as uncertain a basis, and its words can no more be relied upon. Christ wrote no account of himself, and those which his biographers hav written are worthless because of their unreliability. The biographers themselvs are unknown. Prof. Davidson says that the authorship of the so-called gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John is entirely unknown, and if this be so, upon what do the Christians base their claim that Christ was divine? Unless the writings are proven inspired they become immediately worthless as a revelation, and must stand for what they are, inadequate and contradictory accounts of impossible occurrences.

Again, taken by itself, the New Testament is incomplete. The Bible is a tragedy in two acts. Without the first the last is unintelligible. Unless there is something to be saved, wherefore the savior? It has always been held that unless Christ was the messiah he was nothing. The Jews reject this claim and brand him an impostor. In proving the Old Testament uninspired, Beecher and Newton and their pulpit followers hav logically done the same, although they either do not see it, or are hypocritical enough to see and yet deny it. The "simple and beautiful Christ" seems to be a back door through which theologians retreat when cornered. Though it has been shattered a thousand times, they cling to their idol still. The God of the Old Testament is a god of falsehood, of injustice, of selfishness, treacherous, passionate, and licentious, and if Jesus is of him and is his son and equal, how is it he escapes contamination? How can he be all virtue under such circumstances? In truth he is not. The Old Testament cruelty is of this world and limited, that of the New is of the next and unlimited. The Old Testament was indorsed by Christ, and if he erred in this, may he not hav erred in other statements? He appealed to it, and founded his claims to be the messiah on its statements. All of the New Testament writers acknowledged its authority, as do the orthodox creeds of to-day. How, then, can the one be thrown away and the other retained? If the two are in conflict, then both must go. The plan of throwing away the part that they dislike—hell, for instance—and holding on to that which they approve—heaven—is very bad and utterly illogical. There is as much evidence for hell as for heaven, and if the good is inspired, so is the bad.

As the inspiration of the Bible must be given up as to its physical statements, there only remains its so-called spiritual and moral teachings. Of these it may be said that all that is good is not original, and all that is original is not good. As Buckle (Hist. Civ., p. 129) says: "The system of morals propounded in the New Testament contained no maxim which had not been previously enunciated, and that some of the most beautiful paasages in the apostolic writings are quotations from pagan authors is well known to every scholar. . . . To assert that Christianity communicated to man moral truths previously unknown argues on the part of the asserter either gross ignorance or wilful fraud." There is a side to the character of Christ which has been much extolled by the church, and even thoughtless Freethinkers hav accepted the estimate without much dissent. When the glamour of reverence for deity and awe of the supernatural has been removed, when the robe that cunning has woven is torn aside, it will be found that Christ as a divine character was an impostor; as a teacher, immoral and misleading; as a man, imperfect, passionate, and cruel. Whether it was his great egotism in imagining himself the son of God, or his fanaticism that made him so, is no matter. The facts remain, if anything found in the New Testament may be considered a fact. His insolent reply to his mother; his cursing inanimate objects when displeased; his declaration that his object in coming was not peace; his fanatical command to hate father, mother, brother, and wife in order to be his disciple; his consigning to eternal torment all who refused to believe in him, when, if he was omniscient, he knew belief was not a matter of choice; his frequenting obscure places and mixing with the disreputable characters of his time—all stamp him as a petulant, unlovable man. Added to this are his trampish teachings to take no thought for the morrow, for his heavenly father would provide, when the truth is his father never did, and never has to this day, provided a single loaf of bread for the hungry; his tyrannical command to bring hither "mine enemies" to "slay before me," and the utter absence in his preaching of any inborn love of liberty, or protestation against slavery. The whole burden of his mission was that he was the son of God, and that unless all accepted him they would be damned. The only reason he gave for doing good was on account of the rewards laid up in heaven. Not one word did he say about doing right for right's sake.

The beatitudes are platitudes, or worse. The "poor in spirit" are a great way from heaven; the mourners are not comforted, and if the meek inherit the earth no one has found it out. Those who hav followed Christ and believed on him hav been the haughtiest and most cruel of all men. They hav not been peacemakers in any sense—except it be to make pieces of the bodies of the men and women who hav not believed. And what kind of sense is it for a man to turn the other cheek when smitten on one, or giv his cloak to the thief who has his coat? Can such a teacher be called "without blemish and without spot?" Pure and simple Christianity is foolishness, and the vast ecclesiastical edifice built upon the distorted verses of the New Testament a monstrous iniquity. Christianity is false conclusions from unreliable premises, and the whole fabric is rotten through warp and woof. The church is based on the so-called gospels, the gospels on the Old Testament, and the latter on legends. Why, then, should there be more reverence for one than for the other?

Bigotry Getting Faint-Hearted.

The members of the "Sunday Closing League" in this city are beginning to realize that the task they undertook of closing up all places of business on Sunday was a very large one. The secretary, Mr. Stephen H. Provost, who is a small edition of Anthony Comstock, announced that last Sunday he would close up all the liquor saloons, but when the day arrived he found himself entirely unable to do it, and the members of his league are not now so enthusiastic as they were. They freely admit that they hav no chance in a struggle with the liquor dealers. "We hav neither the money nor the backbone to fight the liquor dealers," remarked Mr. Jones, a member of the league. "They hav all the influence behind them, too. If we had money we might be able to accomplish something. We could employ agents and watchers, and if a police justice did not do his duty when we had arraigned a liquor dealer before him, we could impeach him and hav him removed. But as it is the fight with the liquor only exists in our secretary's great imagination." This league, it must be remembered, is a Protestant affair, and the liquor stores are largely supported by the Catholic element. The members of our legislature from this city and Brooklyn owe their election mainly to votes controled by corner saloon keepers, and the great brewers can be relied on to furnish the funds to defeat any attempt to stop their traffic. Sunday in New York is practically what it was before the passage of the new code. Public sentiment, outside of the churches, is against any attempt to interfere with citizens' right to spend the day as best pleases them, and the idea of shutting up grocery and other stores, while allowing the street cars and elevated railroads to run, is so ridiculous that the attempt has been practically abandoned. The average unregenerate sinner too can not see the difference between a barber shaving men for a living, and the minister preaching for so much a Sunday.

The Slaughter of the Innocents.

An alarm of fire in the East Fourth street parochial school of this city one day last week caused a panic, in which seventeen little girls lost their lives and many others were seriously injured. This school is run by a German Catholic organization. It is not a charitable institution, but the tuition of the children who are sent there is paid for by parents or guardians. It is not claimed that the facilities for education are any better than those of the free public schools; it is the religious instruction which pupils receive that makes the institution valuable in the eyes of Catholics. The alarm of fire which caused the panic turned out to be false. Had there been a fire hardly a child could hav escaped death. An examination of the premises showed the only means of exit afforded the scholars was a dark passage and stairway three feet wide. The stairway was guarded by a flimsy board banister, which yielded to the pressure brought against it, and fifty children were precipitated to the floor below. Of course those underneath perished. It was also shown in the course of the investigation that the sanitary arrangements of the building were defectiv, and the stench of sewer gas in the play-room was sufficient, as one of the coroner's jury remarked, "to kill a child."

These are the facts as they hav been made public, but there are other alleged facts which hav not appeared in print. It is stated that between the school building and the church edifice there is a door communicating, through which the children might hav been allowed to pass and not a life hav been sacrificed. This door was not opened. It is said to be restricted to the use of the priests on their clandestin visits to the sisters who act as teachers in the school, the passageways in the building being kept dark to facilitate the making of such visits unobserved. The relations between priest and sister hav always been of a notoriously immoral character, and there is no reason to believe that the priests and sisters of the German Catholic parochial school in Fourth street are an exception to the rule.

This church owns property valued at thirteen million dollars, upon which no taxes are paid; yet it pleads that the accommodations given the children in its school were the best it could afford! The little girls who lost their lives were the children of poor parents, yet the church buried but three of them, and took up a special subscription to pay the funeral expenses of even these. The priest who preached the last sermon over the corpses of the slaughtered infants knew that their death was due to the criminal negligence and greed of the management, yet he had the hardihood to say in his discourse that the disaster was "a visitation of divine providence," and charged it to the benevolent intention of God to snatch these innocent victims away from the dangers of a sinful world! Insult could not hav been more disgracefully added to injury. The building was unsafe. Everybody who was not blind could see that; and the entryway was a death-trap. The only avenue which opened to safety was kept closed. The three-inch pine-board banister was admirably adapted for giving way when leaned against by a child. The darkness of the passageway, which it is claimed favored the secrecy of the priests' amatory excursions, added to the terror of the children, and made disci-

plin impossible. Here is where the responsibility rests. Divine providence, if such existed, could hav had no hand in the massacre. Human carelessness caused it, and the human beings guilty of that carelessness should pay the penalty. The robes of the priests protect them from the wrath of the people, but whether they will save them from the hand of the law remains to be seen. It will be a disgrace to our courts of justice if spring when it opens does not find the managers of this German Catholic parochial school paying the price of their crime in a penitentiary.

THE archbishop of Paris, in his Lenten pastoral, said:

"What strikes the mind of every attentiv observer is the work now being attempted of constituting society without God. The wisdom and experience of ages hav taught that no society could subsist if it did not acknowledge the authority of a supreme master and legislator, the source of all human authority and law."

What rot is this, when everyone knows that not only does society exist where no such thing as "God" is known, but exists in as great perfection as in lands where hypocrits bend the knee in million dollar churches and leave their poor next door to starve.

But that is not the worst he said. Hear him:

"Modern society reposes on the doctrins of Christianity. Innovators, however, oblivious of the benefits effected by the gospel, ignoring the lessons of an experience as old as the human race, fancy they can banish from society all religious ideas. Their aim is that no social institution and no public power shall bear the stamp of religious belief. The school is to be without God, and nothing in the asylums of the poor and afflicted is to recall the existence of a father that knows their griefs and counts their sorrows. Neither is any affirmation of the immortality of the soul to shed on the sepulchers of the dead those rays of hope which console the saddest mournings."

It is an indisputable fact that all the Christian rites are borrowed from the so-called pagans, and if society rests on them it rests on paganism. What benefits has the world had from Christianity? Did the church, did Christ, did the "Father" invent any one of the innumerable adjuncts of civilization? Are the gospels as old as human experience? The archbishop must be crazy to talk such nonsense. It takes volumes to recount the infamies of the church, her deeds of cruelty and acts of oppressicn, while we look in vain to find the great humanity so loudly boasted for her by the priests. What Christian in all the world heeds the precepts of Christ regarding his own welfare? Take no thought for the morrow, giv unto the poor all that you hav, become as little children—who is foolish enough to-day to heed these teachings? And what progress would the world hav made if the people had heeded them?

What good reason is there for linking a god to our social institutions and public powers? Who knows what God is, that he should set him over men? An honest god is the noblest work of man. But man is not yet honest enough himself to make an honest God. Governments are not instituted by God, whatever the priests may say, and this cheap talk about a supreme legislator is the veriest trash. If God knows the griefs and counts the sorrows of the orphans in the asylums, why does he not remove the grief and assuage the sorrow? Why should there be grief in the world if such a beneficent and loving "Father" controls all things? Why is the babe born but to suffer and die ere it can perform one act, either good or ill? Does this great "Father" love to see his creatures in agony? What is the use of having a "Father" who knows our griefs and counts our sorrows if he does nothing to relieve them? Better a thousand times that the universe should be chaos than that an infinit fiend should rule it, sowing the seeds of disease and death, and creating souls only to torment them forever.

If immortality is a fact, all imaginings and speculations about it are valueless. They cannot giv or take it away. If it is not a fact, what consolation can it yield? It is a hope, and a strong one, but philosophy must deal with it as with all other speculations. But there is no consolation in the Christian doctrin of immortality, for who can hope to gain their heaven, hedged in as it is with dogmas and creeds? Who believes enough to enable him to get there. Except you believe you cannot be saved? A true believer is one who can drink poison and handle deadly serpents without harm. Where is there a true believer in the world to-day, and what consolation does he find in Godly philosophy?

IT IS encouraging to see that the supply of ministers is failing. It shows that young men resist the temptations held out by the easy life and high pay which most ministers hav, and refuse to prostitute their genius to the support of a false theology. In delivering an address to the Oberlin College on "A Famin in the Ministry," the Rev. Josiah Strong called attention to the fact that the demand for ministers for home missionary churches was pressing and increasing, while the number of men preparing for the ministry is constantly decreasing. "One year ago," he said, "the various home missionary fields asked for two hundred men; to-day four hundred are needed; nor is the demand confined to the missionary churches. Massachusetts alone has eight self-supporting churches not supplied with pastors, and knows not where to get them." Then he refers to the foreign field, and says that the American Board could use three hundred or more ordained ministers to great advantage, making a total of seven hundred men now wanted for home and foreign missions. Nor is this denomination alone in this lack of material for missionaries, as we learn from the Advance. The Presbyterian seminaries show very nearly the same decrease, and also the Episcopalian. If there is any one thing calculated to make kind, honest, generous people rejoice, it is that Presbyterianism is dying out in civilized countries. It is a religion fit only for savages, and how it ever found lodgment in the same breast with a human heart is beyond our comprehension. Episcopalianism is a show religion, and will die with kingcraft and other state evils. It never dared to import the "cast-iron" article of the English creed ("this is the holy Catholic faith, except which a man believe he cannot be saved"), and having suffered this beautiful dogma to die it has lost its vitality. The recent experience of Heber Newton is not calculated to entice young men to its ranks.

WRITING upon the life of the late Wm. E. Dodge, the Rev. Theodore Cuyler complains that nowadays adult persons are rarely inveigled into the church. "Fully four-fifths of all the accessions to the churches now," he says, "are from persons who hav not yet reached twenty-one." "Dodge," he says, "at the early age of twelve was thoroughly converted to the Lord Jesus Christ." Now it must be very gratifying to the Lord to hav the unquestioned homage of such a master-mind as the average boy of twelve possesses, but it strikes us that a religion whose converts are four-fifths infants stops a long way short of being divine or of satisfying the needs of humanity. The average young man or woman under twenty-one knows as much about religion as a pig does of algebra, and is as competent to judge as the pig would be to decide a proposition in Euclid. This infant testimony is mental slush of the silliest kind. Wm. E. Dodge may hav been "rooted and built up in Him and stablished in the faith," as Cuyler says, and we rather think he was, for he was one of the greatest bigots that ever interfered in the municipal affairs of this city. He and Samuel Colgate were a precious pair.

DR. J. L. YORK, the noted Liberal orator of California, has nearly regained his health, and will start soon on an extended lecture tour in the northwest, speaking at Ashland and other points on the overland route; also at Forest Grove, Portland, Astoria, Seattle, Victoria, and other points on the Sound. Oregon and territory Liberals desiring to be stirred up will address Dr. York at San Jose, Cal.

WE learn from the last Investigator that our friend Seaver has been seriously ill of pneumonia, but that he is nearly recovered. We congratulate him and all Liberals that this is so. May he fight death as successfully as he has fought superstition, and liv long after his enemies hav seen the error of their ways.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT made us a brief call last week. The grand old veteran is looking hale and hearty, and his eighty and odd years sit very lightly upon him. He is always busy with humanitarian work, and will be until he grows old.

A Note from Mr. Green.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you please state that I will devote the month of April to lecturing in western Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan? I will deliver one lecture for $10, or two for $15, and pay my own expenses.

Salamanca, N. Y. H. L. GREEN.

Died.

In New York, Feb. 21st, of pneumonia, Edward K., youngest son of Eugene M. and Virginia B. Macdonald, aged four months and fifteen days. The funeral was very quiet, the simple services being conducted by S. P. Andrews.

The brightest stars in manhood's crown are wife and babes, and the way is darker when one fades from sight. To this little star, shining but a moment, the sky was ever black with clouds. Only a mother's boundless love thrilled him with life for even so brief a time. It may be better so, for he had suffered since his birth; but oh, it is hard to love and lose. When the oak falls a landmark and a guide is gone, and in the commingling of the grief of many there is relief. But a little flower fades, and none misses it save those whose home it made more beautiful and gentle. The oak and flower are alike cut down by Nature, who permits no violation of her law to go unpunished. Science explains death, but it cannot take away the pangs of separation. The consolation of philosophy is that the dead see all their trouble in this world.

Into the Silent Land.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just received word that Father and Mother Grimsley, of Corvallis, Or., aged respectivly 81 and 90 years, hav passed to higher life—one on the 23d and the other on the 29th of January last.

On the day preceding his death he said, "as the dimness of his sight betokened his departure:" "Well, I can't go to the Paine meeting, and I can't read THE TRUTH SEEKER any more;" and spent the night free from pain, communing, as he believed, with the spirits of his children in spirit life, who seemed to be with him to the last. And thus, with the early light of the morning, he passed, peacefully as any Christian could do, into the life beyond.

Mary and John Grimsley lived in Oregon since 1847, where several of their children now reside. They were most excellent old people, respected and loved by those who knew them; and although poor in this world's goods, they were rich in those qualities of mind and spirit which are the true riches. They were veteran Infidels to the last. On my last lecture tour through Oregon I paid them a visit at their home, when they assured me that their greatest comfort was to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and about D. M. Bennett and his glorious work. This seemed to be their delight and constant thought.

So let me liv and die, an Infidel to the false though old, yet a lover of the good, true, and beautiful.

PUTNAM'S "Golden Throne," says the Radical Review, "is a noble work. It certainly demonstrates that the scientific conception of the universe is infinitly rich in poetry and romance. There is hardly a question of human interest upon which the author does not touch, and on which he does not hold the most advanced and Radical views. The book overflows with suggestions. It ranks high as a work of thought."

AT the January meeting of the London Anthropological Institute, Mr. W. S. Duncan read a paper on the probable region of man's evolution. Starting with the assumption that man was evolved from a form lower in organization than that of the lowest type yet discovered, and that his origination formed no exception to the general law of evolution recognized as accounting for the appearance of the lower forms of life, the author said that man's most immediate ancestors must hav been similar in structure to that of the existing anthropoid apes, although it was not necessary to suppose that any of the anthropoid apes at present existing belong to the same family as that of man. The science of the distribution of animals showed that the higher types of monkeys and apes appear to hav had their origin in the Old World, the American continent being entirely destitute of them, either alive or fossil. The distribution of the greater portion of the animals of the Old World was shown to hav taken a generally southward direction, owing to the gradual increase of the cold, which culminated in the last Ice Age. This migration was, however, interrupted by the interposition of the Mediterranean and other seas, and thus, although a few of these animals were enabled to journey on until they reached tropical regions, the majority were compelled to remain behind, where they had to exist under altered circumstances. The temperature was much lower, and as a result of the consequent diminution of the number of fruit forests, a change in the food and in the manner in which it was obtained by the apes occurred. A considerable alteration took place also in the manner in which they were forced to use their limbs, and it was due to the operation of these and other causes that the ape form became stamped with human characteristics such as the curvature of the spine, and an increase in the breadth of the pelvis. For these reasons the author regarded the south of Europe as the part in which it was most likely that the evolution of man took place.

Origin and Pedigree of Man.

BY ERNST HAECKEL.

Of all the individual questions answered by the Theory of Descent, of all the special inferences drawn from it, there is none of such importance as the application of this doctrin to Man himself. As I remarked at the beginning of this treatis,* the inexorable necessity of the strictest logic forces us to draw the special deductiv conclusion from the general inductiv law of the theory that Man has developed gradually, and step by step, out of the lower Vertebrata, and more immediately out of Ape-like Mammals. That this doctrin is an inseparable part of the Theory of Descent, and hence also of the universal Theory of Development in general, is recognized by all thoughtful adherents of the theory, as well as by all its opponents who reason logically.

But if the doctrin be true, then the recognition of the animal origin and pedigree of the human race will necessarily affect more deeply than any other progress of the human mind the views we form of all human relations, and the aims of all human science. It must sooner or later produce a complete revolution in the conception entertained by man of the entire universe. I am firmly convinced that in future this immense advance in our knowledge will be regarded as the beginning of a new period of the development of Mankind. It can only be compared to the discovery made by Copernicus, who was the first who ventured distinctly to express the opinion that it was not the sun which moved round the earth, but the earth round the snn. Just as the geocentric conception of the universe—namely, the false opinion that the earth was the center of the universe, and that all its other portions revolved round the earth—was overthrown by the system of the universe established by Copernicus and his followers, so the anthropocentric conception of the universe—the vain delusion that Man is the center of terrestrial nature, and that its whole aim is merely to serve him—is overthrown by the application (attempted long since by Lamarck) of the theory of descent to Man. As Copernicus's system of the universe was mechanically established by Newton's theory of gravitation, we see Lamarck's theory of descent attain its casual establishment by Darwin's theory of selection.

In order to carry out this extremely important application of the Theory of Descent to man, with the necessary impartiality and objectivity, I must above all beg the reader (at least for a short time) to lay aside all traditional and customary ideas on the "Creation of Man," and to divest himself of the deep-rooted prejudices concerning it, which are implanted in the mind in earliest youth. If he fail to do this, he cannot objectivly estimate the weight of the scientific arguments which I shall bring forward in favor of the animal derivation of Man, that is, of his origin out of Ape-like Mammals. We cannot here do better than imagin ourselvs with Huxley to be the inhabitants of another planet, who, taking the opportunity of a scientific journey through the universe, hav arrived upon the earth and hav there met with a peculiar two-legged mammal called Man, diffused over the whole earth in great numbers. In order to examin him zoologically, we should pack a number of the individuals of different ages and from different lands (as we should do with the other animals collected on the earth) into large vessels filled with spirits of wine, and on our return to our own planet we should commence the comparativ anatomy of all these terrestrial animals quite objectivly. As we should hav no personal interest in Man, in a creature so entirely different from ourselvs, we should examin and criticise him as impartially and objectivly as we should the other terrestrial animals. In doing this we should, of course, in the first place refrain from all conjectures and speculations on the nature of his soul, or on the spiritual side of his nature, as it is usually called. We should occupy ourselvs solely with his bodily structure, and with that natural conception of it which is offered by the history of his individual development.

It is evident that in order correctly to determin Man's position among the other terrestrial organisms we must, in the first place, follow the guidance of the natural system. We must endeavor to determin the position which belongs to Man in the natural system of animals as accurately and distinctly as possible. We shall then, if in fact the theory of descent be correct, be able from his position in the system to determin the real primary relationship, and the degree of consanguinity connecting Man with the animals most like him. The hypothetical pedigree of the human race will then follow naturally as the final result of this anatomical and systematic inquiry.

Now if, by means of comparativ anatomy and ontogeny, we seek for man's position in that Natural System of animals which formed the subject of the last two chapters, the incontrovertible fact will at once present itself to us, that man belongs to the tribe, or phylum, of the Vertebrata. Every one of the characteristics, which so strikingly distinguish all the Vertebrata from all Invertebrata, is possessed by him. It has also never been doubted that of all the Vertebrata the Mammals are most closely allied to Man, and that he possesses all the characteristic features distinguishing them from all Vertebrata. If then we further carefully examin the three different main groups or sub-classes of Mammals—the interconnections of which were discussed in our last chapter—there cannot be the slightest doubt that Man belongs to the Placentals, and shares with all other Placentals, the important characteristics which distinguish them from Marsupials and from Cloacals Finally, of the two main groups of placental Mammals, the Deciduata and the Indeciduata, the group of Deciduata doubtless includes Man. For the human embryo is developed with a genuin decidua, and is thus absoletely distinguished from all the Indeciduata. Among the Deciduata we distinguish two legions, the Zonoplacentalia, with girdle-shaped placenta (Beasts of Prey and Pseudo-hoofed animals), and the Discoplacentalia, with disc-shaped placenta (all the remaining Deciduata). Man possesses a disc-shaped placenta, like all Discoplacentalia; and thus our next question must be, What is man's position in this group?

In the last chapter we distinguished the following five orders of Discoplacentalia: (1) Semi-apes; (2) Rodents; (3) Insectivora; (4) Bats; (5) Apes. The last of these five orders, that of Apes, is, as every one knows, in every bodily feature far more closely allied to Man than the four others. Hence the only remaining question now is, whether, in the system of animals, Man is to be directly classed in the order of genuin Apes, or whether he is to be considered as the representativ of a special sixth order of Discoplacentalia, allied to, but more advanced than that of the Apes.

Linnæus in his system classed Man in the same order with genuin Apes, Semi-apes, and Bats, which he called Primates; that is, lords, as it were the highest dignitaries of the animal kingdom. But Blumenback, of Gottingen, separated Man as a special order, under the name of Bimana, or two-handed, and contrasted him with the Apes and Semi-apes under the name of Quadrumana, or four-handed. This classification was also adopted by Cuvier and, consequently, by most subsequent zoologists. It was not until 1863 that Huxley, in his excellent work, the "Evidence as to Man's Place in Nature,"* showed that this classification was based upon erroneous ideas, and that the so-called "four-handed" Apes and Semi-apes are "two-handed" as much as man is himself. The difference between the foot and hand does not consist in the physiological peculiarity that the first digit or thumb is opposable to the four other digits or fingers in the hand, and is not so in the foot, for there are wild tribes of men who can oppose the first or large toe to the other four, just as if it were a thumb. They can therefore use their "grasping foot" as well as a so-called "hinder hand," like Apes. The Chinese boatmen row with this hinder hand, the Bengal workmen weave with it. The Negro, in whom the big toe is especially strong and freely moveable, when climbing seizes hold of the branches of the trees with it, just like the "four-handed" Apes. Nay, even the newly born children of the most highly developed races of men, during the first months of their life, grasp as easily with the "hinder hand" as with the "fore hand," and hold a spoon placed in its clutch as firmly with their big toe as with the thumb! On the other hand, among the higher Apes, especially the gorilla, hand and foot are differentiated as in man.

The essential difference between hand and foot is therefore not physiological, but morphological, and is determined by the characteristic structure of the bony skeleton and of the muscles attached to it. The ankle-bones differ from the wrist-bones in arrangements, and the foot possesses three special muscles not existing in the hand (a short flexor muscle, a short extensor muscle, and a long fibular muscle). In all these respects, Apes and Semi-apes entirely agree with man, and hence it was quite erroneous to separate him from them as a special order on account of the stronger diffentiation of his hand and foot. It is the same also with all the other structural features by means of which it was attempted to distinguish Man from Apes; for example, the relativ length of the limbs, the structure of the skull, of the brain, etc. In all these respects, without exception, the differences between man and the higher apes are less than the corresponding differences between the higher and the lower Apes. Hence Huxley, for reasons based on the most careful and most accurate anatomical comparisons, arrives at the extremely important conclusion—"Thus, whatever system of organs be studied, the comparison of their modification in the Ape series leads to one and the same result, that the structural differences which separate Man from the Gorilla and Chimpanzee are not so great as those which separate the Gorilla from the lower Apes." In accordance with this, Huxley, strictly following the demands of logic, classes Man, Apes, and Semi-apes in a single order, Primates, and divides it into the following seven families, which are of almost equal systematic value: (1) Anthropini (Man); (2) Catarrhini (genuin Apes of the Old World); (3) Platyrrhini (genuin American Apes); (4) Arctopitheci (American clawed Apes); (5) Lemurini (short-footed and long-footed Semi-apes, p. 255); (6) Chiromyini (p. 256); (7) Galeopithecini (Flying Lemurs, p. 256).

If we wish to arrive at a natural system, and consequently at the pedigree of the Primates, we must go a step further still, and entirely separate the Semi-apes, or Prosimiæ (Huxley's last three families), from genuin Apes, or Simiæ (the first four families). For the Semi-apes differ in many and important respects from Genuin Apes, and in their individual forms are more closely allied to the various other orders of Discoplacentalia. Hence the Semi-apes must probably be considered as the remnants of the common primary group, out of which the other orders of Discoplacentalia, and, it may be, all Deciduata, hav developed as two diverging branches. But man cannot be separated from the order of Genuin Apes, or Simiæ, as he is in every respect more closely allied to the higher Genuin Apes than the latter are to the lower Genuin Apes.

Genuin Apes (Simiæ) are universally divided into two perfectly natural groups, namely, the Apes of the New World, or American Apes, and the Apes of the Old World, which are indigenous to Asia and Africa, and which formerly also existed in Europe. These two classes differ principally in the formation of the nose, and they hav been named accordingly. American Apes hav flat noses, so that the nostrils are in front, not below; hence they are called Flat Noses (Platyrrhini). On the other hand, the Apes of the Old World hav a narrow cartilaginous bridge, and the nostrils turned downward, as in man; they are, therefore, called Narrow Noses (Catarrhini). Further, the jaw, which plays an important part in the classification of Mammals, is essentially distinct in these two groups. All Catarrhinæ, or Apes of the Old World, hav exactly the same jaws as Man, namely, in each jaw four incisors above and below, then on each side a canine tooth and five cheek teeth, of which two are pre-molars and three molars, altogether thirty-two teeth. But all Apes of the New World, all Platyrrhini, hav four more cheek teeth, namely, three pre-molars and three molars on each side, above and below; they consequently possess thirty-six teeth. Only one small group forms an exception to this rule, namely, the Arctopitheci, or Clawed Apes, in whom the third molar has degenerated, and they accordingly hav on each half of their jaw three pre-molars and two molars. They also differ from the other Platyrrhini by having claws on the fingers of their hands and the toes of their feet, not nails like Man and the other Apes. This small group of South American Apes, which includes among others the well-known pretty little Midas-monkey and the Jacchus, must probably be considered only as a peculiarly developed lateral branch of the Platyrrhini.

Is This the Star of Bethlehem?

The Scientific American notes as among the possibilities of the present year the reappearance of the variable star poetically known as the Star of Bethlehem. This star, to which no name seems to hav been given by astronomers, was discovered in the year 1572 by Tycho Brahe, a Dutch astronomer. It flashed forth from the sky in the vicinity of Caph, one of the cluster of stars known as Cassiopeia. It increased rapidly for a time in size and brilliancy, and outshone the majority of other stars, changing color occasionally, and at the end of sixteen months disappearing altogether. At its maximum of luster it was visible at noonday.

There were a great many different opinions among astronomers as to what was the cause of this remarkable phenomenon. Some regarded it as a new world fresh from the hand of the creator, but which, proving a failure, had been withdrawn. Others looked upon it as a world on fire, symbolizing the way our own earth would be consumed when the final end of things arrives.

About forty years after the occurrence of this event the telescope was invented. When it was brought to bear on the spot in the heavens where this errant star had been mapped out, a telescopic star was found in very close proximity to the position given by Tycho Brahe. This telescopic star still exists.

A search of astronomical annals revealed the fact that similar blazing stars had appeared in the same region of the sky in the years 945 and 1264. It was therefore inferred that Tycho Brahe's star was a variable one, with a period of a few more than three hundred years. By counting back three periods from the star's first recorded appearance, we are brought to the vicinity of the date given the birth of Christ, and astronomers gifted with lively fancies hav connected the two events, and hav inferred that the star first burst forth in the heavens to mark the place of the "nativity." Hence, for want of a better name, it has received that of the Star of Bethlehem. What its subsequent appearances indicate is not pointed out by these poetical astronomers, and no wise men from the East hav ever started on a journey toward it. Those who believe it is really the original Star of Bethlehem will hav an opportunity soon, probably, of trying th at experiment. If when they get directly beneath it they find themselvs in the vicinity of the barn in which Christ is said to hav been born, it will without doubt greatly strengthen them in their belief. It will be an opportunity which they will not be able to improve again for three hundred years, and it stands the Christian world in hand to be ready for a pilgrimage.

Cassiopeia is a constellation very conveniently situated for observation, and in this latitude is always visible on a clear night. It is located on the opposit side of the north star from the Great Dipper, at nearly the same distance, and is laid out something after the plan of a baseball field, with a fifth star a short distance back of the catcher's position. Allowing the field to face the east, the alleged Star of Bethlehem, if it appears in its usual place, will be found close to the orb representing the third base.

The ancients represented this constellation of Cassiopeia as a blond young lady seated on the edge of a chair, and modern maps of the heavens still retain the figure, though the baseball field is a much more striking symbol.

Owing to the brilliancy of the orb, unscientific observers without telescopes are as likely to be the first to detect its reappearance as those who make celestial surveying a special study. This event will undoubtedly be utilized by the Second Adventists, if any of those peculiar people exist who still believe in fire and judgment, as an occurrence upon which to hang a prophecy of the final dissolution of the world; but it is safe to predict that the observations of astronomers will throw some new light upon its real character.

Old Ideas of Hell Still Retained.

It is said that the stern Tertullian, one of the first preachers of Christianity, who preached in the year about 300, nearly sixteen hundred years ago, spoke as follows to his congregation: "You are fond of spectacles. Expect the greatest of all spectacles, the last and eternal judgment of the universe. How shall I laugh, how admire, how rejoice, how exult, when I behold so many pious monarchs, so many fancied gods, groaning in the lowest abyss of darkness, so many magistrates who persecuted the name of the Lord liquefying in fiercer fires than they ever kindled against the Christians, so many sage philosophers blushing in red-hot flames with their deluded scholars, so many Christian poets trembling before the tribunal, not of God, but of Christ, so many tragedians more tearful in the expression of their own sufferings, and so many dancers." This description of an infernal torture is practiced and held to in many churches now in our immediate vicinity to this day without allowing us to hav acquired more knowledge than the dark Tertullian had about sixteen hundred years ago, as science was just budding to be born, and evolution had scarce been thought of.

Even Joshua asked of the Lord that the sun and moon might stand still, and they stood still. So the Bible says; but it is tradition. How outrageous that such preposterous untruths should be now believed! I can laugh, I can admire, I can rejoice, I can exult in this world's progressiv ways, without a Tertullian or a magnetic preacher at a camp-meeting influencing some deluded mortals, yet I cannot form any idea of hell, or where it is situated, and think it is getting nearly full and slightly crowded by this time, according to the preaching of Tertullian. I can see only those of immoral conduct meriting hell, and that while living by their conscience. Yet a noble Grecian had rested upon the important ground of beings raised from the dead, another of those Christian ideas in a lengthy controversy, and promised Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, that if he could be gratified with the sight of a single person who had been actually raised from the dead he would immediately embrace the Christian religion. It is remarkable that the prelate of the first eastern church (Antioch) however anxious for the conversion of his friend, thought proper to decline this fair and reasonable challenge, showing positivly all those Christians to be nothing but a priestly humbug of the grossest kind. Even Cicero at that time expressly prohibits the Romans from having other gods than those of the state. Their maxim was "universal toleration," yet they protected a superstition which they despised. It was the Jewish personal God and the Christian God.

About the same time the learned Origen judged it prudent to disarm the tempter, the virgins, some were insensible and some were invincible against the assaults of the flesh, they disdaining an ignominious flight—the virgins from the warm climate of Africa—encountered the enemy in the closest engagement. They permitted priests and deacons to share their beds, and gloried amidst the flames in their unsullied purity; showing clearly that their priests and deacons had not arrived at the present stage of civilization which exists at this day. It is said by Col. R. G. Ingersoll that the United States has not been civilized but twenty odd years—since we hav added the last amendment to the present Constitution; and it appears those virgins must hav thought of some other more delightful god than the personal god of the Christians, and the priests and deacons saw and felt all those desires that human depravity calls delightful and rapturous, and which common intuition now calls beastly and vile. Such brutal actions in our time would create in society a perfect denial of Christianity in toto, and the terror of utmost depravity. The outrage on virgins by priests and deacons is enough to damn them in the eyes of the present community; they were beasts and nothing more. Such villainous acts would be punished severely and terribly at this day if performed.

"Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn." The incongruity of our nature is more lofty and better than some hundred years back. H. W. Beecher, in his lecture at the Cooper Union lately, spoke of many mythical accounts in the Bible, in which we must agree with him, and they were designed especially for the times when written. He comes out fairly and says he believes in evolution, which alone would turn our belief from that barbarous and idolatrous worship to a more desirable object, viz., civilization. We hav more knowledge than our ancestors of old, and time causes us to improve. The printing-presses throughout our land hav been instrumental in diffusing knowledge and enlightening the mind of man, and hav given facilities for improvements and inventions like steam, which is now on every ocean and land, and the telegraph and telephone, which speak from across the Atlantic and across our own land, and the electric light. We shall use electricity for all purposes under the sun ere long; therefore, let us believe in truth, reason, and liberty, and not in that hell to roast us after death for all time, like Tertullian, or the resurrection of the dead, as Theophilus would like to hav us believe in; disarming the tempter, as the learned Origen says, as all can easily see the bigotry of these three first-class priests of the third century; yet I doubt if others as well as myself can ever believe in common sense which has been strenuously regarded by me for the last thirty-eight years. S. V. A.

Spotswood, N. J.

Church, Saloon, Jail, and Poorhouse.

Long before our civil war—between the church North as the upper millstone, and the church South, as the lower millstone—THE TRUTH SEEKER stood rather a poor chance. The shareholder in Congress gav the North a tariff, buiding up monopoly in New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusets, Connecticut, New Jersey, Ohio, Illinois—of which this same league was not slow to avail itself—in return for laws favoring slavery, not worth the paper they were written on. This gav the Union a small squad of states in the northeast as the creditor section, leaving more than nine-tenths as the farm and debtor section. The South—by the means of inflation—tried to shake off the yoke of the creditor section; but instead of being seconded by the West, the money-lender—by the resumption of specie payment—made war prices come down. Instead of a graduated tax on incomes amounting—in the case of extreme wealth—to confiscation, the poll-tax system of tariff, excise, license stamps, was continued. Nevada is used up. Its silver mines are failing. As it takes a gold mine to work a silver mine, thousand are ruined from this cause. Mining for gold, silver, diamonds, in the desert, sacrifices the pine vases before the jaws of the mine. By polluting the river, its waters are ruined, both for navigation and irrigation. Once more the father of all lies gets the start of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The drinking and gambling saloons follow the railroad. Satan having driven the nail, then comes the church to clinch it. Next the schoolhouse takes its chance. Even the roughest barbarian—but a few removes from the savage—needs a schoolhouse. Next comes the bank. Finally the printing-office, whose headquarters are sure to be somewhere in the creditor section; but the manufactory as a rule is missing in the village of the New Northwest. But as good luck will hav it, the church is more and more divided against itself. The pope—poor old saphead, deadhead—cannot possibly keep up with the times. Then the Second Advent church—keeping clear of the use of whisky, wine, beer, tea, coffee, tobacco, opium, etc.—is giving THE TRUTH SEEKER a hint which cannot fail to be improved upon. The greater includes the less. At this rate—both church and saloon becoming important—"prohibition" will become an easy task. The shadow of church, saloon, jail, poorhouse, will become less and less. In the mean time THE TRUTH SEEKER is bound to watch and fast. Besides self-government there must be culture; and culture takes time and money. New York has its Saratoga, where diamonds are displayed by the bushel. Then the northern wilderness of New York is to be made into a park where the deadhead creditor, with a gun on his shoulder, may disport himself to his heart's content. But Niagara Falls—with wide world fame—is to be a second Paris, Paris with its cancer of pauperism, Paris with its vagabond creditor, squandering the hard earnings of the saphead drudge, as his dupe and debtor. But in view of the brainless dissipated millionaire, ruling the soulless corporation, it is time that business men became truth seekers. JAS. PLUCKER.

Liberals and Their Duties.

Liberalism is before the public with two decided disadvantages—poverty and unpopularity. Had we silver and gold to offer, the power of the church would diminish rapidly, and many sleepy, indifferent, or timid Liberals would awaken to a sense of the importance of our work. Liberals are not to be blamed for consulting their financial welfare, for they frequently hav others dependent on them; yet they are frequently more timid than necessary, and very often mean and sordid. This is especially the case with wealthy skeptics. The unpopularity of the cause keeps the self-seeker and demagog quiet, and thus from two potent causes mental liberty is held in abeyance, and its real strength is always far in excess of its apparent force. But, despite disadvantages, we hav enough bold spirits to keep the antiquated church quaking in fear of the wicked Infidel, and day by day the power of the pretender becomes less among the people. America is fast developing as a nation of believers in this life, and year by year will the rising generation insist upon an enjoyment of this life—on week-days and Sunday, too.

Of course, all mistakes and crimes of Liberals will be heralded as the fruits of skepticism, yet if the church were to be tried by the faults of its members, the gates of hell would long ago hav prevailed against it and smashed the old fable into "smithereens." The Christian church is compelled continually to say, in an apologetic manner, that Christian thieves and adulterers are not Christians; yet it always insists that a weak Infidel is an Infidel, and that his skepticism is the sole cause of his infamy. If the church will consent to be tried on the same principle, Liberalism will enter the lists with a confident tread, and come out with victory on her banner.

The sneer is so often made that Liberalism has nothing new to offer, and this comes from a church which livs in the cast-off or borrowed clothes of other superstitions—a church which can lay claim to not a single original idea, and which, excepting only Mohammedanism, is the most modern of the world's religions, and a general conglomeration of all its sisters in deception and imposition on burdened humanity. When it shall hav established the claim to a single original idea, then will it be time for it to demand of Liberalism some evidences of novelty.

But I do not understand it to be the mission of Liberalism to produce any novel moral philosophy. So ancient are the commonest precepts of morality that no history records the time when man did not possess them. The province of Liberalism is to turn the attention of man away from the gods to man, from an imaginary world to a present world of reality. It is to take man in his social relations and apply the discoveries of science and the plainest moral principles as between man, and produce that which is the aim of all philanthropists—human happiness. It is our duty to show that by a godless life we liv the life affording the fullest enjoyment to man. Godlessness and impiety is the grand need of the day. What does that mean? A godless man is one who is entirely human and engrossed wholly with human affairs, such as education, building good dwellings, raising good food, fabricating comfortable cloths, and devising healthy, harmless, inspiring recreation. Impiety is the abandonment of all notions or emotions fashionable in churches, such as are called religious services and are supposed to influence somebody who is somewhere—but nobody knows where; and to substitute therefor actual work for ourselvs and fellows, and an investigation into medical science, social topics, or anything that benefits, inspires, or renders man a comfortable being here.

In this work every Liberal can do something. He ought not to resolve, because he cannot write or speak, that he is therefore nought in the world. The Liberal who is a mechanic, being of the earth earthy, should make himself "A No. 1" in all respects. He should make it a point of pride to hav a home neat and comfortable, if he cannot make it elegant. Everything ought to bear the impress of a man who is thoroughly worldly in everything he touches, and determined to make it bright, happy, and complete. The Liberal who is a doctor should aim to get to the top round of the ladder, and giv some addition to the art of healing, as the evidence of his love of the world and everything worldly. So with the lawyer; let his aim be to shine resplendent among the judicial luminaries of the world. Let the Liberal student enter into the domain of practical utility for man. Let the lucubrations of his brain be such as will oil the wheels of human life and make them run easier. In all things let the bent of the skeptical mind follow the legitimate channel to which all worldliness points, to wit: the improvement of the human species, the lightening of labor, the illumination of social topics, and the brightening of this world as a veritable paradise. REUBEN DAILEY.

Jeffersonville, Ind., Feb. 4, 1883.

THE TRUTH SEEKER will be sent to new subscribers three months for fifty cents. There is no better way of serving the cause than by extending the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Letters from Friends.

CARROLTON, Feb. 1, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find money for the fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World." I trust I am not too late in my order to receive one, as I hav the others, and the trip around the world would not be complete without it. The 50 cents extra is for the postage. ANN E. BRACE.

GARDEN GROVE, Feb. 10, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Inclosed find $1.50—50 cents for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $1 for the Monument Fund. I will also giv $5 to help erect a building in which to perpetuate the publication of THE TRUTH SEEKER and a home for yourself. I may giv more, but I will pledge $5. Long wave THE TRUTH SEEKER.

JOHN CARNAHAN.

Feb. 18, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: I inclose one dollar for the Monument Fund, and with it send you love and sympathy. I know how you sorrow over the dear departed, and I am so glad that you are occupied with his unfinished work, if that can be called unfinished which he labored to do to the end of his life. Faithfully yours, LUCY N. COLMAN.

PRESCOTT, Jan. 31, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Please permit me, an old subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, to express my heartfelt sympathy for your great loss. I never met Mr. Bennett but once, so I know his heart by his writings only; and yet I knew him well. The loss is also mine. I am cheered by the able manner in which you and friend Macdonald conduct our noble TRUTH SEEKER. Thank you. Consider me a life subscriber. Sincerely yours, E CLARKE.

SAN BERNARDINO, Feb. 7, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I am not a regular subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I hav read the paper enough to know that Mr. Bennett has done a good work in his time for the benefit of future generations. I am not in favor of making a great show on pillars of rock, but let the champion of Freethought hav his name engraved in solid rock as well as on the minds of the people that love him. His enemies may then be able to feel a remorse when the name of D. M. Bennett, the truth seeker, speaks in silence, as it were, from the tomb.

Inclosed find $6—$5 from myself for the Monument Fund, and $1 from Mrs. E. M. Wallace for the same purpose. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER great success, I remain, Respectfully, JOHN C CARTER.

CEDAR SPRINGS, Feb. 7, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I want to say to you and your readers that I hav lately received from you Vols. I. and II. of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and can honestly say that I never saw so much good, solid reading for so little money (75 cents) in my life. Every Liberal that has not got them should get them by all means. The "New Version" I purchased of you is just splendid and should be read by all. Out of all the Liberal papers in the land, none, in my opinion, comes up to the dear old TRUTH SEEKER for honesty, fairness, soundness, and last, but not least, size and shape. These large blanket sheets are a bother and should go out of existence in this age of progress. We like all your writers, too—like to hear all sides, and the Spiritualists here even do not want Brother Winter to stop writing. O. H. RICHMOND.

MILTONVALE, Feb. 5, 283.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav been a reader for a long time of your paper and books, I must send in my heartfelt sorrow that Mr. Bennett should thus be called to the realm immortal, while there was such a work for him to do here in the mundane sphere. I felt while he was making that grand tour around the world that he, of all men, was doing more good than many were conscious of. It seems to me that D. M. Bennett has built his own monument with the many fine large volumes he has written, and that monument is covered all over with hieroglyphics which Bennett alone could write, but which all can read, whether they fully comprehend them or not. It will be many long years before the world will produce another D. M. Bennett. What he would hav accomplished with ten years more of life it is hard to conclude; but with his mighty broadsword of truth cutting right and left, Christianity would soon hav been driven from the arena, and free thought would hav been the privilege of all. The thought has occurred to me that possibly, if he had lived, the cause of Liberalism would hav advanced too fast, and thus we might hav been met with civil war—a religious war to exterminate the Infidels. Perhaps it is better to go slower until our Liberal ranks are recruited and the regiments are all full; then the vindictiv orthodox will find that discretion is the better part of valor. Let us go slow but sure, and fight it out on the line of true liberty, both physically and mentally, if it takes another hundred years. Bennett still livs and is carrying the flag of universal mental liberty the same as before. Let us all support him by supporting THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours. etc., S. G. WINTERS.

LASALLE, Feb. 19, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I am sorry to see such unkind letters written to dear Mrs. Bennett as those in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 10th. Think your reply is just what it should be. I am a Spiritualist, and want to be a Liberal also. I cannot see why one should not hav a hearing through a Liberal organ as well as another, and although I read some letters on the subject of Spiritualism that I don't like, I am not going to cry, "Stop my paper." I intend to take it as long as I can pay for it, and if I was able I would send you a year's subscription for everyone who, like Mr. Chase, says, "Stop my paper." I send $1 to the Monument Fund, and if a Memorial Hall is to be built (which I hope there will), I will try to send $5 for that. With love and sympathy for Mrs. Bennett, and kind regards to yourself, I am,

Respectfully yours, ELIZA H. FALES.

MILWAUKEE, Jan. 24, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $1 for the Bennett Monument Fund. D. M. Bennett needs no monument; he has, during the last decade of his life, erected for himself one more durable than marble, granit, or brass. But the friends of Freethought need one for him as a memento of their respect and gratitude for his invaluable services in the cause of progress, truth, and liberty.

Were I to attempt any expression of regret or condolence on our great loss, it would be but the echo of the words of hundreds already uttered and the feeling of thousands all over the land who sympathize with us.

It is a matter of thankfulness that his mantle has fallen on shoulders already accustomed to wear it, and which wear it worthily.

With fraternal respect, ALMOND OWEN.

BATTLE GROUND, Jan. 24, 283.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: I take the present opportunity to express my symathy for the loss of your husband. You lost a noble man, and Freethought one of its ablest defenders. I think Mr. Bennett was one of the noblest men that ever lived, and he fought a good fight, and has left the world better by having lived in it. There are very few men living who are so conscious of the rights of others as he was. There are none more tolerant than he was, and toleration is one of the noblest of virtues, and when practiced as he always practiced it, is sufficient to gain the respect of the most bigoted of oponents.

I herewith send my dues to pay up my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 282 and 283, according to the new era. I will in future try and not be so far behind with my remittances. I would like to see in some part of THE TRUTH SEEKER that you adopt the new era. By adopting the Era of Man gradually the Infidels of this country can root out the old era that is founded on superstition and mythology.

I remain ever a friend to you and THE TRUTH SEEKER, WILLIAM BACHMIER.

COLUMBIA, Mo., Feb. 11, 283.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Thinking that a few lines from this place, concerning the condition of the churches and Liberalism, might be of interest to you and your many valiant contributors, I take the opportunity of writing you for the first time.

First comes the Sunday-schools, which are but sparsely attended in proportion to the whole number of inhabitants in the city. There are four principal denominations represented—the Methodist, the Presbyterian, the Campbellite, and the Baptist. The average attendance for each is about 125, or 500 in all, per Sunday. And as the city contains about 8,000 inhabitants, it shows that only six and one fourth per cent attend Sunday-school. The above states the facts as near as can be learned.

The attendance at church is probably a little more than double the above, or twelve and one half per cent. The ministers hold forth in their old tones of "Believe or be damned," "Christ crucified," "Come, ye sinners, and wash your hands in the blood of the Lamb," etc., but slight is the impression made. Shall we not take courage from this state of the church? Surely, the guns of Liberalism are doing their glorious work. The blackened and blood-besmeared walls of superstition are slowly but surely crumbling away.

Let us unite, dear friends, in fighting the common enemy, even if we do not agree upon minor points of our own belief. We all agree on one thing at least, and that is that reason must take the place of superstition; love and friendship, the place of hatred and jealousy. Yes, now, more than ever before, we need strong, persistent, and united action.

Some of our noblest leaders hav fallen by the wayside, overcome by the powers of nature, while working manfully for their race. Who shall take their places in the van and lead us on to victory? Ah my friends! though we may never find such a leader as Mr. Bennett, yet I am sure that the grand old banner, THE TRUTH SEEKER, will continue doing its duty. Its founder has performed his duty not only by writing, but by suffering for our principles. Let us immortalize his name by supporting what he established. It is an everlasting and living monument to his name. Respectfully, U. F. SHULER.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 25 for six months' renewal of your most valuable and interesting paper.

In reference to a hall or monument to the memory of our departed friend, D. M. Bennett, I would say, as I am not rich nor yet poor, I would giv at least $50 for a hall and not over $5 or $10 for a monument—and possibly $500 by donation for a hall; because monuments are only to look at in cemeteries, while halls are intended to promulgate lasting truths to the living and unborn millions of earth's inhabitants.

Our population is about 22,000, and no regular Liberal organization. Could we but hav one lecture from Col. Ingersoll, to break the ice, then we could patronize other able lecturers of Liberal proclivities who might wish to favor us.

Fraternally yours, D. R. CHRISTIAN.

HARVEYSBURGH, Jan. 20, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $7.50, $1 of which is for the Monument Fund, and my sister-in-law, Mrs. Van Sickle, also sends $1 for the same purpose. I hav five brothers and six sisters living—all Freethinkers. My ancestors were Huguenots, and fled from France and settled about New York in an early day. They were named La Tourette, and if any family can make a better showing in the Freethought or Infidel line I would like to know it. I was one of the few that were opposed to Mr. Bennett's voyage around the world. I approve of a lasting monument to his memory and a memorial hall in which THE TRUTH SEEKER and kindred papers may be published. I hav been a reader of the paper since its first publication, though often behind in paying up my subscription.

I request in all kindness that you publish this short letter. Yours very truly,

MARY HANSFORD.

KINSMAN, OHIO, Feb. 14, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot get along without the paper, as this section is a good field for missionary work, many yet believing in a flat earth and solid heaven, and the rest of the fish stories found in the Bible. But the cause of Liberalism is slowly but surely gaining ground in this community. It is most gratifying to observe that Liberals are almost entirely composed of thinkers and investigators. I know it is not too late for me to express my sorrow and regret at the death of our departed leader, D. M. Bennett. But with the grand and noble record and example he left behind, I know that the grand army of Freethought will push on the great cause of human progress for which he so nobly and fearlessly battled.

Hoping that THE TRUTH SEEKER may long liv and continue to deal its heavy blows against bigotry and superstition, I remain,

Very truly yours, EMERY THOMPSON.

BOULDER, Jan. 29, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER. It has steadily improved from the time I first saw it. If Liberals would organize and sustain each other half as much as church-members do, it would be but a few years before it would be as popular to be a Liberal as it was in many places, and yet is, to be a church-member. The world moves and thinks, and by using the same methods the church does we could command as large a following, and with so much more happiness to the world. Next to organization comes the diffusion of knowledge through our (denominational, if you will allow the term) literature; hence the first duty of a Liberal is to support a Liberal paper, and the next is to organize, organize, organize! If we fail to organize, our enemies do not, and in that way turn the word Liberal into a term of reproach and an epithet. By organization I do not mean to advise a Liberal Salvation Army, because a noisy, aggressiv movement is likely to end in making our freedom our neighbor's slavery. That these selfsame righteous neighbors hav done that in all ages for us is no reason why we should not avoid that extreme. True progress can only be made by conceding to others the same rights we demand for ourselvs. The world as a whole is slow to think, therefore Liberals must do some of the thinking for it, and learn the mass by continually setting before it our ideas published in our own papers. It takes three generations to obtain the fruition of our hopes. The first generation passes before the world, gets accustomed to the new idea; the second to educating the rising generation to act upon their convictions; the third in securing the fruits of the idea. Therefore let us organize, and always see to it that ideas which disorganize are kept in the background. If the name Liberal League is impolitic, call it the Liberal Club, and hav just as few officers as possible. A permanent secretary is about the only officer necessary. A chairman can be elected at each meeting, to hold over till the next. As the organization grows there would be time enough to evolve an elaborate constitution and by-laws, and at any time a delegation could be elected to represent the League or club at any meeting of a larger body of Liberals. In that way ill-feelings can be kept down and harmony secured. Anyway, or some way, the Liberals in each community should organize.

CHARLES AMBROOK.

MILNERSVILLE, Feb. 2, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I am one who truly deplores the death of D. M. Bennett. I believe he was a truly honest and good man. He was trying to make the world better for his having lived in it, and so sure as the sun shines he will get justice in spite of the mud-flingers. His body is dead, but he livs in his writings. They will liv long after the mud and slime flingers are dead and forgotten. I am with J. L Tompkins as to how to treat all malicious slanders published in the papers of the day about D. M. Bennett (see THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 27th), and all Freethinkers should do as H. L. Green advises in the same paper—giv the Blade notice that we are aware of the slander it has given to the world. There are enough Freethinkers in America to see that justice is done Mr. Bennett. Let us act.

Put me down for $1 toward the Monument Fund. Let me know when you want it. May THE TRUTH SEEKER never falter, but keep on as it has in the past. Very truly yours, DR. W. B. ROSAMOND.

TIPTON, MICH., Feb. 16, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I am very much pleased with your editorial to Spiritualists and Materialists. We are too apt to think that the world was only made for us, and the rest of the world had no rights that we were bound to respect. As for me, I am willing that every one shall hav his say, provided that it will tend to better mankind. I am one of those that havn't the slightest evidence that there is anything after death, only eternal sleep, and think when the Spiritualists hav lost all of their superstitions they will come to the same conclusion.

Katie King had her followers, and the Eddy family theirs. Slade had his. All hav been exposed—not by Spiritual papers, though—which makes it look hard on their side, they claiming to be searching for the truth.

I wouldn't hav any religion that would not stand investigation, or that had to go behind a screen in order to get demonstrations. We hav sleight-of-hand performers doing all of their tricks when in a dark corner, and not claiming to be under the influence of spirits. Barnum said the people liked to be humbugged. Our wanting to believe in a hereafter is no evidence that there is one.

A man who is true to himself always asks for the proof, and is not satisfied with "they say so's" or fog banks. Yours for honesty, OTIS WHELAN.

CHARLES CITY, Feb. 19, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: I hav just got home from Dakota on the 10th, and heard of the death of Mr. Bennett, and was very much surprised to hear it—he looked so well when I saw him last fall at Waverly. I hav been away from home for over three months in Dakota, and that is the reason I hav not written to you before. My wife and little girl were very much grieved to hear of his death, and the girl cried and took it to heart as much as if it had been one of her parents, so her mother told me when I returned home. My little girl went to Waverly with me to see Mr. Bennett when he returned from his trip around the world, and she was very much pleased to see him. She is a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and wife and she cannot do without it, so in this you will find draft for $5—$2.50 for TRUTH SEEKER, and $1.50 for the last book of his travels, as I hav the three others, and $1 for the Monument Fund. Probably in a short time I will send further remittance to the Monument Fund as soon as I can see some of the Liberals here. The times are very close here, or would send more, but do the best I can at present, and hope the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER will liv and weather the storm as long as water runs and grass grows, and that will be as long a lease as it will want.

My wife and daughter send their kind regards to you and yours, and same from myself.

Yours truly, JOHN MAHARA.

33 EAST 20th STREET.

MR. EDITOR: It is not often I thrust myself on your notice. The present writing even is not an ambitious attempt to secure a small nestling-place somewhere in your columns. Indeed, should these lines be duly condemned to the eternal darkness of the waste basket, there shall be neither weeping nor gnashing of teeth on my part. But I could not repel a desire to improve what I consider a good opportunity to show you wherein the Liberal mind betrays its real narrowness and bias. Yes, sir, while it professes to be open to conviction upon every subject, it shows the most dogged obstinacy in refusing evidences of any truth which is opposed to its dogmas. And I will prove the fact by refering you to the 26th chapter of the "Tomb of Fanaticism." There you allow your columns to perpetuate the sly but none the less wicked and dangerous ridicule, thrown by the pen of the great (!) eighteenth century Infidel upon the performance of miracles. Yet, what is one of the miracles allude to but an occurrence which daily takes place, and, were the profane only admitted to its mysteries, could be witnessed any day by thousands in the present age? Theodotus, Saint Theodotus, a pot-house keeper, it is sneeringly asserted, changed water into wine. What is there so extraordinary about that? And why should it be made the text for discrediting miracles when so many of our modern tavern keepers not only turn lots of water into wine every day of their lives, but even transform vile whisky into all sorts of generous liquors with euphonious names, and that at a moments notice and at the most trifling expense? This is only one instance. Had I time I would bring up others pointing to the fact that the Liberal mind, with all its pretensions, is open to the charge of being bigoted and opposed to the admission of unpalatable truth. As it is, I rest content with this effort to show you your actual narrow-mindedness, hoping it will lead you and your readers to reflect upon your real nature and attitude, and result in you becoming, instead of obstinate unbelievers and scoffers, ready believers in miracles and all they imply.

I am ever yours, EDMOND GASTINEAU.

ASTRO-THEOLOGY.

COLUMBUS, KAN.

TO HUGH BYRON BROWN, Dear Sir: I hav no words to fully express to you the great joy and satisfaction your outlines of astro-theology gave me.

Although I was born, bred, and steeped in orthodoxy, yet the natural bent of my mind ever was to "look on nature in her loftier moods;" "take nature's path and mad opinions leave." From my earliest boyhood I hav been a silent and devout worshiper of the Sun, the true, real God, and all his votaries of the solar system, and all the other visible suns that "night's blue arch adorn." I hav an old geography of the heavens by Burritt, which I studied and compared with, and observed and located the constellations with intense delight, and worshiped "in spirit and in truth."

If what you say of the revelations of the Bible to astronomy be true—and my whole being responds to it—why has this, to me, vastly important knowledge been hidden so long from both orthodox and Freethinkers? Hav the sources of your information been recently brought to light—your quotations indicate to the contrary—or hav they, hitherto, been too repulsiv and revolutionary to be credible? It seems to me you could not do more good to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER than to tell them all you know on this subject. It makes the Bible and priestcraft more hateful and damnable to me than ever before. It makes the Bible to me like a black pall over an eclipse of the whole heavens, to hide from man the only true objects of worship.

Oh, what a waste of life, time, and talents, for both orthodox and heterodox to be wrangling about the origin and meaning of the Bible, when it seems, from the light which you throw upon it, that they are all "fooling away their time."

Oh, how happy I am that, in spite of the Bible, I hav in fact been an ancient, a true worshiper of the Sun and all the heavenly hosts, under whose divine effulgence and emanations "a secret rapture fills my soul that speaks its truth divine."

How an astronomer could ever be a theologian is more than I can explain. What an immeasurable distance from the Sun, in every sense, is the popular personal God, the nothing, which poor deluded men and women are taught to worship and to fear. What a delusion to sing:

> "Great God, with wonder and with praise
> On all thy works I look;
> But still thy wisdom, power, and grace
> Shine brightest in thy book."

O evolution, O truth, O science, restore nature to us, and let us worship the Sun, a reality, and not the Son, a fiction.

> "In the great solemn temple,
> Grand archway of the skies,
> From every heart, an altar,
> Let grateful incense rise."

J. H. COOK.

BURR OAK, Jan. 22, E. M. 283.

MR. EDITOR; Our grief and sorrow for the great loss in the death of Mr. Bennett, not only to us and his immediate friends but to the world in general, is too deep and heartfelt for words to make manifest. I mourn our loss almost beyond degree and cannot be comforted. I consider it the greatest loss the world ever sustained in the death of one man. It will be hard to fill his place, but I hope and trust, and fully believe, his mantle has fallen on competent and worthy shoulders. May it be worn with dignity and honor, and to the edification and enlightenment not only to your patrons, but to mankind in general. May THE TRUTH SEEKER continue in the future as it has in the past to be a power in the land in tearing down the strongholds of superstition and priestcraft. Spare not, but cut to the right and to the left with the strong and sharp tri-edged sword of truth, reason, and common sense, to the final destruction and downfall of the old and rotten institutions of theology, that are already tottering to their fall; hoping it will remain and flourish until victory crowns its efforts all-triumphant over its natural foes—superstition and ignorance.

The subscriptions do not come in as fast as I fondly hoped for a monument to the honor and memory of him who has torn so many corroding and cankering chains from our mental powers. I hope there is not a Liberal in the land so poor, so mean, as not to giv a dollar at least for such a fund. Put me down for $5 for that purpose.

I am very sorry to see our good friend Wm. McDonnell cast so cold and wet a blanket on the fires of love and veneration that would put up a noble and suitable monument to the memory of the man more than all others deserving of such—and pray let it be no inferior one. I also hope and trust there will be long purses, with many small ones, with full hearts and willing hands enough in the land to build a Bennett Hall, and not inferior to the Paine Hall in Boston, for which I now pledge a nominal sum, though necessarily small owing to my limited means. The heart is full, the spirit willing, but the purse is lank and thin. I hope to see the ball rolling ere long, buoyed up and on with sufficient means to accomplish the thing at once. Let us all strike while the iron is hot and every Liberal heart is warm with love and grief.

I am also pained and sorry to see so able and good a Liberal in other respects as E. C. Walker advocating the rum-seller's occupation of manufacturing paupers, degradation, misery, and crime to the extent that the already depraved and vicious may see proper to do for filthy lucre. It casts a blush on my old countenance when it is thrown up to me by our Christian opponents, as it sometimes is, as one of our "Liberal principles." There may be a few other Liberals with him in sentiment on that question, but, thanks to humanity, they are few and far between. Oh, what a contrast between his argument and that grand, noble, humane, and truthful reply to the same from George Gage in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He has given my sentiments exactly, and a thousand times better than I could do.

I am an old and illiterate man of threescore and eleven summers, but claim the right to make manifest my thought on any and all subjects, and rejoice that I hav lived to see the day and age of the world when I can do so without fear of rack or fagot. Yours in deep mourning for our mutual loss,

M. P. THURSTON.

FLINT, Feb. 21, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: While I mourn with the many the loss of our dear friend and brother, D. M. Bennett, to the cause of liberty and truth, I want to be counted a life subscriber to the monument he erected while here—THE TRUTH SEEKER. And, although I am a full-fledged Spiritualist (as I understand the term, and as are the most of your subscribers, so far as I know), I take a great deal of interest in the pro and con ideas of those who like to speak their little pieces.

In my opinion it is the courtesy that our dear brother extended to all classes of thinkers that has made THE TRUTH SEEKER what it is—an indispensable paper to the inquirer. And the ultimate of its success will depend largely upon your generosity in this direction. I am one who thinks that open and free discussion alone can pave the way to a better understanding of human needs, wants, and aspirations, and that no good should be unjustly compromised.

We are not all mummies that we should willingly suffer the seal of depravity to mar the divinity of our natures, or that we should trust our reason to be embalmed by the faith of some tilled ism, or apishly go pumping for compliments in giving assent or by subscribing to the creed or pet theory of anyone. Our opinions must of necessity be somewhat varied, and different measurably as are our physical structures and the surrounding conditions that mold them. We cannot therefore be true to our own inherent natures and selfhood, and at the same time subscribe and be faithful to the manifold beliefs which are as varied as the points of a compass, and which, to the thoughtful inquirer and comparativ observer, appear as so many cross lines drawn across the "frontier" of human reason. Then, as we grow mentally and find for ourselvs use for the intellectual windmill of the martyred "son of the morning" (who brought love and immortality to light—as told in the legend of the Garden), to sift the concepts of our yesterdays, let us be generously courteous to those who, like Jacob and Joseph, are still dreaming.

Kindly criticism and honest competition that shall awaken a doubt and energize the mentality of mankind to real, beneficent inquiry is truly commendable. I am of the opinion that there cannot be anything too sacred for human investigation and comparativ thought, and that system which cannot bear the sunlight, as reflected from our conditioned phenomena or "Infidel stupidity"—as said—without wilting like Jonah's gourd, and its adherents sinking into a state of fevered unrest, cannot hav a very firm foundation.

I always admired the bold fearlessness and true manly courage of the good brother gone on before, and I can but hope that you, as editor, and the much esteemed proprietress, will be enabled, like him, to pour out the good wine for those athirst, and, as true, honest, and liberal truth seekers, liv long to break the bread of knowledge to the hungering multitude.

I herewith remit $14, for which send me the four volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," leather bound; also THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year to Esther M. Smith, Flint, Mich. The balance may be placed to my subscription credit. I had hoped to send two more names, pledged to me, hence the delay. I think I can get two or three orders for the books when I get time to exhibit them.

Our Thomas Paine celebration was a success. C. Fanny Allyn gave the address, and after some other remarks a fine collation was spread. The hall was appropriately decorated.

A Miss Gleason, from Ohio, is with us now, and although only a short time in the field, she givs promis of getting to the front.

Yours for the right, WM. R. ALGER.

Poetry.

The Soul's Proteus.

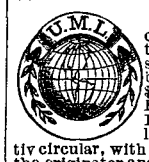
BY VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

Religion, a word, condemned and adored,
By creed robed a monarch, dismantled by sword,
Now a truth, now a lie, now a right, now a wrong,
A curse and a blessing, a prayer and a song.
In temples 'mid idols some find it alone,
And sages hav found it a spirit in stone;
In animals dreaming, awakening in man,
Still a problem that baffles all system, all plan.
Old Menu, the Hindoo, gave laws in its name,
Making India the nucleus of grandeur and fame;
Unrivaled in wisdom, of learning the queen,
Antiquity's pride, majestic, supreme.
But still for some cause too occult, too divine,
O'er its face grew a cloud, myths encircled its shrine,
And the children of men became awed, then incensed,
Abandoned in wrath for the worshiped's offense.
But the radiance of glory lights now the den
Of the anchorite. Christna has come among men.
Late banished religion recalled, re-embraced,
In the arms of reviving devotion replaced.
Temples, altars, and shrines, all are hers as before,
In Christna she holds them and lovers adore;
Ages on ages hav rolled to the past
Since the banks of the sacred stream witnessed the last
Of the heavenly visitant; still by the stream
Are the souls of the sons of Achina made clean,
But the waif of man's conscience again is ensnared,
The Brahman and priest, with others compared,
With cunning of serpents see 'vantage in chains,
In fetters and durance, 'til no goodness remains,
Lingers only the shadow. The church and its sects
Hav molded, remolded, and reared with defects,
Until those who once knew it now know it no more,
A sad metamorphose, decayed to the core,
Gangrened and putrescent and reeking with gore,
'Til Time, the avenger, will no more endure.
By a law that comes uppermost only to cure
Makes cowled priest and robed bishop and laymen, their tools,
All smeared with corruption, relinquish base rules,
Resign their dark powers, plans hellish unfold,
Reveal cabalistics that turn the blood cold;
Send dogmas a begging, though deities weep,
For 'twill ever be fate that mythologies sleep.
How many there are no awakening shall know
Lying stark in the lap of the weird long ago?
The sand-whitened soils of old Asia yet show
The footprints of dervish and Brahman that lo!
In the many fled centuries were wont to repair
To temple or forest for prestige or prayer,
But not to dethrone the 'curst spirit of caste,
Though Buddha himself viewed its empire so vast
With doleful regret as a blight and a bane
That the garb sacerdotal intact might remain.
It is taught in this great moral world there abides
A law compensating whatever betides,
A power of recompense equal to pay
For the misery and suffering that fall in our way;
But when man in the name of religion can press
The hard foot of oppression without thought of redress,
Without fear of penalty, with impunity draw
The life-blood, I doubt the compensativ law.
The Christ of the Brahman 'twere sinful to know,
Though millions hav made him their worship below;
And the Veda's as sacred in the land of the East
As book ever handled by prelate or priest.
The immortal Zoroaster, the bright living star
Of the Persian's devoted, yet shines from afar,
And their loved Zend Avesta yet gladdens their souls
Like the fire they imagin Zoroaster controls.
In the cavern of Heru a son of the waste
Inspiration on plate-bones of camels has traced,
And scimeters gleam brightly and thick as the sands
Of Sahara, when the book of Mahomet commands.
Confucius too, so grand in his clime,
Gave laws immaculate, precepts divine.
The Chinamen, like other men of all time,
Some great and some small, must each suited be,
And thus their religion is just what we see.

The Orient has its faiths divine
To waft its souls on high.
In fond belief, each sacred shrine,
The only true, secure in mind,
The votaries liv and die.

The gods and demi-gods no more,
Yet Europe holds her creeds
Of symbol, saint, apostle, Christ,
And mystic marvelous deeds.

Where mighty forests decked a world,
Three hundred years agone,
And red men roved its wilds supreme
In their own nativ home.



Their dream of happy hunting-grounds
Where the Great Spirit dwells—
Of warriors brave, and dark-eyed maids—
The gloom of death dispels.

Religions all—the Moslem, Greek,
The Christian and the Jew;
The Deist, Atheist, Infidel—
Theirs are religions too.
We know but this—grand nature's laws,
Rich in the truths sage wisdom draws,
Afford religion true.

The object of this work is to point ont the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then to trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.
It contains quotations from nearly all the sacred books of heathen nations, and from other rare and valuable works which are not accessible to people in general. The chapters are so arranged that it is a perfect cyclopædia of reference. Years of research would be necessary to discover all the information it contains. It is a most searching investigation into the origin of Christianity. Every fact is verified by copious notes and authorities, so that it may be trusted as a thoroughly reliable work. It contains information which will be startling to many.

MANHOOD!

KNOW THYSELF.
A Book for Every Man!
Young, Middle-aged, and Old.
The untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase and read the new medical work published by the Peabody Medical Institute, Boston, entitled the Science of Life: or, Self Preservation. It is not only a complete and perfect treatise on Manhood, Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in man, Errors of Youth, etc., but it contains one hundred and twenty-five prescriptions for acute and chronic diseases, each one of which is invaluable, so proved by the author, whose experience for 21 years is such as probably never before fell to the lot of any physician. It contains 300 pages, bound in beautiful embossed covers, full gilt, embellished with the very finest steel engravings, guaranteed to be a finer work in every sense—mechanical, literary, or professional—than any other work retailed in this country for $2.50, or the money will be refunded in every instance. Price only $1.25. Gold Medal awarded the author by the National Medical Association. Illustrated sample sent on receipt of six cents. Send now.

Giving some account of the International Freethinkers' Congress held at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was a delegate, followed by a description of what he saw in England, France, Holland, and Italy. The letters from Rome alone are worth the price of the book. With a steel-plate portrait of the author. 850 pages. $1.50.

The Semitic Gods and the Bible. Treating upon the gods of the Semitic nations, including Allah, Jehovah, Satan, the Holy Ghost, Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the Bible. To the latter 230 pages are devoted, showing that book to be a very inferior production for a first-class God. 333 large pages. Paper covers, 60 cents; cloth, $1.

Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism examined historically and critically. It is thought to be the most damaging exhibit of Christianity that has appeared. 500 large pages. Price, $1.50.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. 700 pages. Paper covers, 75 cents; cloth, $1.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate on Christianity and Infidelity, between D. M. BENNETT and Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY. This book has had a very large sale, and is a splendid work for Freethinkers to loan to Christian neighbors. 550 pages. Price, $1.

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. BENNETT and CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

BENNETT affirms; MAIR denies. This is an exhaustiv discussion. Price, $1.50.

Trial of D. M. Bennett in the United States Circuit Court upon the charge of depositing prohibited matter in the mail. This givs a full history of this celebrated case, and shows what monstrous injustice was perpetrated upon MR. BENNETT. Price, cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

By JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest, who, after a pastorate of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his last will and testament to his parishioners, and to the world, the work entitled, "Common Sense."

Meslier's book is a death-kn ll to all religions, also to all imaginary nonentities. It is only a commendable act of justice to say that his work is unanswerable. It is lucid in style, and undoubtedly one of the most powerful appeals in behalf of reason, common sense, and justice that ever was produced in any age or country.

THE BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?

BY

Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

By H. S. Brown, M. D.,

Author of "A Permanent Republic cannot be established by Despotic Family Laws," "Scientific Spiritualism is the Basis or a Scientific Religion and Government," and other works.

"This volume is most respectfully dedicated to those persons who will cordially unite with others to establish the religion of truth and a just government, by the scientific methods of reason, experience, experiments and observations. For this is the way to wisdom, and to the material, mental, moral, social, and spiritual sciences, that make peace on earth and good will among men."

The work is divided into five books, containing twenty-five chapters, is printed on clear white paper, in large type and embraces over four hundred pages.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS.

Conversation in verse between the two great reformer

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Price, 10 cents. THE TRUTH SEEKER,

21 Clinton Place, New York

Gems of Thought.

IT is from bondage to the terrible nightmare of the middle ages that I, in common with many others, would liberate the human mind; for, in order to do this, we find it necessary to cut loose from the entire system. Do not mistake me. We do not renounce all religion, but we project a new meaning into the word. To us religion no longer means the holding of a set of mystical ideas upon speculativ subjects. It means, instead, enthusiasm for noble morality, for exalted goodness; and it has for its aim the production of right social relations and the idealization of the human race. To this position I hav come, not suddenly, as some say, but as the result of long and painstaking study. For years the trend of my thoughts has been in this direction.—Miln's Farewell Discourse.

THE life in us works outwardly to some extent. It often writes something of its judgment, day by day, in face and feature. The passions tell their tale. The muddled, bloated face, of intemperance; the keen, ferret look, of the covetous; the coarse, animal features, of the profligate; and, in lesser degree, the showy affectation of the vain, the simpering, silliness of the frivolous, these are all revelations of judgments which do not wait for any special day. And, on the other hand, goodness of every kind reveals itself, reveals something of its judgment as life goes on; thoughtfulness, with its look of intelligence; integrity, in the open eye, which can "look the whole world in the face;" kindness and gentleness, that touch the countenance with qualities which little children and dumb animals can read there.—Brooke Herford's Day of Judgment.

SOON as the potion works, their human countenance,
The express resemblance of the gods, is changed
Into some brutish form of wolf or bear,
Or ounce, or tiger, hog, or bearded goat.
All other parts remaining as they were;
And they—so perfect is their misery—
Not once perceive their foul disfigurement,
But boast themselvs more comely than before;
And all their friends and nativ home forget,
To roll with pleasure in a sensual sty.
—Milton's Cosmos.

THE brave man is not he who feels no fear,
For that were stupid and irrational;
But he whose noble soul its fear subdues
And bravely dares the danger nature shrinks from.
—Joanne Baillie.

IN the Rig Veda we see how the divine appears in the fire and in the earthquake, and in the great and strong wind which rends the mountain. In Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason," the divine is heard in the still, small voice—the categorical imperativ—the I ought, which nature does not know and cannot teach. Everything in nature is or is not, is necessary or contingent, true or false. But there is no room in nature for the ought, as little as there is in logic, mathematics, or geometry. Let that suffice, and let future generations learn all the lessons contained in that simple word, I ought, as interpreted by Kant.—Max Muller.

WE belong to the minutiæ of nature; we are in her sight as the raindrop in the sky; whether a man livs or whether he dies is as much a matter of indifference to nature as whether a raindrop falls upon the field and feeds a blade of grass, or falls upon a stone and is dried to death. She does not supervise these small details. This discovery is by no means flattering, but it enlarges our idea of the scheme of creation. That universe must indeed be great in which human beings are so small.—Martyrdom of Man.

WHEN the English liturgy was written (say 1548), wealth meant well-being. Well-being is now money. Ask what a man is worth, the answer is his rent-roll. Has he been fortunate? He has made a good speculation, or he has inherited a "legacy," when he did not expect it. . . . The standard of human value has become again what it was under the Cæsars, and which Christianity came into the world to declare that it was not. People continue to go to church. They continued then to go to the temples. They say their prayers in public, and perhaps in private. So they did then. The clergy pray for rain or for fine weather, or, on great occasions, such as the potato blight, the archbishop issues a special form of petition for its removal. But the clergy and the archbishop are equally aware, all the time, that the evils which they pray against depend on natural causes, and that a prayer from a Christian minister will as little bring a change of weather as the incantation of a caffre rain-maker. We keep to conventional forms because none of us likes to acknowledge what we all know to be true; but we do not believe—we do not even believe that we believe—the bishops no more than the rest of us; no more than the college of augurs in Cato's time believed in the sacred chickens. —Froude's Science and Theology.

[NOTE. Twenty or thirty years ago a deputation of his country clergymen waited on his "lordship," the first bishop of Toronto, to get his authority for turning on the prayer for rain; but John Toronto, the same funny dogmatist that Carlyle holds up to scorn in his Reminiscences, told them that "it was no use praying for rain as long as the wind sat in its present quarter." What a mixture of sense and silliness —"dirt and deity"—does this episcopal deliverance represent!—Hylax.]

LUKE, xiv, 26, and Matthew x, 34–36. The teaching of Jesus is, in fact, save yourself by yourself. The teaching of humanity should be, to save yourself save your fellow. The human family is a vast chain, each man and woman a link. There is no snapping off one link and preserving for it, isolated from the rest, an entirety of happiness.—Charles Bradlaugh.

RING out the old, ring in the new,
Ring happy bells across the snow;
The year is going, let him go,
Ring out the false, ring in the true.

Ring out the grief that saps the mind,
For those that here we see no more;
Ring out the feud of rich and poor,
Ring in redress to all mankind.
—Tennyson.

Odds and Ends.

IN Siam the people worship the elephant. In this country they only want to see him.

THE individual who was injured by the accidental discharge of his duty is still very low.

CHINA and Japan buy our dried apples freely. Thus does American industry help to swell the population of the orient.

NEW YORK is to hav a Presbyterian conference next month, and landladies and pretty girls would do well to roost high.

A BUFFALO girl never has her wedding dress made in that city, for fear that somebody will say she was married in a buffalo robe.

"WHAT, giv a prize to your son? He still persists in doing nothing." "Well, should he not hav the prize for perseverance, then?"

CAUCUSES for town meetings will soon be in order. A caucus is where thirty or forty men get together and vote as one man tells them to.

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL president left a southern town the other day forever, without taking a cent of the people's money with him. He died.

IT rather annoys a woman after she has had a child christened some romantic Indian name to learn that the name translated means "old boots."

A LITTLE fellow going to church for the first time, where the pews were very high, was asked, on coming out, what he did in church, when he replied, "I went into a cupboard, and took a seat on the shelf.

A MAN at a hotel fell the whole length of a flight of stairs. Servants rushed to pick him up. They asked him if he was hurt. "No," he replied, "not at all. I'm used to coming down that way; I'm a life insurance agent."

PROF. WIGGINS, the Canadian astronomer, says that the great wind-storm which he predicts for the 9th of this month will travel from east to west. Unless Mr. Talmage can be induced to lecture in an opposit direction great destruction of property is feared.

IN a Sunday-school the teacher had been explaining the text, "Let your loins be girded." Wishing to see if they understood the explanation, he said to a boy: "Well, tell me now how and why we are commanded to gird up our loins." "To keep up our breeches, sir," replied the youth.

"I AIN'T voted in eight year, an' I didn't see no fun in it then," remarked a colored citizen. "I'se got no edykashun an' I dunno who to vote for. I might vote for a man for sheriff ter-day an' ter-morrer he'd come an' 'rest me. I dunno' nothin 'bout votin, an' I'se gwine ter stay at home an' work."

OLD Mr. Jones was always paying his attention to the widow of Tompkins, and she detested him from Dan to Beersheba. He was forever taffying her and asking her silly questions. The other evening, after a bold compliment, he asked, "My dear madam, how do you tell a fool when you see one?" "Well, Mr. Jones, I usually tell one to leave. Will you be kind enough to go?" He hasn't stopped going yet.

THE country editor now takes up his pen to say: "We hav received from Hon. Fixem Perkins, member of Congress, several very valuable public documents, for which he will please accept our thanks." Then he lays it down again, and calls out to the office boy: "Here, John, throw these into the waste-paper barrel," adding to himself, "Old junk's increasing pretty fast these days—Great country! Great country!"

A MAN tells you that he has been working all day like a dog, when you know and he knows that a dog doesn't work at all. He tells you that the sky last evening was as black as ink, leaving your mind in a state of uncertainty as to whether the sky was blue or red, either of which it might hav been, according to his simile. Then he tells you that so-and-so is as mad as a hatter, as though hatters were more prone to anger than the average human being!

A CHICAGO man got drunk and turned in eight fire alarms before he was arrested, says the Milwaukee Sun. We don't blame him. We took a drink of Chicago whisky at the time of the Masonic conclave, and would hav given ten dollars if a fire-engin had played a two-inch stream down our throat for five minutes. There is nothing that will make a countryman feel like turning in a fire-alarm like a few drinks of Chicago whisky. The man should be acquitted on the ground that he had to turn in an alarm or burn up.

A GOOD story is told of the French actress Dejazet which is worth repeating. Soon after the first production of "M. Garat" she went on the road. At Dijon she was visited by two ladies who wanted to ask her if the piece was one which two maiden ladies could with propriety witness. She assured them that the piece was quite inoffensiv, but they still kept up their questions. At last she assumed an air of confidence, and said in a solemn tone, "Now, I'll tell you everything. I usually play without any clothes on, but to-night, on account of your scruples, I will keep on my stockings." The spinsters fled.

THE real sentiment of the Israelites in regard to Jerusalem and the Holy Land was admirably illustrated by a conversation we overheard on Austin avenue only a few days ago. Mose Schaumburg met Sylvain Levy, and the former said:

"Moses, don't forget dot next Chewsday ve Chews must put on sackcloth mit ashes, and weep like the teyfel."

"Vy should ve Chews weep next Chewsday more den on any udder day?" asked Levy.

"Pecause next Chewsday vas dat day on which Jerusalem was destroyed py de Romans."

"Ish dot so?"

"It ish chust so."

"But I don't see vy ve should veep on dot Chewsday ven Jerusalem vash destroyed any more den on any udder day. Ve don't own any property in dot town."

"Dot's vot I say," was the philosophic response.—Texas Siftings.

DR. THAYER'S

Magnetic Clothing

Is a stimulant and sedativ nerve tonic, identical with that dynamic force that is eliminated from the brain, and moves along our nervous tissues.

It penetrates and searches the blood, throwing off and out all poisonous matter through the pores of the skin, when all medicines fail.

It stimulates the absorbents to take up the nutriment and in its distribution to repair waste tissues.

It is quick in action, and gives permanent and ready relief to the afflicted in different diseases.

Do you suffer with functional, physical, or nervous debility? Are our female readers broken down in health and spirits from disorders peculiar to their sex, arising from a prostration of the nervous system?

Why then further neglect a subject so productiv of health, when there is at hand a means of cure?

Why not throw off the yoke of bondage altogether, and seek a remedy that has science and common sense to commend it?

It is a remedy of indisputable efficacy to the restoration of health and vigor.

Physicians indorse it, and the goods indorse themselvs. During the past two years "Victoria" has been purchased by hundreds, and their united testimony is that it has no equal for curing disease.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last word penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited, The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

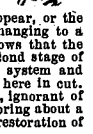
DR. FELLOWS



A REGULARLY educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove,

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES,

Spermatorrhœa and Impotency,

As the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions, (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an EXTERNAL APPLICATION in from 30 to 60 days. No medicine taken. It has never been known to fail!

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in cut. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.

☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

"PRIVATE COUNSELOR"

Sent to any address, securely sealed, for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhœa or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞Remember a radical cure is certain. Address, plainly, DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey, and say in what paper you saw this advertisement.

Notes and Clippings.

HENRY GEORGE'S "Progress and Poverty" is exciting much attention in Holland, where it has been translated into Dutch by M. Straatman.

THE theory of Romberg, that neuralgia is the prayer of the suffering nerve for healthy blood and more of it, is now generally received by physicians.

DR. HAYS, a Presbyterian preacher, of Denver, Col., says the offices of that state are nearly all held by Infidels. He thinks an increase of skeptics may be looked for in that state.

ACCORDING to a writer in the Journal of Mental Science, the popular belief that men of great intellectual powers hav large heads is not borne out by facts. An examination of busts, pictures, medallions, intaglios, etc., of the world's celebrities points the other way.

A NEW ZEALAND parson, who combined usury and religion, recently accumulated a fortune. Yet he had almost starved himself to death, through his nature becoming so miserly. He was discovered in a state of destitution, and removed for medical treatment. And yet this man used often preach upon the folly of laying up treasures upon earth.

"JIMMY" ELLIOTT, the prize-fighter, was shot and killed on the 2d inst. in the Tivoli restaurant, on Dearborn street, Chicago, by "Jery" Dunn, a sporting man. The killing was the result of a quarrel between the two men. Nine shots were fired between them, and then they clinched and hammered each other with the butt end of their pistols. Elliott's last words were, "I'm done up; send for a priest." As the priest did not arrive in time, nobody knows where Elliott may be now.

THE Rev. Mr. Seymour, of Chicago, tells a story about a boy who was full of the old Nick, and his mother became exhausted in trying to reason with him, and decided to punish him, and got a rod with which to warm his jacket. The boy belonged to the Sunday-school, and when the mother came for him he fell upon his knees, raised his hands as he had been told to do when he wanted to ask anything of the Heavenly Father, and said, as quick as he could, "O Lord, please don't let her hit me. But I'll bet a dollar you will." The elder does not say what the mother did in the emergency, but if she let up, and put the rod away, that child will believe in the efficacy of prayer, until some day when it fails to work, and he gets trounced.

THE Bradford Era thinks that were the whipping post established in Pennslvania some minister would be the first to feel its benefits. It remarks: "It is well that the suggestion for a whipping post in Pennsylvania comes from an orthodox minister of the faith. Had it emanated from any other source it would hav provoked endless remonstrance from the people all over the land. The more Liberal of our ministers may condemn it, but the fact that one of their number has the audacity to propose such a law goes to prove that there is a deep-seated bigotry which centuries of time and progress in civilization hav not been able to destroy. It is to be regretted in a few particulars that the prospects are so dim for the adoption of the whipping post, as the opportunities for using it are frequent and unmistakable. Some of the most sensational scandal of the age derives its origin from the class to which our beloved pastor above referred to belongs. If such a backward step in human progress was possible, we firmly believe that the first case we would be called upon to chronicle would be the full extent of the law with a full accompaniment of lashes, on some amorously-inclined and not overscrupulous minister of the gospel. Wordly folks, many of whom are very bad, might suddenly follow, but it would be in the regular channels to hav a bigoted and indiscreet minister head the list."

THE son of a Baptist clergyman is in the penitentiary of Philadelphia. He served during the war as a lieutenant, but, on being honorably discharged, promptly and deliberately became a thief. He has spent most of his time since in prisons. Lately an attempt was made to get him pardoned, and it was essential that he should show contrition. "I hav no desire to go back into respectable society," he coldly said; "having been a criminal and associate of criminals so many years, I prefer to end my days among them."

DURING divine services in the Austin Blue Light Tabernacle, several colored gentlemen, seeking refuge from the rain, entered the sacred edifice, intending to remain there until the rain had subsided, but Parson Whangdoodle Baxter raised such a storm that they were glad to get back into the rain again. "We reads," said the good man, pounding on the pulpit with his fist, "we reads in de good book ob wicked men makin' de church a cloak to cover up dar sins, but you sinners are a heap wusser. You ain't satisfied wid using de church as a cloak. You use de church as an umbrella."—Texas Siftings.

REVIVALISTS, it seems, do not save souls for nothing. The Chicago Inter-Ocean thus speaks of one of them: "If all the stories that are told about him are true, the revivalist Harrison, who has recently been ministering to the people of Decatur, should pray earnestly to be delivered from the sin of covetousness. Almost everywhere he goes he gets into a row about his pay. He charges $100 a week for leading lost sheep into the fold, and insists upon payment in advance. While in Decatur he made short trips into neighboring towns to hold single meetings, for which his terms are $25, and when the committee on finance attempted to deduct the amount he had received for outside meetings while he was in their employment, to use an ungodly expression, he 'kicked,' and demanded his full price per week, whether he gav full service or not. The disposition to mingle cupidity with a desire to rescue wayward souls has made Mr. Harrison considerable trouble heretofore. Last summer the people of an Ohio town erected and furnished a house for him, wherein he might rest from his labors when his flesh grew weak, and were very much astonished to discover that he sold it and pocketed the money as soon as the property was conveyed to him."

THE Sunday Mercury is vigorous in its opposition to our Sunday laws. In its issue of last Sunday it says: "The legislature has taken no definit action yet on the amendments to the Field Sunday Blue laws, notwithstanding all the promises that were made by our city's representativs. Citizens are still arrested by policemen at the instance of fanatical busybodies, and fined for violating the provisions of a law directly at war with the fundamental principles of the federal and state Constitutions and every phase of American republican government. Lately, a man was fined for selling five cents' worth of crackers on Sunday, and another for keeping open a door of his saloon, although he stated that it was to deliver to customers some bottles which had been filled and purchased by them on Saturday. Here and there the religious spies ply their mean and voluntary avocations, and nobody has yet thought of the propriety of arresting them for conspiracy. It is said that the country members stand in the way of repealing or modifying the Blue laws. If so, those gentlemen should remember that a law which may do no particular harm in rural districts can work great outrages in large cities, and of all others this metropolis; and further, that a law which may be applicable to small towns is inapplicable to the metropolis, where its operation must sooner or later bring it into contempt. It would be well if the country members should bear in mind the fact that support of the Blue laws and their continuance in this heterogeneous city is developing actual damage to the cause of Christianity. It is hinted that Mr. Field is keeping watch over his bantling, the penal code. Perhaps he desires to emulate somewhat the Spartan lawgiver, who gave Sparta a code and made its citizens promis never to repeal it until he returned to liv among them, which he never did. It is a pity that the great New York penal codifier did not exile himself before he got up his code at all. Anyway, he will never liv as a benefactor in the memory of New Yorkers. There is too much of the Draconian and too little of the Spartan in the penal code to urge men to love and cherish it. Beyond doubt, it is the wildest botch-work ever perpetrated in this generation. The Blue laws are worthy the tenth and twelfth centuries, and was Hallam alive he might well notice them in a new edition of his 'Middle Ages' as a specimen of modern retrogradation. Blot from the statutes the whole Sunday iniquity. That is the progressiv way. But if not, then pass the proposed assembly amendments, and a future legislature will repeal the iniquity in toto."

AT the suggestion of Colonel Ingersoll, Captain Kidd, for many years court crier at Springfield, Ill., a great genius in his way, has taken the lecture field, his subject being "Lincoln." He opened in Washington recently to a large audience, drawn largely to hear Ingersoll's introduction, which was as follows: "We are to hear a lecture about Abe Lincoln, not Lincoln the president, Lincoln the liberator, Lincoln the statesman, but Lincoln the lawyer, Lincoln the man—something of him as he was when he fell heir to agony and to fame, something about his mode of life, his habits, his thoughts, his wishes, that is to say, his daily life, because such peculiarities in their characters are omitted by their biographers. Nearly every great figure of history is a kind of great monstrosity. We know nothing about Washington. He is a steel engraving. No dirt of humanity clings to his boots. We will hear about Lincoln, who lived where men were free and equal, and was acquainted with the people, not much with books. Every man is in some sort a book. He lived the poem of the year in the fields, the woods, the blessed country. Lincoln had the advantage of sociability. He was thoughtful, and saw on the horizon of his future the perpetual star of hope. To him every field was a landscape; every landscape a poem; every flower a lesson, and every grove a fairyland. Oaks and elms are far more poetical than streets or houses. A country life is in itself an education. It givs the man an idea of home. He hears the rain on the roofs, the rustle of the breeze, the music of nature's fullest control. You hav no idea how many men education spoils. Colleges are institutions where brickbats are polished and diamonds dimmed. If Shakspere had graduated at Oxford he would hav become a pettifogging attorney or a hypocritical parson. Lincoln's education was derived from men and things, and hence he had a chance to develop. He had many sides. He not only had laughter, but he had tears, and never that kind of solemnity which is a mask to hide the features. He was not afraid to seek for knowledge where he had it not. When a man is too dignified he ceases to learn. Lincoln was a logician. Logic is capacity; it is the child of a good heart and a good head. He was always honest with himself. He was an orator; that is, he was natural. If you wish to be sublime you must keep close to the grass. You must sit close to the heart of human experience; above the clouds it is too cold. If you want to know the difference between an orator and a speaker read the oration of Lincoln at Gettysburg, and then read the speech of Everett at the same place. One came from the heart, the other was born out of the voice. Lincoln's speech will be remembered forever. Everett's no man will read. It was like plucked flowers. If you want to find out what a man is to the bottom, giv him power. Any man can stand adversity—only a great man can stand prosperity. It is the glory of Abraham Lincoln that he never abused power only on the side of mercy. He was a perfectly honest man. When he had power he used it in mercy. He loved to see the tears of the wife whose husband he had snatched from death."

News of the Week.

A STREET-CAR cable-road is to be tried in this city.

THE River and Harbor bill died with the last Congress.

ALEXANDER H. STEVENS, governor of Georgia, died on Sunday last.

WIGGINS, the Canadian weather prophet, predicts a terrible storm for to-day.

BEN BUTLER has written a letter denying that he ever stole spoons or horses in New Orleans.

A STEAMER from Boston to London took over 711 head of cattle and 1570 sheep on a recent voyage.

THE comet which was discovered last week is moving away from the sun and rapidly growing fainter.

ELIHU ROOT has been appointed United States District Attorney in place of Stewart L. Woodford, kicked out.

THE steamboat Yazoo, from New Orleans to Bayou Macon, was capsized by the wind on Sunday night, and sixteen persons were drowned.

CONGRESS adjourned on the 4th. Most of its members hav been permanently retired by the people from further participation in national legislation.

CLEVELAND has vetoed the Five-cent Fare bill, and the elevated roads of this city are still privileged to charge double what it is worth to carry passengers.

FOUR thousand persons assembled in Cooper Institute, this city, last Monday night to celebrate the 106th anniversary of the birth of Robert Emmet, the Irish patriot.

LETTERS which hav been intercepted reveal the fact that six thousand men are enrolled in the secret society which has been forming in the north of England, and are amply provided with funds and revolvers.

THE Sun thinks the Christian Advocate's explanation of the Isabella mining swindle only makes the case worse and its guilt more apparent. It still insists that a revival of good morals is necessary among the Methodist editors.

RAVONINAHITRINIARIVO, an embassador from Madagascar, was in this city last Sunday, and went to hear Dr. John Hall preach. He was regarded with great interest by the congregation, but it is not reported that anyone attempted to pronounce his name.

THE trial of thirty Socialists at Vienna was begun on Thursday, the 8th. The indictment details the evidence obtained connecting the accused persons with the Internationals and Herr Most. All are charged with treason and half with murder or complicity therein. The crimes were committed last summer.

THE Catholic priest of Jamaica, L. I., has withheld the "sacrament" from all of his congregation who attended a ball at that place lately. If his people wish to get square let them withhold all money from the church, and he will soon giv them the sacrament or anything else they want that he keeps in stock.

CONGRESS passed the tariff bill in the closing hours of the session. It is claimed that it will reduce the revenues about $65,000,000, of which reduction about $40,000,000 will come from the internal taxes. Of the $25,000,000 reduction in customs receipts, some $11,000,000 will come from the single article of sugar.

AT the Wagner memorial services at Finisbury, London, March 4th, Moncure D. Conway said there were periods in the history of the world when a new order of men came forth. This was shown in the era whereof Carlyle was the prophet, Emerson the interpreter, Darwin the first fruit in science, and Wagner in art.

Communications.

The Mischief that Good People Do.

Alexandria, capital of Egypt, under the Ptolemies, built 332 B.C., was the mistress of the world for centuries. Its command of the commerce of the Nile and the Red Sea, and of all the East and West; its life-throbbing canals; its magnificent theaters; its academy and museum, containing 400,000 of valuable books, and another library of 300,000 in the temple of Jupiter Serapis; its imposing towers in which the oracles discoursed of "Mystic Science;" its consecrated temples where the gods were worshiped; its 4,000 baths; its synagogs; its churches; its forests of masts; its mausoleum in which rested the ashes of Alexander, who founded the city; its hippodrome; its amphitheater; its groves, gardens, and fountains; its obelisks; its gilded roofs, glittering in the sun; its military prowess; its fashion and refinement — all made it the center of attraction for the thinkers of the enlightened nations. Thither they flocked—astronomers, navigators, inventors, poets, dramatists, generals, politicians, seers, and scientists of every rank and profession. There the scholars lived, and were supported, ate together, studied, conversed, instructed each other, and laid the civilizing foundations of the succeeding ages. Thither, too, the apostolic Christians flocked, fired with holy zeal to plant the cross beside the Egyptian circle that emblemized the eternity of life.

Zeal, however wanting in scholarship, zeal that is religious and enthusiastic, always has been a resistless power of conquest over tamer philosophical thought. It first enlists the ignorant masses, and when these are strong in numbers, they turn their attention to entrenchment in wealth. Then, when the once unpopular doctrin is established, it finds plenty of adherents of the honorable caste to giv it position and power.

In due time Christianity was planted in Alexandria. "Here might be seen wealthy Christian ladies walking the streets, their dresses embroidered with scripture parables, the gospels hanging from their necks by a golden chain; Maltese dogs with jeweled collars frisking around them, and slaves with parasols and fans trooping along."

Constantine elevated into power men destitute of learning, who determined to cut off every philosopher. They declared it was right to compel men to believe what the majority of society had accepted as truth, and if they refused, to punish them. When the Christians had conquered a position of comparativ defense, and Theodosius the Great reigned as a religious monarch over the Roman empire, which then covered even classic Egypt, the determination was to destroy all the heathen temples and their contents. Were they not good Christians? None more zealous and devoted ever lived. Why, then, this destruction? Because those temples were the nurseries of an antagonizing religion. What of the books in Serapis and the museum? They contained philosophies, sciences, biographies, histories, poetics, that never recognized the cross. Were they not dangerous to Christianity? "They must be blotted out!" was the order. With the fall of the temple went Serapis, too, and its library partly burnt and partly dispersed. No crime so dark was ever before committed—one so unpardonable to mankind. But for the unwise zeal of those devoted Christians, ancient civilizations, never known to the world, would hav been preserved. It was a mischief done by good people that can never be repaired.

But another scene in Alexandria, prior to the destruction of the temples and the library, invites our attention. Must not the renowned city be wholly Christianized? Would not its full conversion be for the glory of God? So reasoned the leading Christians there. But a formidable power was in the way. It was Hypatia, daughter of Theon, the mathematician, the pagan teacher, the beautiful priestess, the fair representativ of the Greek philosophy, the Platonic interpreter of "Mystic Science." Her lecture-room was crowded each day with the wealth and talent of Alexandria. Long trains of chariots were daily at her door. She had greater crowds than St. Cyrel, the Christian archbishop. Could that be endured? Notwithstanding all the prayers against her, and all argumentation to rebut her influence, the thoughtful went to the Academy of Hypatia the beautiful, to hear the questions discussed which hav never since been solved—"Where am I? What am I? What do I know?" She won. Cyrel was cast into the shade. Was it holy zeal? Was it fidelity to the cross to plot against the ruin of Hypatia? "The ends justify the means;" so reason the influential Christians. The scene is thus described by Draper:

"Cyrel at length determined to remove the great reproach, and overturn what now appeared to be the only obstacle in his way to uncontroled authority in the city. We are reaching one of those moments in which great general principles embody themselvs in individuals. It is Greek philosophy under the appropriate form of Hypatia; ecclesiastic ambition under that of Cyrel. Their destinies are about to be fulfilled. As Hypatia comes forth to her academy, she is assaulted by Cyrel's mob—an Alexandrian mob of many monks. Amid the fearful yelling of these bare-legged and black-cowlded fiends, she is dragged from her chariot, and in the public street stripped naked. In her mortal terror she is haled into an adjoining church, and in that sacred edifice is killed by the club of Peter the Reader. It is not always in the power of him who has stirred up the worst passions of a fanatical mob to stop their excesses when his purpose is accomplished. With the blow given by Peter, the aim of Cyrel was reached, but his merciless adherents had not glutted their vengeance. They outraged the naked corpse, dismembered it, and, incredible to be said, finished their infernal crime by scraping the flesh from the bones by oyster-shells, and casting the remnants into the fire. Though in his privacy St. Cyrel and his friends might laugh at the end of his antagonist, his memory must bear the weight of the righteous indignation of posterity."

'Twas then that freedom receded into night: "Two dreary, weary centuries things remained, until the Arabian conquerors avowed their true argument, the cimeter, and made no pretentions to superhuman wisdom." The Mohammedan astronomer made Eygpt illustrious again. Ever since has the sacred ground where Hypatia fell cried for redress; and the light of science set in fiery glare the name of the eloquent daughter of Theon, red-flaming for all the later thinkers to read and learn, that truth is bodily killed by virtuous superstition to spiritually rise again in other Hypatias who know how to discuss their rights to free thought, free speech, free ballot, and an honest count.

Do we stagger before Hypatia's fate? Do we curse Peter the Reader and St. Cyrel, the plotter of her death? Do we declare such persecutors and assassins were not conscientious men? Then must we arraign many of the greatest characters of the ages, men whom we hav been taught to revere, men whose strongest virtues, demarking their influence, were to defend what they sincerely believed was the truth.

Martyrs! Who make them martyrs? Good people! History never lies in this. No purer class ever lived than the Pharisees of Judea. Josephus says: "They despise delicacies of diet; they follow the conduct of reason, and what that prescribes to them as good they do." In the Pharisees and scribes were represented, says Kitto, "the elements of intellectual, moral, social, and religious influence." They were the scholarly, refined, and pious authorities of the Jewish government, set apart to interpret and preserve the laws and teachings of Moses. But greater persecutors never lived. They first laughed at the Nazarene; that not succeeding, they bedaubed his character, calling him a "wine-bibber and a gluttonous man." This failing, they tried argument, and were signally baffled. Next they tried to catch him in his words and commit him legally before the proper authority; but were defeated again. "The common people heard him gladly," and that alarmed them. At last they called a council, and thus resolved: "If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him, and the Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation." So they crucified him to get him out of their way, yet knowing he was a child of the angels. The teachers of his gospel shared a similar fate.

Christianity was planted in Jerusalem at last, in Athens, in Rome, in Alexandria, but not without the usual price paid for its right to a home and habitation. The devout men of the classic church and state persecuted the Christians for their innovating sentiment. They were dragged through the streets and mutilated to death, starved in dungeons, thrown into the arena of wild beasts and torn to pieces amid the jeers and shouts of the lords and rulers. It was not base, debauched men who instigated such cruelty, but men of probity, of high intellectual and moral eminence.

After Constantine the Great had conquered room for Christianity, he dying, his nephew, Julian, ascended the throne of the Cæsars. Disgusted at the bad example of his father's court, and at the schisms and persecutions that broke out in the bosom of the church then growing into power, to persecute in turn, the scholarly young emperor resolved to restore the old classic religion. This was in the fourth century. He wrote against Christianity. Then followed his successes by unparalleled persecutions. "Yet," says the historian, "Julian had many brilliant and some amiable qualities; his morals were pure and even austere." Buckle says he was "a prince of eminent probity, whose opinions are often attacked, but against whose moral conduct calumny itself has hardly breathed a suspicion."

Among the Roman emperors of the classic religion none excels Marcus Aurelius, of the second century. His writings hav descended to posterity. He was a public benefactor, noted for his natural sweetness of temper, ever breathing in all his maxims and laws "the purest sentiments of piety and benevolence." His was fearless, unflinching honesty, but his reign "was characterized by a persecution from which he would hav refrained had he been less in earnest about the religion of his fathers."

The Christians had a rest from persecution under Commodus, son of Aurelius Antoninus. He was beastly, licentious, and murderous, yet no persecutor. The same can be said of Heliogabalus, who, "though in other respects," says Mosheim, "the most infamous of all princes, and perhaps the most odious of all mortals, showed no marks of bitterness or aversion to the disciples of Jesus."

What of the Inquisition of Spain, established in 1208? It was manipulated by the most intelligent and pious men of those times. No country in the world can boast of so many ardent and disinterested missionaries and self-denying martyrs. The people ever hav been devout, the churches crowded, the clergy numerous. There the Inquisition flourished. Were the supporters of it hypocrits? No; enthusiastic men of undeviating and incorruptible integrity. Llorente, the Greek historian of the Inquisition, and its bitter enemy, is sorely puzzled at this fact. He does not and cannot even insinuate a charge of moral guilt against the inquisitors. Townsend, a clergyman of the English church, traveling in Spain about a hundred years ago, being prejudiced against the infamous system, speaking of an establishment of the kind at Barcelona, one of the most important branches, says: "All its members are of worth, and the most of them are distinguished for humanity." Yet these sincere devotees of the cross were principals in the most diabolical cruelties ever practiced upon heretics. During eighteen years of Torquemada's ministry, the Spanish Inquisition punished, according to the lowest estimates, 150,000 persons, of whom 8,800 were burnt. In Andalusia alone during a single year the Inquisition put to death 2,000 Jews, besides 17,000 who underwent some form of punishment less severe than that of the stake.

The old Bible says, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." In obedience to this barbarous law, not more than 200 years ago, mediums denounced as witches and wizards were executed for the crime of voicing the testimony of spirits and angels. The act of James I. against witchcraft was passed when Lord Bacon, one of the greatest minds that England has ever produced, was a member of the House of Commons, and Lord Coke, one of the most distinguished judges, was attorney-general, and, in the House of Lords, was referred to a committee which contained twelve bishops—twelve bishops! This accounted for the acts. Barrington says, "30,000 people were burnt for witchcraft within 150 years." Ingersoll sums up the cruelties of those times, as practiced upon heretics and witches: "They crushed their bones in iron boots, tore their quivering flesh with iron hooks and pincers, cut off their lips and eyelids, pulled out the nails and into the bleeding quick thrust needles; tore out their tongues, extinguished their eyes, stretched them upon racks, flayed them alive, crucified them with their head downward, exposed them to wild beasts, burnt them at the stake, mocked their cries and groans, . . . robbed their children, and then prayed God to finish the holy work in hell."

One of the most startling events of history is the French Revolution, at the close of the eighteenth century. The Catholic hierarchy had long been in power. During the reign of Louis XIV., years before, much was done to secure its dominion. The priests owned vast amounts of real estate. They were men of ability, pre-eminently conscientious, yet their tyranny was unparalleled. Regarding themselvs as the vicegerents of the infinit God, and that all truth must come through them, they interdicted all other thought, silenced the spirit of inquiry, maintaining any departure from the old methods was dangerous to morals and civil order. But that was an age when skepticism through intellectual growth was silently, like underground fires to a volcano, gaining strength. Master thinkers, writers, and speakers at length dared to question the ecclesiastic authority. The men of the church were morally shocked. They influenced the government which they controled to uproot the progressiv literature. During the seventy years succeeding the death of Louis XIV. nine out of ten of the literary men suffered from the government some grievous injury, all instigated by conscientious authorities. What were the thinkers guilty of? Uttering unpopular truth! Voltaire wrote master works; they were suppressed; some of them were burnt by the common hangman, and he himself whipped in the public streets and finally cast into prison. Rousseau was driven from France and his works publicly burnt. The celebrated treatis of Helvetius on the mind was also burnt, and the author compelled to write a recantation of his opinions. "Some of the geological views of Buffon, having offended the clergy, that illustrious Materialist was obliged to publish a recantation of doctrins which are now known to be perfectly accurate." Indeed, every work of intrinsic value was suppressed, and not unfrequently the author exiled or imprisoned by order of the conscientious authority of a state religion. Montesque, Marmontel, Marellet, Diderot, D'Holbach, all such lights also shared a similar fate. Diderot having written a work in which he said the "people who are born blind hav some ideas different from those who are possessed of their eyesight," was arrested, and, without even the form of a trial, was confined in the dungeon of Vincennes. All literature, except what was ecclesiastically dictated, was deemed dangerous to good mcrals and infamous in the sight of God. "There was neither free press nor free parliament, nor free debates. There were no public meetings; there were no popular suffrages; there was no discussion on the hustings; there was no habeas corpus act; there was no trial by jury. The voice of liberty thus silenced in every department of the state could only be heard in the appeals of those great men who, by their writings, inspirited the people to resistance." And resistance came unrelenting against the pious men of the state church. The reaction was as terrible as the action. The friends of freedom were as implacable as their enemies. The blood of the persecutors flowed into rivers; their lands were confiscated; it was a "reign of terror." Such was the fruit of the mischief that good people do. But the Revolution broke the chains of ministerial oppression, and France has breathed freer air ever since.

There is scarcely an exception to the rule in history that the most conscientious men are the persecutors of the reformers. What of Galileo for telling the truth that the earth is round and turns upon its axis once in twenty-four hours? Arrested for blasphemy against the scriptures, cast into prison, and compelled to recant to save his life! What of Bruno for discovering and announcing the plurality of worlds, detrimental to the universality of the vicarious atonement? Burnt at the stake! What of Bunyan for his truth? Imprisoned to write his "Pilgrim's Progress!" What of John Murray for declaring all souls will be saved? Imprisoned and there visited by the angels to persevere! What of our Fulton for constructing the first steam-engin—an engin which, improved since, has revolutionized the whole world? Abused, scorned, pronounced a maniac by the best people of New York! What of our Morse for inventing the telegraph to pulsate the race of man by the news of business and hearts, and quicken it to higher brotherhood? Laughed at by our wise congress, composed of such men as Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, Thomas Benton, Henry Clay, Sam Houston, all of whom treated his petition for an appropriation as the chimera of a madman.

The martyrs are strung all along the lines of science and religion. Things strangely take their turn in our world of strange developments on the way of progress. The old invariably persecutes the new, and when the new becomes the old it persecutes the new again.

> "So round and round we run,
> And ever the truth comes uppermost,
> And ever is justice done."

Done in due time. We reap what we sow. Who persecuted Luther for free opinions? Brethren of his church more intelligent and moral than himself? Who persecuted the Calvinistic schismatics of the Lutheran Reformation? The very good Lutherans? Who burnt Servetus at the stake for avowing his disbelief in the dogma that three persons are one person? That leather-hearted moral-dyspeptic, John Calvin. Who persecuted Henry VIII. for his audacity in reconstructing the old into the new Episcopal church? The more virtuous Catholics. Who scaffolded and murdered the Catholics? The Episcopals. Who persecuted and killed the Druids? St. Patrick's godly soldiers. Who persecuted and killed the followers of St. Patrick in Ireland? The prayerful and devoted Cromwell. Who persecuted the Wesleyans? The other Dissenters. Who persecuted the Swedenborgians for their new and better light? The Wesleyans and the rest. Who drove the Puritans to the bleak shores of New England, seeking a home where they might worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences? The good Tudors from Henry VIII. to Charles I. Who persecuted Roger Williams, and hung the Quakers, and the mediums of Salem? The most excellent and godly Puritans. Who refused to obey the edict of King James for the wise law of general religious toleration? The archbishop of Canterbury, and abetted in his dethronement. Who celebrated St. Bartholomew's day in France by a general massacre of the Huguenots? The pious Charles IX., and the pious clergy. Who, in France, in 1792, when he was a member of the National Assembly, arrested, imprisoned, and doomed to death Thomas Paine? The once persecuted leaders of the Revolution. What for? Because he was devoted to philanthropy and voted against capital punishment. Who, after he had written up American liberty, persecuted Thomas Paine over all the land and desecrated his grave? All the pious ministers of the churches. Who persecuted the Universalists? The Calvinists. Who persecuted the Spiritualists more bitterly than all the rest? The Universalists, because they lost more members by the better light. Who persecuted the Unitarians? The Trinitarians. Who persecuted the rationalistic and freedom-loving Theodore Parker? The Unitarians, that cradled him in the love of justice? Who persecuted and dragged by the neck in Boston the invincible Garrison, because he and his coadjutors defended the rights of Africans in bonds? The wise, good men of Congress, the pious men of all the churches. Who persecuted the Republicans organized to break the chains of slavery? The Democrats. Who hav persecuted the Greenbackers? The Republicans. Whom will the Greenbackers persecute? We shall know when they get into power.

Is there no end to this persecuting business? Ask the bleaching bones of the martyrs to truth. How can we reconcile crucifixions by the wise and eminent of all the ages, so contradictory to the principles of the religion they profess? Buckle attempts the solution by saying, "It is the holy zeal by which they are fired that quickened their fanaticism into a deadly activity." Again he says, "Diminish the sincerity, and you will diminish the persecution." But what if the sincerity is not there at all, is there then no persecution? During the French Revolution the skeptical leaders denied religion, lost all faith in it, had no religious sincerity; they denounced religion as a curse; the extreme action of the church zealots evoked this positiv antagonism; yet their persecutions against the ecclesiastics were even more cruel and bloody than any they had suffered. Are we then to look for persecution as dating in the belief of men? A man's belief, sincerely entertained, does modify his conduct. "As a man thinketh, so is he." The persecutors excuse their policy by this reasoning: "The church is God's, and we are the church. The law thereof is holy. To obey is to be saved. To disobey is to be damned. As there is a hell, it is our duty to prevent the world from tumbling into it? Therefore, stop all agitation menacing God's church and the established good order of society. Better kill a few followers of Satan than permit them to destroy all the world's chances for salvation." An authoritativ man, entertaining such views, would be a persecutor, and he might be a persecutor if he had no such belief.

The considerations of power antedate policy. This generally is ahead of sincerity. Men love eminence, position, control. Aside from religion, or science, or politics, men persecute; with neither of these, or all, they persecute. Persecution is indigenous to power; it grows out of selfhood—my kingdom. To be respectable and entrenched, men will whip themselvs and others into fashion, regardless of what moral judgment dictates. A man in power, who loves it for its advantages, feels a sense of obligation to protect his constituency under the avowed policy that installed him. Most of men seem to think there is honor, even when they know there is no higher law than they can voice. Politicians do this now, the same as they ever did. Many an aspirant will concede to the prejudices or notions of the party that elects him, all for the sake of office. Does he deliberately calculate the principles involved? The calculation is a matter of chance for success. When in office, he still defends what he espoused from policy, to be consistent and retain public confidence, and will then even plot against the party which opposed him and which in secret he may sincerely believe is right. This kind of principle passes for honor. It is "honor among thieves."

Judging, then, the motivs of men in the past by the motivs of men in the present—human nature being the same in all ages, modified by circumstances—we conclude that, as a rule, neither learning, nor morality, nor so-called religion, but love of power, is the cause of persecution. For power and its respectability men and women will join the most popular church in town, not because they know anything about the creed, or care anything about it, but because it pays, brings trade, secures position. God, or godliness—what has that to do with it? The power they hav involves a responsibility; they assume it with ardor, and their ardor burns to persecution against anybody and everybody who menaces their church. They turn up their noses, put on Sunday sulks, look solemn during service, as all hypocrits can, and consent to a hell for heretics, even if they don't believe a bit in it. They pass as Christians, when if Christ himself were to enter their church with his retinue of ragged fishermen with sandals on they would show him the door, and piously entrust him to the keeping of the police, under the charge of disturbing divine service.

Are all so? Is there no genuin principle moving the human soul to activity? Each age has its reformers—men and women born so; honest because natural to them; lovers of truth and right because these qualities are of them. They are inspired. They are the Christs. They are iconoclasts and builders too. Do the laws of church and state co-operate? No, their power is menaced. They persecute to hold power, but when a change is inevitable the persecutors advance, the multitude follows, and the new civilization is established.

Abolitionism was opposed by the American church. Why? Because slavery was the prime factor in its support. Congress opposed it; state legislation opposed it; the press opposed it. But by the fidelity of the Radicals in arms, slavery fell. Then all were Abolitionists, and the church claimed the glory of it!

Thus it has ever been through the ages. Every new movement, however just—and the more just the greater the peril—has had to run the gantlet, paying for its freedom. When ascendant, the persecutors fortify themselvs under the new order of things, not transformed, but conformed. Soon that new becomes the old, and these conservativs persecute the next movement for advance. To palliate for persecution, they erect monuments to them they martyred. If it has not already, the church which threatened Galileo's life will yet canonize him. People deify Jesus, build shrines to his name, confess to him, yet crucify him afresh every day. Influential citizens shot Lovejoy, the Abolitionist, at Alton, Ill. Why? Because he agitated for the right, against their power. They will yet contribute to build a monument to commemorate his greatness. We might credit something to this disgusting gratitude, did we not see them persecuting the living reformers of today to shoot new martyrs for more monuments.

Looking at the world as it was and is, it is the sensible part to learn that, as there is an endless variety of things in nature, and an endless variety of the homo genus in ratio of mind to its organization, differences of genius, taste, and opinion are all the better for us. There is no need of duplicates among men and women any more than there is a need of more than one original a in the alphabet. We shall hav less mischief-making—indeed it will become obsolete—if in living out our own career we will let others do the same, on the principle of inalienable right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

That's it—liberality without intervention, without slavery; the liberality of a sunny philosophy; the liberality of candor that credits the truth of the past, noting its wrongs as lessons of warning not to repeat them. Liberality means toleration for all religion as fundamentally true; but whether true or not, it recognizes a right of acceptance or rejection at will. It means non-partisanship in principles, non-sectarianism in belief, with encouragement to all to think and speak freely for the most of truth and goodness in the development of individual genius. It means free investigation into all questions—political, religious, scientific, secular, educational, Materialistic, Spiritualistic. It means the eclecticism of all truth—free thought, free speech, free government, free religion. To be copyists of nature is to be liberal; of custom alone, is illiberal. To be religious in a common sense view is a charity broad enough to let everybody else enjoy equal blessings when equally earned. Nature is no respecter of persons; why should we interfere with her beneficence? The air is for all beings, the soil for all that liv on it and by it, the water for all that thirst, the sun for all plants and their precious freights; why should we presume to monopolize here, as if to say: "Out of our way, ye pagans?" Nature's atoms are pregnant with life to bless; all her roses, and beauties, and fragrances are proffered without measure. Why not let human souls bloom and be equally sweet and beautiful? Whoever is thus inspired to liv and do is liberal beyond sect, party, or nation. Irrespectiv of race or caste, man is his brother, woman is his sister; to do good is his religion, and equal laws to bless mankind his politics. Here science attires herself with modesty; here religion becomes nature's laws obeyed. The first is an altar of intellect; the second is a shrine of devotion. Here liberality is fed; here, where no creed can fetter, where no priest can deny, where no persecution can destroy, liberality plumes herself for flight into the realms of eternal progress.

> "'Tis coming up the steep of time,
> And this old world is growing brighter!
> We may not see its dawn sublime,
> Yet high hopes make the heart throb lighter.
> We may be sleeping in the ground
> When it awakes the world in wonder,
> But we hav felt it gathering round,
> And heard its voice of living thunder.
> 'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!"

Mr. Green's "Freethought Directory."

Mr. H. L. Green is engaged in a work I think will greatly advance the cause of Liberalism if he can hav the co-operation of the Liberal public generally. I particularly refer to the effort he is making to collect the names of all the men and women in the United States and Canada who are willing to be publicly known as Freethinkers, and to publish the name of each with his or her post-office address in his "Freethought Directory."

He has now about twenty-five hundred names. He should hav twenty-five thousand, but we do not expect he will be able to obtain that number.

I desire to urge every Freethinker in the United States and Canada to not only forward his or her name and post-office address to Mr. Green, but also obtain as long a list of other names as possible. Such a list of names as Mr. Green desires to obtain and publish will be very valuable to Freethought publishers, Freethought lecturers, and the Liberal public generally.

I earnestly request every person who feels interested in the Freethought movement to aid Mr. Green in his grand undertaking. He charges, we understand, twenty-five cents for the first insertion, and after that, nothing.

Discussion.

Lincoln's Religion.

One of the very best, greatest, and noblest of mankind, Abraham Lincoln, was assassinated on the night of April 14th, 1865, in a theater, intently listening to the play of the Country Cousins. Eighteen years will soon hav rolled by since that sad event. Soon after the tragic death of Lincoln, I was written to by many persons to giv the facts and my opinion of his religious life. I refused for some years to write anything for publication, though I talked about it freely and by private letter. At last, at the request of many, and among them, I think, Mr. F. E. Abbot, I concluded to comply with their wishes. I, in the year 1870, wrote the Abbot letter touching Mr. Lincoln's religion and his religious ideas. That letter will be found in Lamon's "Life of Lincoln" at pages 492–7. I was from 1865 to 1870 gathering up and collecting the facts of Lincoln's life. The Abbot letter contains the sum and substance of my efforts in this particular line. The letter is correct and substantially true in general and in every particular, and I refer to it here and make it a part of this letter. I hav nothing to retract from that letter, but in this I shall add something thereto. No man has refuted the Abbot letter, and no man can, I think, on evidence, contradict this. It is now nearly twelve years since I wrote the Abbot letter. Since these long years another and a new generation of people has come upon the scene of human action. It is a brave, reading, intelligent, and searching generation, demanding facts, figures, and principles as the sure foundations of its belief; it has no faith in the unseen and unknowable; it has no faith that comes and goes without evidence; it is a doubting age—an investigating age; it follows science and flatly denies supernaturalism. It is for this new generation that I write this letter touching Mr. Lincoln's religion. This is at once my excuse and justification. I affirm at the outset that Mr. Lincoln was an Infidel of the radical type, sometimes bordering on Atheism; and now the great question is: Was Lincoln an evangelical Christian? That question resolves itself into two others. 1st. Did Mr. Lincoln believe in the fall of man as related in the Bible? and 2d. Did he believe that Jesus was the Christ of God—the truly and only begotten son, as the Christian world contends? These are the questions to solve. The Christians assert, though they know or should know better, that Mr. Lincoln was a Christian in a theological sense. If this is not their meaning then it is admitted that Mr. Lincoln was not a Christian—only a rational Christian, and that is no Christian at all. It is not a question of kindness, goodness, generosity, tenderness, affection, and morality. These Mr. Lincoln had and more; he had honor, integrity, and general nobility. Mr. Lincoln was not a Christian in the general acceptation of that term; he did not believe in the fall of man, nor the miraculous conception, nor in the so-called divine revelation, nor miracle, nor in inspiration, as the Christian world contends.

Mr. Lincoln came into Sangamon county, down the North Fork of the Sangamon River in a frail canoe, in the spring of 1831. I can see from where I write the identical place where he cut the timbers for his flat boat, which he built at a little village called Sangamon Town, seven miles a little northwest of Springfield. Here he had it loaded with wheat, corn, bacon, and other provisions, destined for New Orleans, at which last place he landed in the month of May, 1831. He returned home about June of that year and finally settled in another little village called New Salem, on the high bluffs of the Sangamon River, then in Sangamon county and now in Monroe county, and about twenty miles northwest of this city. Mr. Lincoln lived in New Salem six years, and in 1837 he moved to the little town (now city) of Springfield, where he resided continuously till 1861, when he left for Washington—the president elect of this great people. I hav known Mr. Lincoln well since 1834; and since 1844, when he and I became partners in the law business, I think I knew him thoroughly inside and outside, top side and bottom side. There was a peculiar people in New Salem. The men were mostly doubters, skeptics, Liberals, Infidels, if you please. They listened to experience, nature, and reason; they were great, broad-minded Liberal men, brave, generous, kind, and a hospitable people to a fault. I knew them well—one and all; they were hard to whip and not easily to be fooled or cheated. With these rough but courageous people Mr. Lincoln was thrown for seven long years; he was one of them, and identical in his religious belief. I should before this hav said something of Mr. Lincoln's religious belief while he lived in Indiana. A gentleman who has deeply and thoroughly investigated this question, and who now livs in high life in a great state, says of Mr. Lincoln, while he lived in Indiana, that "he went to church there to mimic and came sway to mock." This is substantially correct. Mr. Lincoln left Indiana in his twenty-first year an Infidel, and held to it at New Salem, Springfield, and at Washington, and so died. This is beyond all reasonable controversy, if we can agree what it is that constitutes a Christian and an Infidel. A Christian is one who believes, among other things, that Jesus was the Christ of God. An Infidel is one who denies this, among other things. This test is fundamental and decisiv. No man can show that Mr. Lincoln believed in the miraculous conception of Jesus. Such a belief is blasphemous. While Mr. Lincoln lived in New Salem, he came across the works of Thomas Paine, Volney's "Ruins," and other such Liberal books. So strong was Mr. Lincoln's Infidelity in New Salem, and so burning were his convictions of the utter falsehoods of the Bible, that he felt it his duty to write and publish a little book on his Infidelity. In this book or pamphlet he attacked the Bible on two grounds: 1st. Its inherent contradictions; and 2d. On the grounds of its injustice—on the grounds of the highest human reason. He denied in that book the fall of man and the miraculous conception. This pamphlet was read by Mr. Lincoln to Maj. Samuel Hill, a good and true friend of his, who agreed substantially with him. Maj. Hill snatched the manuscript out of Mr. Lincoln's hands and threw it into the stove and burnt it up. Other living witnesses know this to be true. His reason for this was that Mr. Lincoln was then—1835–6—a rising young man, and Hill, as a discreet friend, knew that the book would forever damn Lincoln. This was the best deed ever done for Lincoln by any man.

Mr. Lincoln, in the year 1837, moved to the city of Springfield, a very little town, and then and there came across many people of his own belief, and I among them. I distinctly recollect their views, language, ideas, and philosophy. They called themselvs at that time Freethinkers. Some of these men were highly educated and polished gentlemen. Mr. Lincoln read in this city Hume, Gibbon, and other Liberal books. He was in this city from 1837 to 1861, an Infidel, Freethinker, Liberal, Free Religionist of the radical type. As Mr. Lincoln grew older he saw the absolute necessity of silence on this question; he only opened to a few, and then more by sharp questioning than by a long solid argument. When a certain nameless divine of this city delivered a lecture here on Mr. Lincoln's religion, he was compelled to entitle it, in substance if not in words, "The later life and religious sentiments" of Mr. Lincoln. No man ever said that Mr. Lincoln's life was not religious, or that he had no religious sentiments. All men are religious and hav religious sentiments, but all are not Christians. If such loose language as this divine's can screw up the courage of the Christian brotherhood to believe that Mr. Lincoln was a Christian, all right. Mr. Lincoln, while in New Salem, was accused of being an Atheist, and this arose from the fact that the people took the words Infidel, Freethinking, and Atheism as meaning the same thing; and even now the world cannot precisely distinguish the broad difference. Mr. Lincoln, I understand, denied that he was an Atheist. In Springfield, after the death of Mr. Lincoln, he was accused of being an Atheist by some. I felt it my duty, as I had the evidence—written evidence in my hand—to publish a letter written to John Johnson in 1851 by Mr. Lincoln. In that letter Mr. Lincoln acknowledges the existence of God, immortality, and heaven. The letter will be found in Lamon's "Life of Lincoln," at page 336. I showed this letter to several gentlemen who thoroughly knew Mr. Lincoln and his religious beliefs. They said substantially to me this: "The letter is only a word of consolation from a dutiful son to a dying father." I leave the question to the reader, and he must judge for himself. Had Mr. Lincoln been an absolute, positiv Atheist utterly denying the existence of God, that fact would not hav lessened him in my estimation. At times in the moments of his terrible gloom, thick as a fog-bank, there is no doubt that Mr. Lincoln bordered on Atheism—if not an out-and-out Agnostic. In Lincoln's better moments he was a Theist.

Mr. Lincoln left this city in 1861 an Infidel—Liberal—and so remained till he died on the morning of the 15th of April, 1865. I personally know many of the above facts to be true, of my own knowledge; and what I do not know personally, but assert to be true, I hav the overwhelming moral evidence to support and prove. I hav examined many persons on this point, as well as all others relating to Mr. Lincoln's life, and what those persons told me I wrote down at the time and place of the interview, generally, many years ago. I do not think that there are any substantial mistakes in the notes. If Mr. Lincoln was a Christian it is very easy to prove it. The burthen of proof is on the Christian; first, because he is in the affirmativ; and second, it is a well settled principle in the laws of evidence that when a given state of facts, with accompanying conditions, is once proven, that state of facts must be accepted until the contrary is proven. No one denies that Mr. Lincoln was once an Infidel. Now let the Christians bring on their evidence, or forever hold their peace. If truth will canonize Mr. Lincoln and make him a saint, I shall favor it with all my heart; it is truth which I want for the present and the future—for biography and general history. If Mr. Lincoln changed his views, when was it, where was it, to what extent, and who has the legal and sufficient evidence to establish it? By all means let us hav it now.

Some good men and women say that Mr. Lincoln was a Christian, because he was a moral man. They say that he was a rational Christian, because he loved morality. Do not other people, who are not Christians, love morality? Morality is not the test of Christianity, by any means. If it is a test, then all moral men—Atheists, Agnostics, Infidels, Mohammedans, Buddhists, Mormons, and the rest, are Christians. A rational Christian is an anomaly—an impossibility—because when reason is left free it demands proofs; it relies on experience, observation, logic, nature, laws, and constant modes of operation. Why not call Mr. Lincoln a rational Buddhist, a rational Mohammedan, a rational Confucian, a rational Mormon? for all these, if true to their faith, love morality. The true test of Christianity is this: Did man fall as related in the Bible, and was Jesus the only begotten son of God? Did Mr. Lincoln believe either of these propositions? He did not. I hav never seen the word "Jesus" in any of Mr. Lincoln's productions, and I do not think any other man or woman ever saw it there. That is a poor Christian who never mentions Christ, never calls on him for aid, nor invokes him for any purpose. I hav never seen but once, and that in the Johnson letter, where Mr. Lincoln used the "immortality" in substance or in idea. Mr. Lincoln appeals to God, but never to Christ, that I hav seen or remember. It may be otherwise, and if so, the language can be produced. Mr. Lincoln's compositions, speeches, letters, messages, and inaugurals must be read with care. All men in writing use the Christian's terminology, conventional language, and ideas more or less.

I am aware of the fraud committed on Mr. Lincoln in reporting some insane remarks supposed to hav been made by him on the 4th of July, 1864, on the presentation of a Bible to him by the colored people of Baltimore. No sane man ever uttered such folly, and no sane man will ever believe it. That very feeble-minded effort contains such expressions as this: "It (the Bible) is the best gift which God has ever given to man." Speech—human speech—is nothing; human reason is nothing; the human soul is nothing; nor liberty, justice, the printing-press, the continent of America, democratic institutions. These are nothing. Again, the same supposed speech says: "All the good from the savior of the world is communicated to us through this book. But for this book we could not know right from wrong." What! human experience, observation, and reason, they do not teach us right from wrong! Every dog, by his natural reason, knows right from wrong; so does the lowest and the highest animal life. Each, in its sphere, knows right from wrong, as to its own kind. So with man. Some thick-headed Bushman just from Africa, where they kill and cook Christian missionaries for dinner, wrote this speech, most undoubtedly. No one else was sufficient for such a task.

Did Mr. Lincoln believe in prayer as a means of moving God? It is said to me by the Christians, touching Mr. Lincoln's religion: "Did not he, in his parting speech in Springfield in 1861, say: 'I hope you, my friends will pray that I may receive,'" etc., and to which I say yes. In his last inaugural he said: "Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray." These expressions are merely conventional. They do not prove that Mr. Lincoln believed that prayer is a means of moving God. Mr. Lincoln was a shrewd and a long-headed man—a man of his own plans and purposes—a most secretiv man, never opening himself wholly to any one. He was a man of the deepest and profoundest policies; he knew that if he could get the Christians to pray for him he could chain them to himself and throw them against disunion; he used the Christians, as it were, as tools. And now let me ask the Christians a question in return: Did not Mr. Lincoln, in his last inaugural, say this: "The Almighty has his own purposes?" If the Almighty has his own purposes, then it is a question of wisdom, will, and power. If God is all-wise, then he knows what is best, and that best he moves by law, universal and eternal, everywhere, underlying and overfloating and ruling matter and mind. If he can know the best, can he will it to be and enforce it? If this is so, will he, through our prayer, change and alter his own plans and purposes to please us lunatics here below? Mr. Lincoln said, in his oft-referred-to inaugural, that God had his own purposes, and that neither the North nor the South had its own way, but that God had. Mr. Lincoln believed, as I understood him, that human prayer did the prayer good; that human prayer was but a drum beat—the taps of the spirit on the living human soul, arousing it to acts of repentance for bad deeds done, or to inspire it to a loftier and a higher effort for a nobler and a grander life.

Mr. Lincoln, I say, was a prudent, a wise and politic man, and now let me ask the Christians still another question: Did Mr. Lincoln, in his said inaugural, say, "Both read the same word of God?" No, because that would be admitting revelation. He did say, "both read the same Bible." Did Mr. Lincoln say, "Yet, if God wills that it (the war) continue till all the wealth piled by the bondman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn by the lash shall be paid with another drawn with the sword," as was said by God three thousand years ago? He did not; he was cautious and said, "as was said three thousand years ago." Jove never nods. A Christian would hav said, "as God said three thousand years ago." Had Mr. Lincoln uttered the expression, "as God said three thousand years ago," that would hav been an acknowledgment of divine revelation, inspiration, miraculous conception, the fall, etc., etc This inaugural, in this particular line, is a protest, as it were, against prayer. Mr. Lincoln concludes the sentence alluded to thus, "So still it must be said the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether." No one can show that Mr. Lincoln believed in inspiration or revelation, as the Christian world contends; he did not deign—did not think fit—to say what it was or who it was that said, "as said three thousand years ago." I never heard Mr. Lincoln use the word infinit God. He uses the word maker in the Johnson letter, and means by the word God the same as maker, leaving the idea indefinit. Had Mr. Lincoln believed that God was infinit, he would hav said it. If he ever used the word infinit God, I hav failed to remember it. If I am mistaken in any point touching any fact of Mr. Lincoln's life, I shall gladly and with pride revoke it, and make that revocation public.

Mr. Lincoln delivered a lecture in this city in 1837, before the Young Men's Lyceum, which I heard. It was published in the Sangamon Journal early in 1838, as I remember. The burthen of that lecture was to show the necessity, in the state, of law and order. In his messages and inaugurals while president, he struggled for union and liberty. To condense: the inspiration of Mr. Lincoln's political life was law and order, liberty and union. Religiously, Mr. Lincoln was and Infidel—a Liberal. In his philosophy he was a realist, as opposed to an idealist; he was a sensationalist, as opposed to an intuitionalist; and was a Materialist, as opposed to a Spiritualist. As a logician, he lived on facts, figures, and principles. In short, Mr. Lincoln was a material, practical man—a wise, long-headed, deep-policied man, and one of the very best, greatest, and noblest of mankind.

An Important Decision.

The following, having reference to the law suit between Archbishop Heiss, of Milwaukee, and a portion of the congregation of Sinsinawa Mound parish, appears in the Grant County Witness of current date: "In the case of Michael Heiss, archbishop of Milwaukee, against Vosburg and others, just decided by Judge Clementson at Lancaster, the court decided that the archbishop holds the absolute title to all the Catholic church property in the diocese of Milwaukee as an individual, and not for the use of the Catholic church at large or the several congregations. Consequently he can sell it or otherwise dispose of it at his own pleasure. It is liable for his debts and may be sold to pay them, and last, but not least, it is clearly taxable. It is only the property of religious or charitable associations that the law exempts from taxation, and the private property of Michael Heiss is not such property. The question arose in a case brought by the archbishop against members of the congregation at Sinsinawa Mound for damages for taking down the old church there and building a new one against his protest. The court held that the congregation had no right to touch the church without the archbishop's consent, and the fact that they had built a new and better church instead was no defense."

This is a square blow at the Catholic church, and if confirmed by higher courts will lead to a revision of the titles of church property, and affords a good opportunity for Freethinkers to get it taxed. If back taxes can be collected, there will be a large sum due the state—enough to care for some of the lunatics the church has made.

Why?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Here is an item for you. Rev. S. S. Waller, in his sermon Sunday, Feb. 18th, at the eastern Presbyterian church, Washington, D. C., said that "God was not an embodiment of love, and that he showed his wrath by visiting upon the world calamities like the western floods, to correct its sins." But why does God confine himself along the rivers? Why not open the windows of heaven, as in days of old, to giv the world the benefit of the punishment, and not whack a few poor, miserable sinners in one locality? Surely his ways are past finding out. ELLA E. GIBSON.

Driven Insane by Preaching.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav to-day been forced to discharge a painful duty, by filing an affidavit with the probate judge to send a good citizen to the insane asylum. He attended a five-weeks Methodist protracted meeting in our town, when the audience were treated to a double dose of hell fire and brimstone. He has been a religious man for many years, but came to the conclusion he had not toed the mark, and claims his savior has forsaken him and that the devil is continually on his track. B. D. EVANS.

Another Pious Thief,

WHO SAYS GOD MADE HIM ROB THE MAILS IN ORDER TO CONVERT HIM.

Mr. Jeffries, employed in the St. Joseph, Mo., post-office, has been detected rifling the registered letters passing through that office, and arrested. Before making the arrest the assistant postmaster remarked that "he did not think that Jeffries was the guilty man; that he was religious and had at one time been a teacher," to which Major Crowell, who was "after" him, rejoined, "Well, then, I had better arrest him at all hazard, for he is doubtless the man." Piety, in the major's eyes, was good evidence of "cussedness," and it seems he was right, for Jeffries has written the following godly letter to the St. Joseph Gazette, which it it prints verbatim, heading it "God's Rod."

"When asked by the detectivs why I did the act, I told them I did not know, neither did I at that time, but the cause has been made plain to me since (it was simply the rod of Providence) I had strayed away from the God who loved me, it was his way of bringing me back to him he had used means to bring me back, such as sending friends to talk to me, but that had no effect. He might hav used other means than this, but, probably, this is as he knew the only thing that he could do to bring me to a real sense of my duty to him. probably to send me through a prison, is the only thing that would do in my case (for illustration a father had two children one is corrected by a simple word, or way, while the other requires harsh words or severe means to correct it) if God is determined that I shall serve him, and at last save my soul, and take me to heaven, to meet those whom I hav promised to meet, honor and praise him whom I vowed to praise, I only say Glory to his name. I am willing to suffer any thing for his name sake. the reason I believe this to be his dealings with me, is that he did not allow me to spend that money foolishly or otherwise but caused me to save it so that nobody was ingered much, the people got theire money, and I got a prisson sell, and new here I am sitting in a prisson sell suffering in the flesh, be caus of the unpleasant circun stances surrounding it to which I am not uesd, but brought back to God and enjoying a pease of soul that I have not enjoyed for two years. He is not going to keep me long in prisson becouse it is not not nessary he is bringing friends to my rescue, and in a short time I will be released and permitted to go home to my Devoted wife and Dear babies, a better and a religious man. the infidelity that was about to swallow my soul is fled and that there is a God and a Heaven for those who will serve God is no doubt in my mind. I dont write this for an afologiy, for my act, mor to excite sympathy, but it is my honest conviction, I in vite all christians and all who feel them selves straying from God and wish to exchange words with me to come and see me. I am on my way to Heaven once more, thank God for it.

Will the Herald be kind enough to publish this.

Respectfully, M. JEFFRIES.

Question: Would it not hav been better for himself, and especially for those from whom he stole, if Mr. Jeffries had had a little less anxiety concerning his soul?

Individual Sovereignty.

I wish to reply briefly to the criticism of W. H. Gantz upon the positions of Walker and others on the question of individual rights versus sumptuary legislation.

It seems almost impossible for the majority of persons, even Liberals, so called, to percieve the difference between admitting the right of the individual to do as he may elect, and believing what he does to be right on principle. To illustrate, I believe my Brother Gantz has the right—if he so choose—to eat meat, drink tea and coffee, use tobacco, breathe impure air in unventilated apartments, or neglect to practice proper bathing. And I would fight for that right for him if necessary, while I believe it is an injury to him to do any and all of these things; that it is an injury to not only himself, but to those he comes in contact with; his wife must nurse him when ill, bear with him when nervous and cross from their effects; and if he die, as often happens, from the effects of their use, not only is suffering extended to his wife and children left without husband and father, but the community is robbed of what should hav been a healthy, happy, useful citizen, and often compelled to support those whom he should hav lived to sustain. I do not believe it to be right to do any of the things above enumerated, but I believe he has the right to do them—so far as any interference from others is concerned—that is, he has a right to do wrong and take the consequences that nature imposes upon him. But if from nervous irritability caused by any or all of these wrong habits, he abuses his fellow, quarrels and fights him, the law recognizing the right of his neighbor to liv in peace, if he chooses, arrests him for interfering with his neighbor's rights which he then has invaded, just as truly as would Mr. Gantz's right be infringed were he prohibited to do as he pleased as aforementioned. Extend the same principle to the exercise of religious worship, or the use of alcoholic drinks. For instance, I believe orthodox religion to be wrong and a curse to the people, but I believe in the Christian's right to do wrong so far as I am concerned, and I only hope to better the condition of the people through education and evolution. So with the use of alcohol, I am certain that every drop that enters the human body is an injury to that body, and if an injury to the one who takes it, it must of necessity be an injury to the society of which he is a component part; but people differ with me in this, even a vast majority of the medical profession believe exactly the reverse of this. How hav I the right to enforce my views upon those parties differing with me in the matter of drink, any more than I hav upon those who differ in diet or religion? Or hav I any better right to force them to refrain from using than hav they to compel me to use or act according to their views or wishes?

All reform must be brought about by education and enlightenment, never interfering with the largest personal liberty of all. In fact, there can be no morality without opportunity for wrong-doing, else a penal institution would contain within its walls the most moral people in the world, for then all are forcibly restrained from wrong-doing. It is this principle that many pseudo Liberals advocate of prohibitory measures that animated the hearts of those who through all the past ages hav persecuted those who differed from them, trying to thus compel them to do right as they believed—a principle that has deluged the earth with blood, and strewn the highway of progress with the bones of slaughtered heroes. Putnam's "Golden Throne."

This is no common novel, but a real live book; a book that has a purpose in every word and every line; a book that is full of grand, sublime, and beautiful thoughts, full of poetry, common sense, and philosophy.

No one can read it and not be made better and happier by it; made kinder, purer, and more hopeful of the grand possibilities of humanity.

It is brimful of suggestiv ideas, radical reform, and progressiv Freethought.

Its pictures of miners and their lives, of the busy turmoil of the cities, and the silent, quiet, and beautiful haunts of nature in wild mountainous solitudes are all delineated with a master-hand.

And the witching, all-potent power of love's sweet entrancements could not hav been so well told save by one who has been there; aye, and whose heart-strings are yet thrilling to its deepest melodies. It is is not mere passion, fiery, impetuous, and devouring, but love tempered by reason and self-abnegation wherever it conflicts with right and justice.

When I read "Gottlieb's Heaven" I thought it one of the grandest and most sublime conceptions of what humanity might be that I had ever come across, and with "Prometheus" I was completely carried away. His "Ingersoll and Jesus" is poetic, pretty, and practical, but none of them surpasses "Golden Throne," a book few will be willing to lay aside with one reading only.

I think Liberals should be very proud of such a writer, thinker, and poet as Mr. Putnam has proved himself to be, and I hope this appreciation will induce them to encourage and stimulate his genius and talents to renewed energy by purchasing liberally of his truly beautiful and valuable works.

I do not know of any author whose volumes I would sooner present to a friend. They are pure in thought, high in moral culture and true progress, and speak the most progressiv thoughts of the age. I hope every Liberal will secure a copy of "Golden Throne" and lend it to all who appreciate good reading. We cannot advance our doctrins faster than by circulating good literature.

"We'll giv some noble hope where'er we can;
Uplift some martyr-soul with splendid beam;
Giv hero's fame o'er time's far-wandering stream;
Breathed into humble lives our higher joy;
In fruitful labors kind our hands employ;
For if we cannot reach the shining best,
Forever disappointed in our quest;
Still we can realize a partial good,
Urge toward the beautiful and make less rude,
Ay, we can struggle, though we cannot gain;
Keep back the wrong if not the right attain."

ELMINA.

THE northern Wisconsin Spiritualist Conference will hold a four days' meeting in Spiritual Hall, Omro, March 29th, 30th, 31st, and April 1st. Dr. Henry Slade, of New York city, will attend. Among the speakers engaged are Mrs. H. S. Lake, of California, and Judge E. S. Holbrook, of Chicago. A fine guitarist is expected to assist the vocal and instrumental music. The meeting will commence on Thursday evening, by Dr. Slade giving experiences as a medium. Prof. Lockwood will giv a lecture on the "Eternity of Matter" some time during the meeting. The Thirty-fifth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism will be observed on Saturday, March 31st, by appropriate exercises. Reduced rates hav been secured at hotels, and the usual courtesies will be extended by the Omro friends.

IN printing the list of donors to the Monument Fund in a previous issue, only $1 was credited to the Paine Memorial Meeting of San Jose, Cal., when it should hav been $5, as that is the amount remitted by friend York. We are always sorry for these errors, but some how they will occasionally be made.

Chapter XXVIII.

THE CHRISTIANS SINCE DIOCLETIAN UP TO THE TIME OF CONSTANTINE.

The Christians were more often tolerated, and even protected, than given up to persecution. The reign of Diocletian was, during twenty-eight long years, a reign of peace for them. The two principal officers of the palace, Gorgonius and Dorotheus, were Christians. They were only required to sacrifice to the gods of the empire before entering public offices. Prisca, the wife of Diocletian, was a Christian; so the sect really enjoyed great advantages. They built magnificent temples, after having declared in the first century that it was not necessary to build either temples or altars to God; and while they affected the simplicity of a poor church, concealing the magnificence of a wealthy church full of ostentation, they displayed golden vases and dazzling ornaments; a few of their temples were erected upon the ruins of ancient sanctuaries abandoned by the ancients. Their temple at Nicomedia was built upon an imperial palace; and, as Eusebius remarked, so much prosperity produced insolence, greed, laziness, and debasement of the morals. One can see, said Eusebius, that envy, slander, discord, and sedition possessed them.

It was that spirit of sedition which broke the patience of Cæsar Galerius Maximin. The Christians were so irritating in the time of Diocletian that he published his edict fulminated against the Manicheans. One of the edicts of that emperor commenced thus: "We have been apprised that the Manicheans, a kind of Persian, and our ancient enemy, have overrun the empire."

The Manicheans caused no trouble; they were numerous only in Alexandria and Africa; they only disputed with the Christians; there had never been the least bit of a quarrel, on account of religion, between the ancient Romans and the followers of Manes. The different Christian sects, on the contrary, the Gnostics, Marcionites, Valentinians, Ebionites, Galileans, were opposed to each other, and were enemies of the dominant religion, spreading confusion over the empire.*

Is it very probable that Christians had sufficient power with the emperor to obtain an edict from him against the Manicheans? This sect, which mixed the ancient religion of the Magi with Christianity, was very deleterious, throughout the East, to the new church. The idea of sacred rites of the East with those of the Christian sects made a great impression.

The obscure but sublime theology of the Magi, mingled with the theology, no less obscure, of the Platonic Christians, was very seductive to the romantic spirits who bound themselves by that creed. The famous pastor of Hippo, Augustine, was a Manichean. Since his time it is very certain that this sect had charms for excitable imaginations. Manes was crucified in Persia, if we can believe Chondemirs; the Christians, in love with the crucified one, did not wish a second.

I know that we have no proof that the Christians obtained an edict against the Manicheans; but there was bloodshed, and it was not the blood of Christians. What finally caused the Christians to be disgraced during the last two years of the reign of an emperor so philosophical as to abdicate the throne in order to live in solitude and to repent?

The Christians were attached to Constance the Pale, the father of the celebrated Constantine who had a servant at his palace named Helene.†

Constance always secretly protected them. We do not know whether Cæsar Galerius was jealous at the preference the Christians showed to Constance, or whether there was some other reason for complaint; he deemed the church which they had erected, and which outshone his palace, to be in his way. He solicited Diocletian for a long time to destroy the church, and forbade the exercise of the Christian religion. Diocletian resisted; he called together, finally, a council of the chief officers of the empire. I remember to have read in the "Ecclesiastical History" by Fleury, that "the emperor had the malice not to consult whether he would do good, but consulted how to do evil." This, which Fleury called malice, I must avow, is really worthy of praise. There is nothing grander than to do good voluntarily. A great soul does not consult anyone; but in actions of ceremony, a just and wise man does nothing without advice.

The church of Nicomedia was finally demolished in the year 303; but Diocletian contented himself with seeing that no Christian was elevated to any place of dignity in the empire. This was taking away his protection, but was not persecution. It came to pass that a Christian had the insolence to publicly tear into pieces the emperor's edicts, and stamp them under his feet. This crime was punished, as it deserved to be, by the death of the criminal. Then Prisca, the wife of the emperor, no longer daring to protect the seditious, broke off from the Christian religion when she saw that it only led its followers to fanaticism and revolt. Galerius was then permitted to have his vengeance.

There were at that time many Christians in Armenia and Syria; they instigated a rebellion; the Christians were accused of having set fire to the palace of Galerius. It was very natural to believe that the people who publicly tore in pieces the emperor's edicts, and burnt temples, as they often had done, were capable of burning the palace; but apart from this it is very false that they were generally persecuted. It was very apparent that the refractory ones were legally punished, since Diocletian ordered that such as were executed should be buried, and that he would not have persecuted them without some form of law. No edict condemning any one to death for professing Christianity can be found. That would have been as heartless and horrible as St. Bartholomew, the massacres in Ireland, or the crusade against the Albigenses; for when one-fifth or one-sixth of the Roman empire was Christian, such a persecution would have forced that sixth part of the empire to take arms. The despair of those who were thus armed would have been terrible.

Ranters like Eusebius and Cæsareus, and those who followed them, said that an incredible number of Christians were slaughtered. Why does not the historian Zosimus tell us this? Why does not Zonaras, a Christian, mention some of those famous martyrs? How does it happen that such ecclesiastical exaggeration has not preserved to our times the names of fifty Christians condemned to death?

If we examined with critical care the supposed massacres which legend vaguely attributes to Diocletian, there would be a great abatement of the story, and we would have much sooner a profound contempt for such lies, and we would cease thinking of Diocletian as a persecutor.

It was under this ruler that the ridiculous adventure about the tavern-keeper Theodotus occurred; that the mythical Theban legion was totally destroyed; that the little Roman stutterer was born, who spoke with an incredible volubility as soon as the physician to the emperor ordered the executioner to cut the tongue; there were twenty other such occurrences which the dotards of Cornouailles have the face to teach, in the present times, to their little children.*

* It was Voltaire's method to use any means to make a point. In this case he ridicules the Christian sects as fomenters of discord, while in other instances he declares that the formation of sects is a step toward religious tolerance. Voltaire was by no means consistent. The arguments he uses above he confesses in subsequent writings to be weak and fallacious. Voltaire knew very well that there could be no progress so long as one sect, like the Catholic church, for instance, held complete sway over the world; that religious freedom began with a split up of one church into many. [Note by translator.]

† This Helene, whom some one had made a saint, was Stabularia, or overseer of the stables of Constance Chlorus, as Eusebius, Ambrose, Nicephorus, and Jerome declare. The chronicles of Alexandria call Constantine a bastard; Zosimus certifies to this, and certainly no one would speak thus, or thus affront the family of an emperor so powerful, if there had been the least doubt about his birth [1767].

* If, in the fourth century, according to our ridiculous computation, there had been a few Christians punished for crimes and abominable deeds which were imputed to them, should we be astonished? Have we not witnessed bishops reproach them for the most horrible things? (See chap. xix). Hume mentions the most horrible deed which my Lord Bolingbroke has forgotten, and that is the story of Saint Epiphanius. This can be found in the edition of Paris (1564), page 185. It concerns a society of Christians who sacrificed a pagan infant to the child Jesus by killing it with piercing needles. I must declare that I am not astonished at this refinement of horrors, after the incredible excesses which the Papists exercised against the Protestants in the Irish massacres. Superstition is capable of anything (Decroix).

The Mystery and the Sublimity of Death.

Unfathomable mystery!—we cannot sound it, and we cannot escape it. No ray comes from its bosom, yet life forever flows into its measureless deep. It is a mighty tragedy that confronts every soul.

Only this we know, that change must come as the condition of perpetual progress. Things cannot remain stationary, for that were the greatest death of all—an absolute blank. Death must come if new and more beautiful forms are to arise, and this we could endure if death would always come as the crowning and advance of perfection. But the ripened fruit alone does not fall, the bud and the blossom also perish, and the sweetest of hopes are destroyed. Death appears a blessing indeed when one has wrought for a long life, and his way lies amid the snows of age. There seems a fitness then in the silent sleep, the rest in the bosom of our mother earth. But when death strikes athwart the glow of youth, and the dawning richness of life is quenched in unutterable gloom, there is a bitter cry from the breaking and almost despairing heart, and no words can make the grief less overwhelming than it is. That which makes death so profoundly mysterious is the wealth of affection with which we are endowed. If we were only thinking creatures we might meet the change with stoical indifference. It is the heart of man that struggles with the mighty problem. It is for the sake of our love that we would pluck the secret of death, and know into what new loveliness it might pass. It is our love that scatters flowers over the grave, and in those flowers see the promis of a fairer life. Why do we love so deeply, so passionately, if we cannot conquer immortality? It seems impossible to surrender these transcendent feelings. They will sweep onward and claim something of the eternity of the universe itself.

And so death clothes life with an infinit wonder. We liv more nobly because of this mysterious shadow. It broadens and deepens the spirit of our work. It makes our task more sublime Death does not level, it uplifts. It givs a majestic meaning to the universe. It is an ennobling sorrow. All that is greatest within us responds to its pathetic touch. It creates an infinit tenderness. It makes our sympathies more radiant. It reveals the innermost of our humanity. It unfolds the universal brotherhood.

It is through death that we consecrate ourselvs anew to life, to all that is most precious and beautiful in it. It is by the open grave that we strike hands for a more zealous effort. There our ideals assume a fresh luster. Then is the triumphant hour for all that is best within us—for our generosities, our heroisms, and our fidelities.

The radiance of youth as it lies within the shrouded glory of death becomes a noble impulse. No dust can gather over its shining memory. As night brings its wealth of stars, so sorrow brings its uncounted jewels; and the greatness of the sorrow shall only touch to finer music the fibers of our being. Because the grief is so infinit it shall clothe life with a more wonderful beauty. The blow that seems to crush shall in the end exalt the nobility of our nature.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

How M. J. Savage Explains the Pentateuch.

Suppose I should take the complete edition of Shakspere's works, and, as I glanced through it, I should find passages right in the midst of "Macbeth" or "King Lear" or "King Richard III.," that referred to the telephone or steamboat? I should know most certainly that, whatever might be true concerning the rest of the plays, Shakspere never wrote those particular passages. I might, however, grant that it was nothing more than the interpolation of some other writer, while Shakspere was really the author of all the rest. But suppose that these passages are so woven into the text that we cannot tear them out without making a break, leaving a gap, which a master like Shakspere never would hav left. Suppose, moreover, that I find woven into the very substance of some of the plays passages that, by implication, and unconsciously on the part of the author, refer, let us say, to the corn laws of England or the agitation concerning free trade or the debate about the disestablishment of the church? Suppose I find these matters taken for granted throughout the substance of the plays. What should I be compelled to believe? I should know that Shakspere never wrote them, though his name and autograph were on every page. Though I had a thousand affidavits certified to by the notaries of the time, still I never could be made to believe it, because it would be unspeakably absurd on the face of it.

Now let us look at these five books called the books of Moses, and see if we can trace anything parallel to what I hav alluded to concerning Shakspere. According to the popular theory, the Pentateuch must hav been written in the wilderness, before the children of Israel entered the land of Canaan at all. I shall not go into the subject deeply, but make general statements. What I giv you are only specimens of what may be very much enlarged and prolonged.

As we look over the Pentateuch, we find statements like this: Such a thing occurred before there was any king over Israel. Do you see the significance of that? When was there a king over Israel? You hav got to leap over the time of the conquest, come down by Joshua and the Judges, past the time covered by Samuel and his work, down at least to Saul, years and years after the time of Moses, because there was no king at all in Israel before that time. Yet here this writer says this took place before there was any king. Of course, then, he lived after the time when there was a king; and he is calling their attention to something that existed in the long distant past.

Again, we find one of the towns referred to and called by the name of Hebron; while we know from Jewish history that it was not called by that name until after the conquest of the land, and until after Caleb, one of the leaders of the people, had conquered this city and had named it Hebron after one of his sons. Suppose I should find some document purporting to be written by General Washington, and in that document he should refer to the city of Chicago. It would be precisely parallel to this.

Again, there are several passages which say, when such and such a thing occurred, the Canaanite was then in the land. The history teaches us that whole generations after the time of Moses had passed by before the Canaanites were all expelled. And of course this passage was written long after the expulsion. Would Captain Miles Standish be likely to write, Such a thing took place while the Indians were still in Massachusetts?

We find another passage like this,—a command to the people not to remove the ancient landmarks which hav been set up as divisions between one man and his neighbor. Before any such command could hav issued, the people must hav been long in possession of the country. Individual possession must hav been established by common consent, so that the dividing lines between their property could be spoken of as ancient. Sentiment had gathered around them with this sense of personal possession, and the public mind began to feel that it was wrong to disturb these marks that separated between the property of one man and that of another. These are superficial hints; but the finger-marks of a later time than that of Moses are all over the Pentateuch.

Let me now giv you an idea of the composition of the Pentateuch, which makes the matter plainer still, if possible, because it is always open to any one to say that these surface indications may hav been added by the hand of a later writer.

These five books, or six, if we include Joshua, bear traces that they are not one single document written by one single hand all the way through, but that they are a composit, representing the work of different writers and different periods of time. So clear and distinct is the work of those several writers that you can take the book apart into three pieces and hav at least three separate books, each one quite complete and definit by itself. That is, you can hav three separate stories as though written by three individual persons at three different periods of time.

Suppose that you should go to England and should find there, somewhere off in the country, a house, the oldest part of which was of Norman architecture, with a later part in the Elizabethan style, and still another part indicating the work of the time of Queen Anne. Suppose there was a local tradition that the three parts were built by one architect who lived in the time of William the Conqueror, that he was inspired to foresee what the Elizabethan and Queen Anne styles would be, and that he therefore built the house with the three styles at one and the same time: would you credit this story? It is just as credible, reasonable, and easy to believe as it is to believe that the first six books of the Bible were written at the same time and by the same hand.

A Famin in Judea 24 B.C., or When?

We now quote what immediately follows the spurious passage about the disciples being first called Christians at Antioch:

> In those days came prophets thither from Jerusalem. And one of them whose name was Agabus stood up and informed them, by the spirit, that there would be a great famin in all the country. And that famin occurred in the days of Claudius Cæsar [A.D. 41–54]. And moreover the disciples, each of them according to his several ability, determined to send to the relief of the brethren who dwelt in Judea. And they sent by the hand of Barnabas and Saul unto the elders there (xi, 27–30).

Now, although there was a famin in Judea in the reign of Claudius, yet we propose to prove that the above passage is both a blunder and an interpolation in whole or part.

Christian authorities are almost unanimous in fixing the year of this famin A.D. 44. Eusebius puts it in 41; Baronius, Petavius, and Basnage in 42; all others that we hav seen say 44 or later. Dr. Whiston, in a note on Josephus, says: "It happened upon the 5th, 6th, and 7th years of Claudius [A.D. 45–47], as says Valesius on Eusebius." Smith's Bible Dictionary, with less confidence, says: "It may hav begun about the close of A.D. 44 and lasted three or four years" (art. Agabus).

Josephus, if anybody, ought to know this about famin, for he was seven years old A.D. 44, and was living in Jerusalem. In his Antiquities (xx, 5, § 2) he says:

> "Then came Tiberius Alexander as successor to [Cuspius] Fadus. . . . Under these procurators that great famin happened in Judea, in which Helena [queen of Adiabene] bought corn in Egypt at a great expense, and distributed it to those that were in want, as I hav related already."

Now Cuspius Fadus was appointed procurator to succeed Herod Agrippa I., who died A.D. 44; and Fadus did not go to Judea until the latter end of that year. He was procurator from A.D. 44 to 47, and Tiberius Alexander from 47 to 48. But does Josephus mean to say that the famin began in 44 and continued till 48? Who would think of so understanding him but for the necessity of maintaining the integrity of Acts? The natural construction of his language is that the famin was in 47, and perhaps 48.

But it is impossible to date the famin mentioned in Acts later than A.D. 44, because the next chapter describes the death of Herod Agrippa I., which without dispute happened in that year; and before his death Paul and Barnabas had departed for Jerusalem with relief for the sufferers. It therefore must hav begun before Fadus was appointed procurator, or early in 44.

The Greek version says that Agabus prophesied "a great dearth throughout the world," or "habitable earth;" but there was none but local and limited famins in the reign of Claudius.

Must we then reject the whole passage in Acts about the famin? Possibly not, but only the words, "And that famin occurred in the days of Claudius Cæsar."

Seventy years before the famin already referred to there was another far greater one. It is described at considerable length by Josephus (Ant. xv, 9). We transcribe part of Whiston's note:

> "This famin for two years that affected Judea and Syria, the 13th and 14th years of Herod [the Great], which are the 23d and 24th years before the Christian era, seems to hav been more terrible during this time than was that in the days of Jacob."

But there is an apparent difficulty about referring the passage in Acts to the famin 24–23 B.C. According to Acts Paul has visited Jerusalem but once since his conversion, and he is now going there a second time. If his second visit to Jerusalem was just seventeen years after his conversion, as a strict construction of his own words would imply, it was not later than 46 B.C. But as his language is rather indefinit —"after three years," "and again after fourteen years"—the time may hav been considerably later, though probably not as late as 24 B.C.

Furthermore, in the year 24 B.C. Paul was 66 years of age or more, and he had been preaching but a short time according to Acts—though he himself says he spent three years in Damascus and Arabia, and he had now been some time in Cilicia and Syria. But yet, according to Acts, he has just entered upon a long ministry; and although "Paul the aged" probably means a much older man than has been heretofore supposed, yet we cannot easily believe that the greater part of his ministry was after the age of 66.

Therefore we are constrained to reject the passage about the famin as spurious, unless it is possible to put his second visit to Jerusalem as late as 24 B.C., or unless the famin has been inserted out of its chronological order, having actually occurred after that second visit.

But whether or no the great famin of 24 B.C. was the one referred to in the original story of Acts, the famin that happened in the reign of Claudius was too late to agree with the text as it now stands.

PAUL'S SECOND VISIT TO JERUSALEM.

Now comes a more important question connected with the famin in Judea. The disciples at Antioch, it is said, sent relief to the brethren "by the hand of Barnabas and Saul." This is Paul's second visit to Jerusalem, according to Acts. How does it agree with Paul's own account?—

> And again after fourteen years I went up to Jerusalem with Barnabas; and I took with me Titus (Gal. ii, 1).

Barnabas goes with him, according to Acts; so far the two accounts agree. But nothing is said in Acts about Titus; nor does the name Titus occur at all in the book of Acts, except in the Syriac and Vulgate versions (xviii, 7), as heretofore noticed, and will be again considered when we reach that chapter.

Another point of variance in the two accounts is this: In Acts Paul and Barnabas are sent to Jerusalem on a mission of charity. But Paul himself says: "I went up by revelation, and I explained to them the gospel which I announce among the gentiles" (Gal. ii, 2).

But as there are no further details in Acts of this second visit, but a full account of a third one, which corresponds more nearly to Paul's own account of his second and last visit (for he never alludes to a third), the great majority of critics seek to identify the third one in Acts with the second one described by Paul; and the more rational scholars, like Dr. Davidson, are compelled to reject the second one mentioned in Acts as unhistorical. In other words, they do not believe that Paul and Barnabas were ever sent to Jerusalem on a mission of charity. We, however, suspend our judgment on this question, for reasons given in a preceding article.

FROM ANTIOCH TO JERUSALEM AND BACK.

After the departure of Barnabas and Saul from Antioch several important events are narrated in Acts. Herod Agrippa I. kills James, the brother of John, and imprisons Simon Kepha. But Simon is led out of prison at night by an angel of the Lord, and makes a hasty call at the house of Mary, the mother of John and Mark, where the brethren are assembled for prayer. He tells them how the Lord delivered him from prison, asks them to tell James and the other brethren, and departs to another place. The keepers of the prison, not being able to account for Simon's escape, are sentenced to death by the king. Then Herod goes to Cesarea to reside, where one day at a public celebration after the delivery of a speech he is eaten of worms and dies.

Herod Agrippa I. died A.D. 44, at Cesarea, in the seventh year of his reign. The writer of Acts describes him as a monster who died by the visitation of God. But Josephus informs us that he was a worthy and popular king, who died the death of the righteous. The account of his death in Acts seems to hav been borrowed in part from Josephus. At one of the festivals the king appeared in a robe of silver. As the rays of the sun were reflected from the royal garment the people cried out, "He is a god." But presently the king saw an owl perched on a rope over his head, which he regarded as an ill omen. At the same moment he felt a severe pain in his bowels, and said to his friends: "I whom you call a god am commanded presently to depart this life. . . . But I am bound to accept what providence allots, as it pleases God; for we hav by no means lived ill, but in a splendid and happy manner." He was carried into the palace, and lived five days. All this time the people sat in sackcloth praying for his recovery. Seeing the mourning and lamentation around his bed, says Josephus, "he could not himself forbear weeping" (Ant. xix, 8, §2).

But whatever truth there may be in the account of the killing of James, the imprisonment of Simon Kepha, and the death of Herod, as given in Acts, we find nothing in history connecting any apostle or disciple of Jesus with Herod Agrippa I. (A.D. 37–44), and we believe that the whole story has been interpolated between the departure and return of Barnabas and Saul. For if we join Acts xi, 30, with xii, 24, 25, omitting the part about James, Simon, and Herod, it will read coherently as follows:

> And they sent by the hand of Barnabas and Saul unto the elders there (xi, 30).
> And the gospel of God was proclaimed and made progress. And Barnabas and Saul, after they had completed their ministration, returned from Jerusalem to Antioch (xii, 24, 25).

Much of the chronological confusion of Acts is doubtless chargeable to the compiler of the original fragments, or to the early copyists, who deranged the order of events, interpolated new stories and names of persons who were born long after Paul died. But the electric light of "Antichrist," shining through the priestly fogs of antiquity, has already disclosed some of the earlier landmarks and personal identities, and there are more to be made manifest.

ANTICHRIST.

A Touch of Nature.

From the Philosophic Inquirer, Madras, India.

We hav lost a friend and a brother indeed; and a reputed leader of the Freethought world has just passed away, leaving the memory of a great and good man, and a stern advocate of truth and justice. We mean D. M. Bennett, F. T. S. This eminent Freethinker, profound Atheist, and unpretentious man was born Dec. 23, 1818, and had a very humble origin; so that his lamentable death ended his venerable career of sixty-four years. It is surprising, as it is also grievous to see, that our deceased brother wrote an account of his life, honest to the core, in the two issues of his TRUTH SEEKER, and finished it it in the issue which immediately preceded the one for Dec. 9th, in which, to the sorrow of his many thousand friends and admirers, the notice of his death appeared, quite as a blow. In the biography alluded to Mr. Bennett wrote that "his parents were poor farmers, and were living upon a rented farm, and they held good to their poverty until the day of their death. This individual has never known anything of affluence, ease, or luxury. Toil and poverty hav been his portion in life. But he has not been dismayed by these, for he regards them as man's natural heritage;" and closed his precious but uneventful biography with these hopeful words, "At all events Bennett hopes to liv a goodly number of years yet, and put in considerable faithful service." This great reformer has been removed by death from us; but his life and labors were not a failure. He did, more than any other Freethinker has done, by his pen, immense service for the enlightenment of man, and for the bettering of his fellow-beings. He died; but yet he livs in his many undying volumes, which are the monuments of his literary industry, his mental researches, on the grand problem of existence, and the fruits of his good and benevolent heart. In short, as a Christian foe Mr. Bennett was the Voltaire of America, without Voltaire's petulance and pride. As an Atheist he was a profound thinker; as a literary worker among Freethinkers he was without a parallel. Of him, Mr. D. M. Bennett, we could well speak in the language of DuBois-Reymond regarding Voltaire: "So powerfully has he prevailed, that the ideal advantages for which he struggled a long life through with unwearied zeal, with passionate devotion, with every weapon of the intellect—above all, with his terrible ridicule, toleration, intellectual freedom, respect for man, justice, hav become to us as the natural elements of life, as the air, of which we only think when we hav it no more." In a word, what flowed from Bennett's mind as a daring speculation may become the common sense of the next generation. Mr. Bennett's funeral in New York was attended by some of the leading Freethinkers of the United States, headed by Mr. Mendum, the co-editor of the Boston Investigator; and its famous editor, Mr. Horace Seaver, writes of the deceased, "Mr. Bennett was in manners very modest, quiet, and unassuming, but always in earnest in whatever he undertook, and truly sincere, honest, and brave in the advocacy of what he deemed right and just, no matter what or how many obstacles—Christian persecutions, confronted him in his path." George Chainey at the Paine Memorial Hall is reported to hav paid an eloquent tribute to Mr. D. M. Bennett; and Mr. J. W. Pillsbury, the abolitionist orator, spoke of the deceased friend, as a true and honest worker in the cause of truth and justice. Alas! Bennett is no more; to his memory we pay our reverent tribute.

Regarding Lincoln.

There seems to be some misapprehension regarding Lincoln's religious views, as is seen by this letter from friend Bellinger:

BONANZA CITY, IDAHO, Feb. 16, 1883.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In looking over THE TRUTH SEEKER I observed in the issue of the 3d inst. the letter of C. D. Wallace to the Rev. Dr. Leonard in regard to the noted men as Infidels, and amongst the rest he claimed Abraham Lincoln and Gerrit Smith as Infidels.

Now, Mr. Editor, I do not wish to engage in any controversy with you or Mr. Wallace, but in the issue of the New York Tribune of Jan. 21st, and republished in the Evening Bulletin of San Francisco, Feb. 3d, is a letter from Wm. H. Herndon, and accompanying it is also a letter purporting to be from Abraham Lincoln to his brother, regarding his father, which has been inserted as proof that Mr. Lincoln was not an Infidel, and on the strength of that letter of Wm. H. Herndon, Mr. Lincoln's law partner, a man shoved fifty dollars under my nose, and offered to leave it to any disinterested man that Abraham Lincoln was not an Infidel, after my presenting him with THE TRUTH SEEKER containing Mr. Wallace's letter. Now, gentlemen, as I am but a very recent reader of your paper, I of course hav but little to say; but I wish to say this much: Let all who wish to be noticed in your columns keep truth, that divine attribute, always in view, and never make assertions that cannot be fully proven without a shadow of doubt; and unless a man comes out like a free-born American and declares himself a Freethinker he is unworthy to be recognized as such, even though he is president. Some may think because a man is president and belongs to his particular politics it adds luster to the cause he may be advocating, while others may think otherwise, and the assertion of some ordinary man who has manhood enough to assert his opinions and maintain his rights would hav more weight with the thinking masses, and at the same time bring undeniable proof to sustain him in any subject where any doubt exists. As a body, we Freethinkers should not embrace it until the truth of our assertions is beyond a doubt.

I do not wish to segregate Mr. Wallace's letter, for it embraces my views, and second, I am incompetent to do so. But I think he is in error when he says Gerrit Smith was an Infidel. When I was a boy ten or twelve years of age, thirty years ago, I lived in Peterborough, Madison county, town of Smithfield, N. Y., and attended a little white church situated on the south corner of the extensiv Green (or town Park) built by him, and he used to preach there every Sunday to the people of Peterborough, and even then I preferred to go and hear him than go to those stately edifices called churches, the Baptist and Presbyterian, and from his discourses, even though a boy, were I placed in a juror box, though I could not coincide in Mr. Wallace's views, I think he was not an Infidel, which is, in my opinion, another proof that we are too liable to overreach our evidence in facts even, unintentionally, to bring great men on our side simply because they happen to coincide with us on one or two points. We must acknowledge that Smith intrigued with many others of York state notables until they plunged our country in an unholy and bloody war, which he and his coagitators kept their heads well out of, as did many of his associates.

I will not here quote Mr. W. H. Herndon's or Mr. Lincoln's etter, as I hav occupied too much of your valuable time, but will send you a copy of the Bulletin containing these letters, and hope you will giv such comment on them as you truthfully and conscientiously think proper. Let us ever keep the motto of our paper in view—truth seeker—and we must in the end prevail; but when we once deviate from its paths we are throwing stumbling-blocks in our own paths. Let the churches do the falsifying, as they are better adepts at it than are the seekers of truth.

Yours respectfully. T. D. BELLINGER.

The following is the letter as published in the New York Tribune of January 21st:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Nov. 24, 1882.

MY DEAR SIR: A few days since I received your kind note, for which please accept my thanks. Inclosed you will find a letter from Abraham Lincoln to John D. Johnson—Lincoln's step-brother—which I promised to giv you; it is the only letter which I hav left of Mr. Lincoln's; it is a genuin one, written by the great man himself. I hav kept the letter up to this day as an evidence that Mr. Lincoln was not an Atheist; and had he been one, that fact would not lessen him in my estimation, though not one myself. I had this letter once published, but before so doing I showed it to several of Mr. Lincoln's old and dear friends, who laughed at me for my credulity in believing that Mr. Lincoln believed in immortality and heaven, as stated in the letter; it was said to be merely a message of consolation from a dutiful son to his dying father. However, I had the letter published, and kept the letter as an evidence that Mr. Lincoln was not an Atheist. I could hav given the letter away many times—could hav sold it for money—but I would not part with it. I think the question of his Atheism is settled, and now I present it to you. I may say to you that the letter has the ring, it seems to me, of true metal, and yet I giv no opinion. You hav the letter and the facts of Mr. Lincoln's life before you, and you can judge as well as I can. I will soon in this letter giv you a phase of Mr. Lincoln's life not generally known, and possibly it will not be believed by the worshiping world—I mean hero-worshiping world. I hav no reference to the worship of the religious soul.

Mr. Lincoln for years supported or helped to support his aged father and mother; it is to the honor of Lincoln that he dearly loved his step-mother, and it is equally true that she idolized her step-son. Johnson, to whom the letter is addressed, was Lincoln's step-brother—the son of Mrs. Lincoln by her first husband. Thomas Lincoln, the father of Abraham, courted his second wife in his youth; she refused to hav him; he then courted Nancy Hanks and was married to her. A man by the name of Johnson courted Miss Sarah Bush—Thomas Lincoln's first flame—and married her. About the year 1819 both Mrs. Lincoln and Mr. Johnson died. Lincoln then in about one year again renewed his suit and it was accepted, and they were married. Each had two children by the first marriage, and none by the second. John Johnson was an indolent and shiftless man, a man that was "born tired," and yet he was an exceedingly clever man, generous, and very hospitable. Lincoln deserves great credit for the care shown his father and mother—hard cash and warm heart care. In the very letter which I giv you this care is shown; he says in the letter: "You [Johnson] already know I desire that neither father nor mother shall be in want of any comfort, either in health or in sickness, while they liv; and I feel sure that you hav not failed to use my name, if necessary, to procure a doctor or anything else for father in his present sickness." Dutiful and affectionate son! Noble man! Mr. Lincoln was very poor at the time this letter was written, not worth, in property, more than three or four thousand dollars.

Mr. Lincoln purchased a piece of property in Coles county in this state as a home for his father and mother, and had it deeded in trust for their use and benefit. The aged couple lived in Coles county at the time. I do not now recollect all the particulars, and yet I once did. The records in Coles county will show the facts, if any one in the future wishes to look the thing further up. Here is exhibited parental love and duty, backed up by warm affection, care, good credit, land, home, and money. This was true and genuin comfort and material aid. It was not all gush, sympathy, and tears on paper; it was real, solid, genuin comfort and support, such as we can liv upon.

I now wish to giv you a phase of Mr. Lincoln's life which is not generally known, nor will it be believed readily by the mulitude; and yet it will be true to the letter and the spirit of his life. He was said to be a very simple-minded man, devoid of the silences and ambitions of life. In this city he was known only to the few. I would advise you before you read this letter to read Holland's "Life of Lincoln" at pages 241–2, where you will find many diverse ideas of Mr. Lincoln. Consider it inserted here. Mr. Lincoln was thought, as before stated, to be a very simple-minded man. He was simple in his dress and manners, simple in his approach and in his presence. Though this be true, he was a man of quite infinit silences. He was thoroughly and deeply secretiv, uncommunicativ, and close-minded, as to his plans, wishes, hopes, and fears. His ambition was never satisfied; in him it was a consuming fire which smothered his finer feelings. Here he ran for every legislativ office, from the trusteeship of our then little village to the presidency, and during all that time I venture to say that he never wholly opened himself to mortal creature. He was skeptical, cautious, and terribly secretiv, confiding his plans and purposes, ambitions, and ends, to no man. I hav known men in our office to listen to Mr. Lincoln's conversation for a short while and then exclaim: "Oh, what a simple-minded man is Mr. Lincoln! So plain! so unambitious! so confiding!" and the like, when Mr. Lincoln's mind was not in our office but on a hot chase for the end so devoutly to be wished. Of all Americans he was, most emphatically, a man of the profoundest, widest, and deepest policies. He had his burning and his consuming ambition, but he kept his secrets and opened not.

An interviewer, with the best of intentions in the world, once went to Mr. Lincoln's room in the White House while he was president, and said: "Mr. President, what do you think of the war and its end?" To which Mr. Lincoln politely and laughingly replied, "That question of yours puts me in mind of a story about something which happened down in Egypt, in the southern part of Illinois." The point of it was that a man badly burnt his fingers in being in too much haste. Mr. Lincoln told the story admirably well, walking up and down the room and most heartily laughing all the while. The interviewer saw the point coming at him like the sting end of a hornet. As a matter of course he was cut to the quick, and quickly down-stairs he rushed with an oath in his mouth, saying he would "never interview that man again." He was as good as his word, and never tried to interview the president again. And thus it always was with Mr. Lincoln. The man that tried to pump him always found a shut safe, well locked, and the key lost. If a man was ever created in this world who did not let his right hand know what his left hand did or was doing, it was Abraham Lincoln. He was a profound, marvelous, and mysterious man to the great majority of men. I judged the man by his questionings, his manner, his nervousness, his unrest, and the play of his features, with their colors, giving a significance to his thoughts and his wishes, a mind's revelation to mind.

While I say that Mr. Lincoln was ambitious, secretiv, and somewhat selfish, do not infer from these words that he was a dishonest man, nor an insincere man, nor a hypocrit, nor a mean man, nor a base man. He was, on the contrary, full of honesty, integrity, sincerity, open, fair, and candid, when speaking or acting. He was for Lincoln always, but always with Lincoln's intense honesty. Mr. Lincoln was a wise man, a shrewd man, a long-headed man, full of his own policies. He was a marginal man, always leaving a wide blank on his paper, so that the future might write the future lessons thereon. Mr. Lincoln hated speculation, had no cranks, was not visionary and impracticable. He had relativly no imagination and no fancy, was material and purely practical. He had one of the very best balanced heads in America; and it was poised well on his shoulders. Henry Clay was his ideal statesman, a purely material and practical man. Mr. Lincoln's mind was purely logical, and he followed his conclusions to the ultimate end, though the world perished. I never heard Mr. Lincoln harshly condemn any man, nor did I ever hear him praise but two men; one, Thomas Jefferson, on paper; and the other, Henry Clay, in his speech and letters and in his heart. Was this jealousy, or what? I think he cared for principles and not much for men, especially if he did not want to use them for his own ends, which were generally high and noble. Mr. Lincoln had no low cunning, was not a trickster, a mere wire-puller. He scorned and detested all such political arts. His mind required and lived in facts, figures, and principles. He was destitute of faith which comes and goes without evidence. His own reason and human experience were his authority, and these only with him were authority.

It is a fact that Mr. Lincoln was a peculiar man, a wonderful, marvelous, and mysterious man to the world generally. I was with him for about twenty-five years; and I think I knew him well. Mr. Lincoln never took the advice of any man or set of men, generally speaking. He never asked the opinion or advice of any man. He was self-reliant, self-poised, self-helping, and self-assertiv, but not dogmatic by any means. He clung like gravity to his own opinions. He was the most continuous and severest thinker in America. He read but little, and that for an end. Politics were his heaven, and his hades metaphysics. His tendency in philosophy was materialistic; he was an evolutionist; and yet, as the letter now presented to you shows, he believed in God, a maker, immortality, and heaven. I am not now advocating any particular opinion on any subject, nor denying one. I am simply stating facts, letting each man and woman draw his or her own conclusions. I giv no decided opinion about about the letter, except I know it is genuin, and now yours, which I hope you will keep to the end of your time, and then it may descend to the family as an heir-loom, a great treasure indeed.

May I say again that Mr. Lincoln was a shrewd man, a long-headed man, a wise man, full of policies? Mr. Lincoln knew that Senator Douglas was in his way in the North, and so he, at Freeport, determined to kill him [politically]. He put a question—and that, too, against his friends' advice and importunities—to Senator Douglas, which he knew the senator must answer one way or the other, and he further knew that to answer the question either way was death to Douglas—death in the North if he answered one way, and death in the South if another. It was cold, well-calculated death any way. Douglas answered, and of that answer he died. Again, after Douglas's death, in the North was only Seward to oppose him, and Lincoln detrmined to kill or outstrip him. Hence his "house divided against itself" speech here in 1858, and his speeches, his "irrepressible conflict" speeches, in Ohio. Lincoln ridiculed when he could Seward's "higher law" idea, scared some of the Republicans with it, and got the confidence somewhat of the extreme Republicans; and in his great Cooper Institute speech in New York in 1860 he drove the nail in Seward's political coffin. All this was planned and coldly calculated by Lincoln. I know this to be true.

What! this a simple-minded man? this a politically "innocent-dear" man? this a mere thing without ideas and policies? Away with all such opinions! Look how he treated his cabinet in the issuance of his great Proclamation of Emancipation. He consulted them simply about little and unimportant matters, and so said to them before he read it. He decreed to issue it. He simply wanted his cabinet to hear it read, and that is all. This proclamation was issued as by doom, and what he did was not for the love of the slave or liberty, but to save the Union. It was to preserve his "oath registered in heaven." He kept his oath, saved the Union, and with a quick dash of the military pen he freed four millions of people.

In philosophy Mr. Lincoln was a realist as opposed to an idealist, was a sensationalist as opposed to an intuitionalist, a Materialist as opposed to a Spiritualist, and yet remember what he says in his letter. I said to you in a private letter that Mr. Lincoln was at all times and places under all circumstances a deeply and a thoroughly religious man, sincerely, firmly, broadly, and grandly so. I do not say he was a Christian. I do not say that he was not. I giv no opinion the one way or the other. I simply state facts and let each person judge for himself.

I say, in short, in terms of contradiction, if you please, that Mr. Lincoln was a perfect and imperfect man, a strong man and a weak one; but take him all in all, he was one of the best, wisest, greatest, and noblest of men in all the ages.

Most respectfully yours, WM. H. HERNDON.

MR. LINCOLN'S LETTER TO HIS STEP-BROTHER.

SPRINGFIELD, Jan. 12, 1851.

DEAR BROTHER: On the day before yesterday I received a letter from Harriet, written as Greenup. She says she has just returned from your house, and that father is very low, and will hardly recover. She also says that you hav written me two letters, and that, although you do not expect me to come now, you wonder that I do not write. I received both your letters, and although I hav not answered them, it is not because I hav forgotten them or been uninterested about them, but because it appeared to me I could write nothing which could do any good. You already know I desire that neither father nor mother shall be in want of any comfort, either in health or sickness, while they liv; and I feel sure you hav not failed to use my name, if necessary, to procure a doctor, or anything else for father in his present sickness. My business is such that I could hardly leave home now, if it was not as it is, that my own wife is sick a-bed. I sincerely hope father may yet recover his health; but at all events tell him to remember to call upon and confide in our great and good and merciful maker, who will not turn away from him in any extremity. He notes the fall of a sparrow, and numbers the hairs of our heads, and he will not forget the dying man who puts his trust in him. Say to him that if we could meet now, it is doubtful whether it would not be more painful than pleasant; but that if it be his lot to go now, he will soon hav a joyous meeting with many loved ones gone before, and where the rest of us, through the help of God, hope ere long to join them.

Write to me again when you receive this.

Affectionately, A. LINCOLN.

We saw this at the time it was published, and knowing that Mr. Herndon had written us previously that Mr. Lincoln was an unbeliever in the Christian religion, we wrote him asking why he wrote to the minister as he did. Letters from him hav appeared heretofore in our columns, and in the Milwaukee Liberal Age for January he had a long letter which we tranfer to our columns (p. 148), so that, together with his letter which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 24th, our readers may hav all the evidence pro and con, and be able to judge for themselvs. This is his answer to ours inquiring about the Tribune letter:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Feb. 8, 1883.

MR. MACDONALD, My Friend: In my letter to a minister of the gospel in New York I was afraid to say that Mr. Lincoln was not a Christian. I went in that line as far as I thought I could succeed. This is my reason for not saying that Lincoln was not a Christian. If I erred, you know the reason. On the whole, I think the letter is plain enough—think the good people will understand it.

Whether Mr. Lincoln was a believer or an unbeliever makes not the slightest difference regarding the truths of Freethought or the untruths of Christianity. With Col. Ingersoll, we "think more of reasons than of reputations, more of principles than of persons, more of nature than of names, more of facts than of faiths." Mr. Ingersoll seems to accept Mr. Lincoln as a fellow-heretic, and it is probable that he has other reasons than any one's word for his belief, as he is an Illinoisian and was an officer of the army in the late war.

But there is considerable other evidence, aside from all this, that Lincoln was an Infidel. In the debate between Mr. Bennett and the Rev. G. H. Humphrey, the question of Lincoln's belief was discussed, and as Mr. Bennett made a thorough examination of the subject, we cannot do better than to quote his words. He said:

"I was not aware that the religious views of Abraham Lincoln were to form a part of this discussion, but I will endeavor to follow where you lead. Let us see whether he was a Christian or an Infidel. The position he occupied, and the necessity which forced him to strike the fetters from the limbs of the slaves hav made him a very distinguished character in our country's history, and the church must needs claim him as her own, so she can monopolize the entire credit of overthrowing slavery. Lincoln had clear and settled views upon theological subjects, which he maintained through life, but it must be admitted that, after he became exclusively a politician and realized how much his success depended upon the support of the masses, a large share of whom were at least professed Christians, he did not at all times make his secret views known; that in his public speeches he used some of the cant phrases which he well knew would fall pleasantly upon the ears of the superstitious masses. It must be conceded, also, that he did occasionally drop a remark that might be construed to mean that he had some faith in the Christian religion, and that from a spirit of playfulness, or of inquiry, he appeared at times to be investigating the subject of Christianity, but that Lincoln was all his life an out-and-out Infidel is one of the clearest propositions that can be made; and had I the space I could giv you many pages, of the size of this, of certificates, letters, and statements of the men who knew him intimately, and all confirming the fact of his unbelief.

"Lincoln was eminently a kind-hearted, humane person, but he became an Infidel to Christian theology when a mere youth. He never believed in the divinity of the Bible, nor that Jesus Christ was God or the begotten son of God. By referring to pages 486 and 487 of Lamon's 'Life of Lincoln' you will read as follows: 'Mr. Lincoln was never a member of any church, nor did he believe in the divinity of Christ, or in the inspiration of the scriptures in the sense understood by evangelical Christians. His theological opinions were substantially those expounded by Theodore Parker. Overwhelming testimony out of many mouths, and none stronger than that out of his own, places these facts beyond controversy. When a boy he showed no sign of that piety which his many biographers ascribe to his manhood. . . . When he went to church at all, he went to mock, and came away to mimic. Indeed, it is more than probable that the sort of "religion" which prevailed among the associates of his boyhood impressed him with a very poor opinion of the value of the article. On the whole, he thought, perhaps, a person had better be without it. When he removed to New Salem he consorted with Feeethinkers; joined with them in deriding the gospel history of Jesus; read Volney and Paine, and then wrote a deliberate and labored essay wherein he reached conclusions similar to theirs. The essay was burnt (by his friend, Mr. Hill), but he never denied or regretted its composition. On the contrary, he made it the subject of free and frequent conversation with his friends at Springfield, and stated with much particularity and precision the origin, arguments, and objects of the work."

"James H. Matheny, of Springfield, Ill., who intimately knew Mr. Lincoln for over twenty-five years, in a letter to Wm. H. Herndon, uses this language: 'I knew Mr. Lincoln as early as 1834–7; know he was an Infidel. He and W. D. Herndon used to talk Infidelity in the clerk's office in this city, about the years 1837–40. Lincoln attacked the Bible and the New Testament on two grounds; first, from the inherent or apparent contradictions under its lids; second, from the grounds of reason. Sometimes he ridiculed the Bible and the New Testament; sometimes he seemed to scoff at it, though I shall not use that word in its full and literal sense. I never heard that Mr. Lincoln changed his views, though his personal and political friend from 1834 to 1860. Sometimes Lincoln bordered on Atheism. He went far that way and often shocked me. . . . Lincoln would come into the clerk's office, and would bring the Bible with him; would read a chapter; argue against it. . . . Lincoln often, if not wholly, was an Atheist; at least, bordered on it. He was enthusiastic in his Infidelity. As he grew older he grew more discreet; didn't talk so much before strangers about his religion; but to friends, close and bosom ones, he was always open and avowed, fair and honest; but to strangers he held them off from policy. . . . Mr. Lincoln did tell me that he did write a little book on Infidelity. This statement I hav avoided heretofore; but as you strongly insist upon it I giv it to you as I got it from Lincoln's mouth' (Lamon's 'Life of Lincoln,' pp. 487 and 488).

"Mr. Lamon givs numerous other letters of the same tenor from the old friends and acquaintances of Lincoln, bearing testimony of his Infidelity. I would be glad to lay them before you and my readers, but space will not permit their introduction here. I will giv in addition a few passages from a letter of the Hon. John T. Stuart, of Springfield, Ill: 'I knew Mr. Lincoln when he first came here, and for years afterward. He was an avowed and open Infidel; sometimes bordered on Atheism. Lincoln went further against Christian beliefs, doctrins, and principles than any man I ever heard. . . . He always denied that Jesus was the Christ of God; denied that Jesus was the son of God, as understood and maintained by the Christian church. The Rev. Dr. Smith, who wrote a letter, tried to convert Lincoln from Infidelity so late as 1858, and couldn't do it!' Mr. Lamon givs more than twenty pages of similar matter, but I must quote no more. Now, in the face of all this, it is rather up-hill work to make a pious Christian of Lincoln."

[Lamon's "Life" is accounted good authority by the writer of the article on Lincoln in Johnson's Cyclopedia.]

"If you can make a good Christian of a man who totally denies the divinity of Christ, the inspiration of the Bible, and who borders upon Atheism, why, Ingersoll and myself might as well be counted in at once. We hav not been more pronounced in our Infidelity, either by speaking or writing, than was Abraham Lincoln. There is no use in trying to evade the testimony of honorable men who knew him for a lifetime, and quote against their evidence what some priest or interested sectarian biographer might imagin or wish as to Lincoln's views.

"As to Mr. Colfax, he did say in his lecture [Mr. Humphrey denied this and said Colfax only said Lincoln was not a church-member] delivered in Brooklyn, March 25, 1876, that Lincoln was not a believer in Christianity. I got it from a party who heard the lecture. It was so reported also in some of the daily papers, and to make the thing doubly sure, a friend of mine writing to a party in South Bend, Ind., the home of Colfax, asked him to call upon Colfax and inquire of him in regard to Lincoln's belief. He did so, and Colfax confirmed what he had said in his lecture. But as Colfax knows no more about Lincoln's religious opinions than hundreds of others, and inasmuch as the veracity of this "Christian statesman" on some other important matters has been seriously questioned, pertaining to questionable operations in which he was implicated, I will not insist upon his testimony being taken in this case."

And on page 107 of the same book he says:

"Nothing is better proved than that Lincoln was an Infidel for more than a quarter of a century, and there is no reliable testimony that he changed his belief after going to Washington. His private secretary and intimate friend, John G. Nicolay, testified that he did not change. That he occasionally made use of ambiguous remarks which might giv the impression that he had confidence in prayer, etc., is quite possible, but there is no probability that he believed that 'Christ is God,' and I do not believe that he ever said so."

The Mr. Nicolay whom Mr. Bennett refers to was Lincoln's private secretary and intimate friend, and the language he used is, "Mr. Lincoln did not to my knowledge change his religious ideas, opinions, or beliefs, from the time he left Springfield [Ill.] to the day of his death." Mrs. Lincoln also made a similar statement when she visited Springfield after his death. One of the sayings he frequently quoted was, "What is to be will be, and no prayers of ours can arrest the decree" (Sages, p. 774).

So late as last year, Mr. Nicolay wrote for the Encyclopedia Britannica the article on Lincoln, in which he says his "nature was deeply religious, but he belonged to no denomination; he had faith in the eternal justice and boundless mercy of providence, and made the Golden Rule of Christ his practical creed." Had he believed in the Christian religion he would undoubtedly hav joined some church, which he never did; and the "Golden Rule of Christ" being also the golden rule of Confucius, he could as appropriately be called a Confucian as a Christian. The truth about him will be found between the two extremes of Atheism and Christianity. He was neither one nor the other, but rejected the Bible as revelation while still holding to the faith that there was a God—in short, a Deist, like Thomas Paine, whose works and thought he had read and assimilated in his young manhood's days. And it appears that he sometimes even doubted the existence of this God.

As to Gerrit Smith, Mr. Bellinger is wrong. He was a decided unbeliever in Christianity. Johnson's Cyclopedia says that although he "built a church at Peterboro, in which he sometimes preached," he "underwent considerable fluctuations in his religious creed." From being a Presbyterian church-member he became a Unitarian, Universalist, and finally an Infidel. Defending Universalism upon one occasion, he said: "Nobody can believe in hell—the world would be frozen with horror." A number of years previous to his death he published a series of discourses on the "Religion of Reason," which were a direct attack upon the inspiration and authenticity of the Christian scriptures. They were so radical that he was obliged to hire their insertion in the Tribune by paying one dollar per line. Like nearly all the Abolitionists—Parker Pillsbury, Elizur Wright, Amy Post, Lucy N. Colman, and others—he evoluted into open Infidelity.

This is all the light we hav at present upon the subject. If any one has more, let him produce it. Whether it makes for or against us we want truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Had we not believed that Mr. Herndon is honest in what he says, he would hav sought further than THE TRUTH SEEKER before finding a publisher for his letters. However, the readers can decide that question for themselvs.

The English Inquisition at Work.

Last Monday G. W. Foote, editor of the London Freethinker, W. J. Ramsay, proprietor, and Mr. Kemp, the printer, were convicted of blasphemy, and Mr. Foote was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment, Mr. Ramsay to nine months, and Mr. Kemp to three. The dispatch states that Mr. Foote's sentence provoked a storm of yells in court, but whether of horror at the outrage or of Christian hate it does not say. It might well hav been the former.

Another dispatch of the same date says the Society for the Suppression of Blasphemous Literature propose to get up cases against Profs. Huxley and Tyndall, Herbert Spencer, the publishers of John Stuart Mill's works, Mr. John Morley, and others, who "by their writing hav sown widespread unbelief and in some cases rank Atheism." Such a proceeding would be entirely in keeping with the character of this detestable Christian association of bigots, and if Mr. Foote can be imprisoned a year there is no safety for anyone. The English Freethinkers should destroy this society, root and branch, tumble the judge from the bench, and repeal the statute. That should be their work, and no effort should be spared until it is accomplished. Meanwhile let us in this country see to it that no such monstrous injustice is perpetrated, for, encouraged by the English precedent—so potent in our courts—the American bigots may try their hand at religious persecution.

THE Freethinkers of Boulder, Col., hav organized a Liberal Club, adopting the platform of the Liberal League, and are now in need of some good speakers. Will the lecturers in the West who can visit Boulder, please communicate with the secretary, Mr. Charles Ambrook?

A Letter from the Chairman of the Monument Committee.

MRS. BENNETT, Dear Friend: Inclosed you will find my autograph, in this case worth about fifty dollars, which is my donation to the Bennett Monument Fund. It expresses but a very limited amount of the love and esteem in which I held your noble husband; but you know all that without telling, as he also knew, and for which he in many ways showed a reciprocal spirit.

Of all things I most desire in connection with the monument, it is that it may be the expression of a popular sentiment, and grow from the dollars of all the Liberals individually in preference to the large donations of the few, and I trust that in that spirit it will grow a fund large enough, and speedily, to make certain a grand, enduring monument to Mr. Bennett's memory that every liberty-loving spirit will feel proud of.

Many Liberals can well afford to, and no doubt will, eventually, subscribe sums in proportion to their means, and do so as a privilege; but just now, as chairman of the committee, it will delight me to hail the small amounts from all quarters of the country.

With fraternal regards, I am,

Respectfully yours, DANIEL EDWARD RYAN.

New York, Feb. 28, 1883.

Bigotry Squelched Again in Montana.

As will be seen by the following letter, the church has had another rebuke administered to her. It is good to feel that there is one place in this country free from Christian pharisaism:

BUTTE, CITY, MON., Feb. 25, 283.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Every year our territorial legislature convenes, some religious crank endeavors to pass a Sunday law. Notwithstanding the fact that seven-eighths of the people of this territory are Liberals; that the church pews are empty; that the people are enlightened, hospitable, and tolerant; these goody-goody, brainless Sunday-school ushers try to foist a Sunday law on us. Their last effort was squashed last Monday by a vote of 13 to 11. Even if it had passed the house, the council would hav sat down on it hard. The president of the council, Hon. Granville Stuart, is a talented Liberal, is scientific and a great admirer of the late Prof. Draper.

Hoping that THE TRUTH SEEKER and all connected with it will hav "good medicin" forever, I close.

Yours truly, FRED. COOKE.

Lecturers and Lectures.

W. F. JAMIESON is engaged to deliver a course of five lectures in Kinsman, Ohio. He wishes to receive calls to lecture in Ohio and Pennsylvania. Address him at Kinsman, Ohio.

MRS. LAKE has been re-engaged by the Liberals of Milwaukee for the month of March. She will speak at the Spiritual Convention at Omro, Wis., March 31st and April 1st; April 8th she begins a month's engagement at Salem, Ohio. Parties desiring lectures in that vicinity during week evenings will address her at 219 Grand ave. Milwaukee, Wis.

MR. WATTS is now delivering his second course of lectures in Boston and vicinity. After visiting Montreal and Toronto (Can.), Mr. Watts will return to New York and sail for England the first week in April. The farewell lecture of Mr. Charles Watts, previous to his return to England, will be given in the German Masonic Temple, 220 East 15th street (rooms of the Liberal Club), at 8 o'clock, Sunday evening, March 18th, subject, "Civilization, its Aids and Obstacles." Tickets, admitting one, 25 cents. For sale at this office. We hope all who can will attend, and give him a rousing good meeting to remember when he goes home.

IT is the intention of Mr. Chainey to devote a few weeks to lecturing in the West during the latter part of April and first of May. His terms are $35 for one lecture and $50 for two. The subjects will be "Leaves of Grass," "Jo Cook," and "Godless Morality." He desires that societies wishing a lecture should confer with him promptly, that he may arrange his route. During his absence his place will be filled by T. B. Wakeman, Courtlandt Palmer, and S. P. Putnam. Mr. Chainey would also like to find some Liberal with $2,000 or $3,000 who would conduct the publishing part of his business. His address is 14 Pemberton Square, Boston, Mass.

A Correction.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of Feb. 10th, under the heading of "Notes and Clippings," is an account of a marriage which for the most part is only apparently incorrect, caused by using the feminin instead of the masculin gender. They were married very "satisfactorily to themselvs." She never "insisted on a ceremony."

The squire's initials should hav been A. B. instead of A. C. The date of the marriage also should hav been 1882 instead of 1881. Any form of marriage witnessed is legal in the state of Pennsylvania.

BY ERNST HAECKEL.

Now, if we ask what evidence can be drawn, as to the pedigree of Apes, from the above facts, we must conclude that all the Apes of the New World hav developed out of one tribe, for they all possess the characteristic jaw and the nasal formation of the Platyrrhini. In like manner it follows that all the Apes of the Old World must be derived from one and the same common primary form, which possesses the same formation of nose and jaw as all the still living Catarrhini. Further, it can scarcely be doubted that the Apes of the New World, taken as an entire tribe, are either derived from those of the Old World, or (to express it more vaguely and cautiously) both are diverging branches of one and the same tribe of Apes. We also arrive at the exceedingly important conclusion—which is of the utmost significance in regard to Man's distribution on the earth's surface—that Man has developed out of the Catarrhini. For we cannot discover a zoological character distinguishing him in a higher degree from the allied Apes of the Old World than that in which the most divergent forms of this group are distinguished from one another. This is the important result of Huxley's careful anatomical examination of the question, and it cannot be too highly estimated. The anatomical differences between Man and the most human-like Catarrhini (Orang, Gorilla, Chimpanzee) are in every respect less than the anatomical differences between the latter and the lowest stages of Catarrhini, more especially the Dog-like Baboon. This exceedingly important conclusion is the result of an impartial anatomical comparison of the different forms of Catarrhini.

If, therefore, we recognize the natural system of animals as a guide to our speculations, and establish upon it our pedigree, we must necessarily come to the conclusion that the human race is a small branch of the group of Catarrhini, and has developed out of long since extinct Apes of this group in the Old World. Some adherents of the Theory of Descent hav thought that the American races of Man hav developed, independently of those of the Old World, out of American Apes. I consider this hypothesis to be quite erroneous, for the complete agreement of all mankind with the Catarrhini, in regard to the characterisic formation of the nose and jaws, distinctly proves that they are of the same origin, and that they developed out of a common root after the Platyrrhini, or American Apes, had already branched off from them. The primeval inhabitants of America, as is proved by numerous ethnographical facts, immigrated from Asia, and partly perhaps from Polynesia (or even from Europe).

There still exist great difficulties in establishing an accurate pedigree of the Human Race; this only can we further assert, that the nearest progenitors of man were tailless Catarrhini (Lipocerca), resembling the still living Man-like Apes. These evidently developed at a late period out of tailed Catarrhini (Menocerca), the original form of Ape. Of those tailless Catarrhini, which are now frequently called Man-like Apes, or Anthropoides, there still exist four different genera containing about a dozen different species.

The largest Man-like Ape is the famous Gorilla (called Gorilla engena, or Pongo gorilla), which is indigenous to the tropics of western Africa, and was first discovered by the missionary, Dr. Savage, in 1847, on the banks of the river Gaboon. Its nearest relativ is the Chimpanzee (Engeco troglodytes, or Pongo troglodytes), also indigenous to western Africa, but considerably smaller than the Gorilla, which surpasses man in size and strength. The third of the three large Man-like Apes is the Orang, or Orang Outang, indigenous to Borneo and the other Sunda Islands, of which two kindred species hav recently been distinguished, namely, the large Orang (Satyrus orang, or Pithecus satyrus) and the small Orang (Satyrus morio, or Pithecus morio). Lastly, there still exists in southern Asia the genus Gibbon (Hylobates), of which from four to eight different species are distinguished. They are considerably smaller than the three first-named Anthropoides, and in most characteristics differ more from Man.

The tailless Man-like Apes—especially since we hav become more intimately acquainted with the Gorilla, and its connection with Man by the application of the Theory of Descent—hav excited such universal interest, and called forth such a flood of writings, that there is no occasion for me here to enter into any detail about them. The reader will find their relations to Man fully discussed in the excellent works of Huxley, Carl Vogt, Büchner, and Rolle. I shall therefore confine myself to stating the most important general conclusion resulting from their thorough comparison with Man, namely, that each one of the four Man-like Apes stands nearer to Man in one or several respects than the rest, but that no one of them can in every respect be called absolutely the most like Man. The Orang stands nearest to Man in regard to the formation of the brain, the Chimpanzee in important characteristics in the formation of the skull, the Gorilla in the development of the feet and hands, and, lastly, the Gibbon in the formation of the thorax.

Thus, from a careful examination of the comparativ anatomy of the Anthropoides, we obtain a similar result to that obtained by Weisbach, from a statistical classification and a thoughtful comparison of the very numerous and careful measurements which Scherzer and Schwarz made of the different races of Men during their voyage in the Austrian frigate Novara round the earth. Weisbach comprises the final result of his investigations in the following words: "The Ape-like Characteristics of Man are by no means concentrated in one or another race, but are distributed in particular parts of the body, among the different races, in such a manner that each is endowed with some heirloom of this relationship—one race more so, another less, and even we Europeans cannot claim to be entirely free from evidences of this relationship" ("Novara-Reise," Anthropholog. Theil).

I must here also point out, what in fact is self-evident, that not one of all the still living Apes, and consequently not one of the so-called Man-like Apes, can be the progenitor of the Human Race. This opinion, in fact, has never been maintained by thoughtful adherents of the Theory of Descent, but it has been assigned to them by their thoughtless opponents. The Ape-like progenitors of the Human Race are long since extinct. We may possibly still find their fossil bones in the tertiary rocks of southern Asia or Africa. In any case they will, in the zoological system, hav to be classed in the group of tailless Narrow-nosed Apes (Catarrhini Lipocerci, or Anthropoides).

The genealogical hypotheses, to which we hav thus far been led by the application of the Theory of Descent to Man, present themselvs to every clearly and logically reasoning person as the direct results from the facts of comparativ anatomy, ontogeny, and paleontology. Of course our phylogeny can indicate only in a very general way the outlines of the human pedigree. Phylogeny is the more in danger of becoming erroneous the more rigorously it is applied in detail to special animal forms known to us. However, we can, even now, with approximate certainty distinguish at least the following twenty-two stages of the ancestors of Man. Fourteen of these stages belong to the Vertebrata, and eight to the Invertebrate ancestors of Man (Prochordata).

Heywood and Morse.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It seems to me that the right word has not been said in respect to the character, purpose, and conduct of Ezra H. Heywood, and his present contest with the United States authorities. The whole thing is in a nut-shell, and everybody seems to overlook it. Irrelevant things are said, which leave the gist of the matter untouched. Some say: What a wrong-headed and foolish man! What a pity! to do just what he knew would bring him into trouble. Others, What awful bad taste, to persist in using naughty words, and in writing about things that society wants to "keep hush" about. Other some say: Is it possible that he has an unaccountable idiosyncrasy which makes him love to dabble in filth? and, Is there nothing else in the world that he could talk and write about? Still others, true friends of Heywood and of freedom, half admitting some one or all of these damaging assumptions, still loyally and faithfully contend that our theory and love of freedom ought to be broad enough, like a cloak of charity, to cover even this unfortunate and eccentric illustration of it; and that, in order to be true to ourselvs, we must screw our courage up to the sticking point, strain our sense of duty and consistency, and even protect Heywood—not quite seeing that it is he that is protecting us, all the while, and not otherwise!

And yet the truth, once seen in the matter, is simple and plain as a pike-staff. Why does Mr. Heywood insist on discussing a particular unpopular subject, in terms peculiarly direct, and liable to offend fastidious public sentiment? And why did he, in open defiance of a United States law, advertise and sell a particular instrument (a syringe) ordinarily used for purposes of cleanliness, but which it is supposed may be used to prevent conception? Why discuss that particular subject, and why advertise and sell that particular thing? Simply because—apart from the intrinsic importance of the subject and the thing—it is precisely that subject which an ignorant, unjust, and dangerously invasiv and anti-Liberal piece of legislation has said that he shall not discuss; and precisely that thing which it has said he shall not advertise and sell. If an issue is to be met, it must be met where the issue is; and not somewhere else, or on some other subject. The merest child and the greatest philosopher agree on this. If you tell a child that he shall not do a particular thing, if he has courage and spirit, and if, especially, he thinks he has a good right to do it, he is then and there bound to do that particular thing. It is his protest against tyranny; his assertion of his right; his acceptance of the issue; and he proposes "to fight it out on that line, if it takes all summer." The wisest and the bravest man does precisely the same. It was not a question of tea that was settled in Boston harbor, but a question of the right to tax tea or anything else, in the absence of representation. It is the enemy, often, who chooses his battle-ground. If in addition to the strength of his position he can make it a particularly muddy and distasteful undertaking to reach him in it, the brave assailant still accepts the condition, and takes the mud and slush also. Otherwise he would be defeated by this subtle strategy. If the concocter of repressiv laws can so manage as to be able to say to his opponent: "If you dare to go against this law, you will not only hav to overturn the authority of the legislature, but you will hav to run directly against a bitter public prejudice, and incur the worst possible opprobrium, as being yourself a filthy and bad man; so that, while you may be entirely in the right, you will inevitably get yourself misunderstood as being entirely in the wrong"—he will show himself an able tactician. And this is precisely what has been done in this case. The defender of freedom is dared to defend freedom on such terms, in such an issue, and at such a fearful disadvantage. Mr. Heywood is the keen-sighted and brave defender of freedom, who sees the whole situation, and accepts the issue. He defiantly says to the legal tryrant: You shall not escape me by any such trick. You shall not filch the freedom of the people away, because you hav had the skill to entrench your castle behind a ditch of foul water and slush. I will pull you down out of that castle; and if, to get at you, I hav to plunge into and wade through that ditch—as you hav designed—why, then, so be it; into and through the ditch I will go. And the innocent onlooker says: What a pity! Does the man really like slush and mud?

What are the issues? Civil liberty has been in a sense achieved; ecclesiastical liberty also; social liberty rêmains to be achieved. The emancipated thought of the world is rapidly progressing, and constantly invading new fields. It comes along, in the regular order of evolution, to sexual and physiological questions. All literature is cropping out in all directions with an unwonted free-spokenness on these subjects. But there is a margin of popular prohibition here, which can only be gradually crowded back, known as obscenity, which the public generally concur in regarding as something very horrible; although ideas are, for the most part, very childish and silly on the subject. But such as they are, they can be readily appealed to to prejudice, to deter, and to cover ulterior designs. Under this appeal, in this case, the ulterior design has been to prohibit and reverse the whole modern trend of literature toward freedom in social discussions. To that end a whole, new, and utterly un-American code of repressiv legislation has been surreptitiously foisted in upon the statute book; the most unheard-of severity of punishment enacted, and the machinery of the law set in motion to prosecute and persecute, to convict and imprison, the choicest and best men of this nominally free and truly progressiv country. Incidentally a question has arisen, among thinkers, of the possibility, desirableness, and rightfulness of limiting the increase of population. It is a tremendous and still an open question. Meantime the legal conspirator steps in, decides the question for us, against, or in the sense of old-fogydom; and the great United States government, forsooth, ignorantly, and at the suggestion of one man, enacts laws against—what? Not against pistols and daggers and knives, for the Constitution has provided for our right to bear arms, but against a necessary part of a lady's bed-chamber furniture—the women having no constitutional provision in their favor.

Here, then, we hav sprung upon us a tremendous and fatal limitation of the freedom of public discussion; and an arbitrary, unscientific, and purblind decision, by authority of law, of one of the greatest scientific questions of any age. Mr. Heywood is keen-sighted enough, and keenly sensitiv enough, as an old-time Abolitionist, to sense this subtle, daring, and skilfully planned invasion of the wonted and growing freedom of the American people; and he is brave enough and self-sacrificing enough to throw himself into the deadly breach, and resolve to conquer or die, in a new warfare for the liberties of the people. While other men sleep he is awake. While others are dismayed by the mere imputation of slush and dirt (I talk as one of the people), he welcomes any amount of it necessary to be incurred, to meet and conquer the enemy upon his own ground. If we hav not the hardihood to stand by him, let us not insult him by talking about tolerating him and protecting him. If he can tolerate us, in our supineness, it will be well, while he is protecting us and posterity.

What the tea was to the Revolutionary war; what the auction block and the overseer's whip were to the antislavery warfare; what "indulgences" were to the German Reformation, "Leaves of Grass" and the "Comstock Syringe" may be destined to become in the next and last grand campaign for human emancipation.

Heywood sees that liberties are filched away, one by one; and that the price of liberty is eternal vigilance. Take the case of Salmi Morse now going on in the courts of this city. Under the pretense of raising a revenue from the theaters, it is coming to that, that the mayor is the legally authorized censor of morals. Nobody defends Mr. Morse on the right grounds. No mayor, not the people themselvs, hav the right to sit upon and decide the morality of a play, so as to prevent others, who would decide the other way, from witnessing it. The objection is that it offends somebody's sensibilities. But the American doctrin is that people must take care of their own sensibilities, and not invoke the law to protect them.

STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

The Reason Why.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: With your permission, I will explain to W. F. Jamieson why I wrote the article published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 2, 1882, to which I find his reply in your issue of Jan. 27th; and, in order to correct an error on my part at the earliest opportunity, I will admit my mistake in saying he called the Spiritualists fools by stating just what he did say, viz., that we were believers in a compound of vagaries, inconsistencies, and absurdities which constituted a "pestilent superstition." Of course this does not say we are fools; it only affirms us to be a class of unmitigated simpletons.

This, however, had not a feather's weight with me save to raise a smile. This declaration of war on his part, coupled with the boast that his paper, the Lake Pepin Gazette, was the only anti-spiritual paper, looked like a bit of first-class, egotistic sensationalism. My mistake arose from thinking him serious. At the time, the huge joke was unperceived. I hav read a great amount of Mr. Jamieson's reported debates, and hav always given him credit for good, useful work; and had he in his reply given the whole paragraph from which he selected what hurt him the worst, your readers would hav seen that I was highly commendatory and did not design to lower the usefulness of his public labors.

Of course, Mr. Jamieson knew when he made the declaration that as one thing at a time was the true method, and that for "fifty numbers of the Gazette he would do nought else but use his abilities and means to kill the Spiritual snake logically," as he had known it for twenty-five years, and had the material for the work, that "he would do no such thing, as the Gazette was fading out of existence at the time, and as of old he would return to the lecture field." This is my position, and, thinking him serious, the one I acted upon.

Free speech, a free press, and freedom of the mails are absolute essentials for human progress; and as these constitute the trinity of secular government they occupy the foreground in Liberal endeavor. Who are the reliable friends of this "trinity in unity?" The Materialists and Spiritualists, both equally earnest and honest. Without desiring to lessen the brave work of Materialism in this respect, I cannot shut my eyes to the untiring and courageous efforts of women and men in the ranks of Spiritualism to compass the same end. Can we not all see, and be true enough to concede it? If incidentally I say the evidence in our home in favor of Spiritualism has as yet not been destroyed by any principle of science, I say no more than our dear Brother Bennett said in his reply to Mr. Winter and at other times. Certainly this givs no support to the conclusions of the Christian who talks about his evidence, save his honest convictions; for Mr. Jamieson will not assert that Mr. Bennett's conclusions and mine made us a whit less disposed to favor the truths of science, or less brave in the defense of rational liberty.

As secularism is so important, it seems to me an injudicious waste of time to antagonize the two great elements that seek to compass it. Individually I care not a whit. The difference in the two isms does not effect my work or friendship. Friends T. C. Leland, D. R. Burt, W. S. Bell, E. A. Stevens, and John S. Verity, all good sound Materialists, attest this; in fact, they are all favorits of mine, for they are sound to the core in sterling manhood. Each of these represents the true spirit of secular ideas, and the letter of Mrs. H. S. Lake, immediately after mine in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dec. 2, 1882, contains the pith and principle of the Liberal League movement. Mr. W. F. Jamieson occupies the position of a teacher, and this constitutes a feature of the "reason why" I deemed his threat and the work to follow it ill-timed. I will assure him that I had no desire to hit any one when I mentioned soiling my hands with manual labor. What I did mean was simply this, that as a rule we got the best brain work, with the clearest conception of human needs, from those who combined, in some degree, manual and intellectual efforts. This combination I esteem essential for the best bodily and mental conditions. Further, as our experience has been a large and extended one with those that make the lecture field their great life-work, we hav been taught, as Mrs. Swisshelm has said, that "no class needs reformation more than reformers." As a rule they are petted so much it spoils them. I thought this might be the case with Mr. Jamieson; I knew it was with Mr. B. F. Underwood. Had I been shrewd enough to peceive the huge joke in the Lake Pepin declaration of war, I should hav lost the laugh when I read his list of lectures at Braidwood a short time thereafter. Not one word about the Spiritual snake, and, besides this, he made his home with our mutual friend Burr and family, who are like Mr. Bennett and myself, tinctured with the "pestilent superstition;" and as far as Mr. Burr and family are concerned, W. F. Jamieson will not set them down as anything less than good practical, sensible people. Mr. Jamieson is too sensitiv; he scents persecution too readily. Suppose some societies don't want him, what of that? Others do; this should satisfy him. Were I with others to engage a Liberal speaker, without any disrespect to him, there are others I would prefer. Were it a choice between him and many spiritual lecturers, Mr. Jamieson would be my choice in the most hearty manner Tastes differ. As Mr. Jamieson is so very anxious to debate, it would giv me great pleasure to enter the lists with him, if the time could not be used to better advantage. As I said previously, my time has to be judicially used. Usually ten or more hours are spent on the shoe bench, and in addition two more in the shop; added to this three or four miles walk daily to and from work, then meal time and chores; 11 newspapers per week; social and other correspondents, 325. With this (not fear) I cannot fritter away the precious moments in a war of words. Comstockism and the injustice of church encroachments on the state needs our untiring and well directed labors; therefore neither Brother Jamieson's wisdom nor vanity can get the opportunity to air itself through an oral or written debate, by taking my time or attention. Were I, under the present stress of needed secular demands, to engage in so trifling or senseless an effort, it would be most fitting to label me a fool.

For what is best in the now, G. LYNN.

Superstition.

"The vital forces which pervade the universe are what the illiterate call God."—Draper.

Man is the highest intelligence with which we are acquainted. Theologians pretend to cognize another, whom they declare at the same time to be unknowable. They also ascribe to him the attribute of infinity, which excludes or annihilates every other existence the same in substance, thus reasoning or ruling him out of existence. If the universe be governed by eternal power, acting in accordance with eternal law, which is the ultimate conclusion of science, there is no capacity in which a God could officiate. He is not to be reckoned among the necessities which exist for the execution of universal law. Nor can he be the law-giver, as some would hav us believe, for what is eternal neither suggests nor implies an author.

Beecher says "God is only an idea," and the fool hath said, "There is no God." We are born fools; we become philosophers. The God idea can find no permanent abode within the realms of discursiv thought. The vocabulary of science is purely Atheistic. To excuse his ignorance man has found it most convenient to invent a phantasm, which he has made the basis of every superstition from Fetichism to Christianity. By the aid of his God the theologian is enabled to account for what might otherwise remain to him quite inexplicable. For instance, the best informed tell us that God made man out of mud, which he had previously made out of nothing, while the less cultured South Sea Islander has a tradition that he sprang from worms which fed upon a vine planted upon a rock by the daughter of the Samoan Jupiter. Mankind may therefore, according to either hypothesis, with not a little propriety, be regarded as "worms of the dust." Deprive the self-styled religionists of their god—the keystone of their superstructure—and you reduce them to the defenseless condition of an army of new-born babes.

Theology is older than science. Its history proclaims it the child of ignorance. Had its birth been the least dependent upon science it never would hav been conceived, for there is not the slightest relationship between them. As the one advances, so declines the other. Huxley well observes that "extinguished theologians lie about the cradle of every science as the strangled snakes beside that of Hercules." The dreadful contest, though long and sanguinary, but successful, has been fought against fearful odds with the legions of superstition, which first created dissensions in the house of its friends, many of whom had to be sacrificed upon the altar of civil strife before the birth of rationalism could be accounted even the barest possibility.

Truth, like the human race itself, has undergone many an arduous struggle for existence, wherein the doctrin of evolution demonstrates itself none the less unerringly. Indeed it might be regarded as a human characteristic, having at times been eliminated, but only to be afterward inherited in a more pronounced form. Spontaneous generation invariably develops its existence under circumstances favorable to its birth; and history records that from its first appearance in the world it has always had to encounter a host of bigots marshaled in order to stamp it out, and when they find it will not down and out, their policy is to capitulate upon whatever terms will afford them the best opportunities for perverting its application to misdirect the foolish and otherwise serve their own selfish purposes.

The recantation of Galileo was his victory, not that of his malicious persecutors; but the same spirit of bigotry that fought the Copernican theory of the solar system is alive to-day. It is even trying to put an "omnipresent" God into the Constitution of the United States. It raises up a theologian to assassinate the nation's president, for whose recovery its dupes vainly exhaust their energies in prayer, while the assassin would shift the responsibility of the crime upon his imaginary deity in order to escape the gallows.

The phenomenon of religion is evidently the most instrumental of all the intellectual characteristics in preventing the free exercise of the reasoning faculties. When sane men apply the rules of logic to the same premises they ought to arrive at the same conclusions. Why they disagree is because the rationalist deduces his conclusion from the premises, while the theologian deduces his premises from the conclusion. The fault is not with the instrument of logic, but with those who misapply it and become only experts in the art of subterfuge, which they mistake for argument. If all that has been said to no purpose by those whom the world has considered wise could be collected and published, it would make a work of such gigantic magnitude that no man could be found rich enough to possess himself of a single copy.

History does not warrant the conclusion that progress marked the epoch when Judaism was superseded by Christianity, nor when the Roman mythology was supplanted by an equally preposterous superstition, which also extinguished the genius of Italian literature and statesmanship, and inaugurated "the dark ages," by which the civilization of the world has been retarded for many generations. Had the event of the great battle of Tours, eleven hundred and fifty years ago, united the horns of the Mohammedan crescent, there would hav been no Spanish inquisition to blacken the pages of history with its damnable record, no further continuation of the long line of lingering popes, who had already outraged the name of decency by their atrocious cruelties and hellish debaucheries. It were just as acceptable to hear preached the unity of God as his duality, trinity, quadrinity, quintinity, sextinity, septinity, octinity, or his nonintity, which approaches nearest the writer's dogma, it being only necessary to change an i to an e.

The era of progress is contemporaneous with the discoveries of modern science; when astronomy defined the relativ position of our planet in the sidereal heavens; when the art of printing rendered learning possible with the commonality; when the mariner's compass was utilized in directing navigators to unknown lands beyond the seas; when steam transit reduced time and space to comparativ insignificance, and electricity subsequently annihilated both.

In our own country we hav a large, though happily diminishing, number of these superstitionists, holding a variety of whims called creeds, but classed under the general name of Christians, who are activly engaged in the philanthropic work, as they call it, of sending missionaries to the people of distant lands to supplant the nativ mythology with their own; but whether the dividends from the enterprise justify the investment is a question that should engage the earnest consideration of every true humanitarian until all the churches of this benighted land shall be used for a nobler purpose than robbing the innocent of their brains and money. Shall we sit with our voices mute and arms supinely folded, waiting for coming generations to declare the superstition of our day a nuisance? or shall we deal with their fossilized dogmas as if those who yet uphold them had flourished with their still more ignorant ancestry of two thousand years ago? To invent a system of falsehoods and impose it upon the credulity of others is criminal enough, but what shall we say of the participes criminis who persist in propagating the diabolical institution after the verdict of common sense, history, and science has declared it to be a farce?

With truth has it been said that "superstition is a religion out of fashion, while religion is a superstition in fashion," the difference being only a question of time. One is obsolete, the other obsolescent. Philologically speaking they are synonymous terms. For the perpetuity of an infamous superstition, for the defense of a word, call it the word of God if you please, our boasted "land of the free and home of the brave" maintains an army of seventy-five thousand stall-fed priests. These intellectual dead-heads are a heavy incumbrance upon the ship of state. They insinuate themselvs into the body politic, and by their nefarious influence impede the wheels of the car of progress. They would convert the noble democracy of Paine, Washington, Jefferson, and Franklin into a theocracy, which they hav practically done in numerous instances by their base instrumentality in having some of our purest countrymen incarcerated in dark and loathsome bastiles for the gratification of their malicious ferocity. They pay no taxes upon their houses of worship, built by the meanest extortion that the ingenuity of diabolism could practice upon ignorance, thus making their infernal contrivance a semi-state institution, and compelling an innocent populace to aid in fostering the most gigantic fraud of ancient and modern times. In view of the enormous tax-title upon these occidental pagodas, wherein credulity begets lunacy, a more justifiable and beneficial act of confiscation could not be imagined than for the government to convert them into halls of science for the education of Young America. We need American citizens, not soldiers of the cross. Let the blood-stained banner of Jesus be furled, and his warriors mustered out. J. J. BURDGE.

Letters from Friends.

GLOUCESTER, Feb. 19, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Please find inclosed $1 to help erect a monument in memory of that great and good man, D. M. Bennett. Yours truly,

MRS. HENRY P. DAVIS.

HORNITOS, Feb. 16, 283.

MR. EDITOR: My sorrow at the loss of our champion, D. M. Bennett, is only expressed in the most sympathetic of your many letters. I approve of the Parkhurst idea of a Bennett Hall, and will contribute to the same according to my means. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER every success, I remain yours,

A subscriber for life, R. W. BARCROFT.

RAVENNA, Feb. 26, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $16. This makes twelve names I hav sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I think I will be able to send three or four more in a short time. I think in sending THE TRUTH SEEKER among the people I am striking priestcraft and theology the heaviest blow that I can, and I wish to help to strike them out of existence.

Yours in sorrow for our loss, JAMES F. TIBBITS.

SPRINGFIELD, Feb. 26, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5.50—$2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, $1.50 for the fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," $1 for the monument, and 50 cents for the lithograph of D. M Bennett. If the Bennett Hall goes up I will giv $5 toward it. I am truly sorry for D. M. Bennett; he was doing a good work. I am glad that the paper keeps on with the same good work.

Yours truly, MARK POWER.

U. S. S. "AJAX," CITY POINT, Feb. 1, 283.

MRS. MARY W. BENNETT: Please find inclosed $5, the amount I promised toward a monument for your late husband. I am not a very good writer—that is, on long letters—so you must excuse me for writing a short one; but my sympathy is and was with you all along. I first got acquainted with THE TRUTH SEEKER in England, about 1875, and hav been reading it ever since. Hoping that you may prosper in the trust left to you, I remain

Fraternally yours, FRED. SMITH.

PEPIN LAKE FARM, Feb. 23, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4—$2.50 for renewal of my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $1.50 for three trial subscribers. This is what every old subscriber should feel to be his duty for the memory of its founder, D. M. Bennett, who knew no motiv but duty and no guide but truth.

Permit me to say that THE TRUTH SEEKER'S firm stand taken in the interest of truth-finding and Freethought, as evinced by its fairness and freedom to all in discussion, merits the support of every fair-minded Freethinker in the land, whether he be Materialist, Agnostic, Spiritualist, or Deist.

MARIUS HEIGHTON.

CERESCO, Feb. 20, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I need not say how we all mourn for our beloved Bennett. His equal is seldom seen, but we all must go. I am nearly in my seventy-eighth year, was seventy before I burst the bonds of "believe in Jesus or go to hell and be damned"—an awful yoke for us poor creatures to wear all our lives. After being born in poverty and superstition of the most degrading kind, I feel like a slave that has just got his liberty. Thanks to Bennett the brave and all who help to take this Christian yoke off the necks of the human family, put there by the cunning priest.

Yours for humanity. THOS. KNIGHT.

TWIN LAKES, Feb. 19, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Though late to offer my condolence, you may nevertheless believe that I feel the loss of our dear Mr. Bennett, your husband, as deep as any, and deferred my testimony only in order to at the same time renew my subscription, with which nobody ought to tarry now. I subscribed first when our never-to-be-forgotten D. M. Bennett was put in prison; in fact, this was the cause, as I saw then that the Liberals would hav to rally around a common standard; and what better one could we chose than the sheet of the martyr to the common cause?

Inclosed find $3, of which please to apply $2.50 to one year's subscription. HENRY STRAUP.

JANESVILLE, Feb. 2, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Find inclosed money order for three dollars; two and a half to renew subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and fifty cents for the paper to a trial subscriber.

We hav a small town of about six hundred inhabitants, and four churches and seven preachers of different denominations, making seven roads to an imaginary heaven, besides a fair sprinkling of Freethinkers, the most of them of the Index kind. THE TRUTH SEEKER is too plain-spoken, and tells too much truth to suit them. The first bit of print that ever I saw that filled the bill was entitled "Old Abe and Little Ike." I hav D. M. Bennett's likeness, and want the portrait of M. W. Bennett to hang beside his.

H. H. RICHARDS.

MUSKEGON, Feb. 27, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: In looking over my paper I find myself tardy in renewing my subscription, and I now hasten to perform that duty. Inclosed please find $19.00, which apply as per inclosed slip. The article in your issue of Feb. 10, headed, "Both Sides of the Question," has the genuin ring to it, and suits me exactly. Tho gap created by the "illiberal Liberal" deserters from THE TRUTH SEEKER will be filled with stanch adherents—Liberals in the true sense of the word, Liberals of the E. C. Walker type, who are opposed to all fanatical tyranny, and in favor of personal liberty—who are lovers of fair play and desire to see all sides of a question fairly discussed. THE TRUTH SEEKER management has evidently fallen into able hands since the death of its respected founder, and that it may always continue the faithful champion of liberty is the wish of

J. A. ROBINSON.

ATLANTA, GA., Feb. 21, 1882.

MRS. MARY W. BENNETT: I send you inclosed $5—$2.50 to pay for my TRUTH SEEKER till the 28th of January, 1884; $1.50 for the fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around The World," and $1 for the Bennett monument.

I deeply sympathize with you in the loss of your great and good husband, D. M. Bennett.

A great and useful man was cut off too soon, but such is the inevitable. I was horribly shocked when I saw the paper in mourning, and the announcement of Mr. Bennett's death. I made his acquaintance when I was in New York in 1874; he then had his office on Broadway; I believe that I was the first one that introduced THE TRUTH SEEKER into this city. I brought a lot of them with me when I returned home, and distributed them around, and ever since I hav been a reader of them. I consider THE TRUTH SEEKER, the best Liberal paper published, at least it is my preference.

What a pity that the Spiritualists and Materialists cannot get along together without turning their batteries on one another. It is a waste of force as well as ink and paper. What a pity we were not all cast in the same mold, and then we could all think alike.

Why, some of the Materialists are as illiberal as any Calvinist ever dared to be. It is a positiv shame to hear them abusing one another, but the Materialist nearly always makes the attack on the Spiritualist. I don't know how others may look at it, but from my standpoint, I think that there is plenty of work for all to do, and let each one do it in their own peculiar way.

Yours respectfully, MRS. S. H. DAVIS.

MR. EDITOR: The members of the Liberal League of Dowagiac, Mich., assembled on Sunday Jan. 28th, at the residence of Amos Knapp, of Silver Creek, to hold a festival in commemoration of the birthday of Thomas Paine. As usual they found everything at the farm house arranged with artistic taste, and the atmosphere fraught with the inspiration of the occasion. A life-sized, richly-framed portrait of the author-hero looked down from the wall where it was encircled by a wreath of evergreens, which symbolized the immortality of his fame. After partaking of a splendid repast, the meeting was called to order by the president, and a historical review of the public services of Thomas Paine was read by Mr. Knapp which was followed by other interesting reminiscences of the courage, honesty, and sacrifices of this noble man in the defense of liberty in both worlds. Speeches were made by nearly all the members present, and the enthusiasm, though quiet and tearful, was intense.

It is good and wholesome in these days of dishonesty and corruption to contemplate the character of one so thoroughly incorruptible and purely patriotic. It is good for us to remember one who gave his whole fortune to feed and clothe our starving, shivering soldiers in the war of the Revolution, and who followed the disheartened armies with his printing-press and in each dark hour of the struggle scattered his pamphlets filled with words of hope and cheer and invincible arguments among the faltering defenders of a hopeless cause.

FRIEND MACDONALD: This was written for our county papers, but they are too goody-goody to print such Infidelity for their Christian readers, and though late now, I send it to you, hoping to add one more eulogy for Thomas Paine. I also inclose one dollar to add to the fifty cents from the last remittance for the last volume of D. M. Bennett's travels. Excuse haste, and believe me,

Yours truly, ABBIE KNAPP.

LEADVILLE, Feb. 22, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I was prospecting in the mountains when Mr. Bennett was here. It was a sad disappointment to me that I did not get to see him. I think Mr. Bennett was honest, sincere, candid, and of superior judgment, and an indefatigable worker whose deportment was commendable in everything I knew him to be connected with. Though he is gone, I lament our loss. The news sent a thrill of sorrow through me. We must accept the result as inevitable, and show our admiration for him by doing something to his memory. Some say Bennett had faults, but he confessed them. Modesty should prevent his friends from speaking of his faults. His confessing them proves his honesty of purpose. To claim perfection is one of the greatest of faults. He never spoke of things noble he did, but of his imperfections. If he had faults it is too late to mention them now.

Inclosed find $5—$2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, $1.50 for the fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and $1 for the Monument Fund.

E. W. ORGAN.

ROSEVILLE, Feb. 1, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me to scold yourself and that other live Infidel, H. L. Green, for the feeling you show in noticing the snaps and snarls of Christian coyotes over the cold remains of the hero now gone.

That the churches should try to sacrifice their reputation for veracity and honor over the grave of D. M. Bennett is perfectly in accord with their nefarious history. To abuse the champions of right, reason, liberty, and love, is the only way the priestly class, and those who pander to them for the sake of subscription, can certify to their moral worth and power. The church never abuses any man whose arguments she can refute. If Thomas Paine had been cowardly or mean enough to suppress his honest thoughts, or stated things he did not know to be true in his theological works, he could not hav been so successful in drawing the priestly fire.

"In a revolution there is nothing so formidable as a straight line;" and the only way a truth seeker can throw the mantle of respectability over a slanderer is to notice him. I protest against Brother Green's proposition that friends of justice exalt the miserable trimmer and pro tem. editor of the Toledo Blade by writing to him concerning the slops he has thrown at our sacred dead.

Yours truly, T. R. STEPHENSON.

LINDSAY, Feb. 13, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Please find inclosed $12—$3.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, $5 for Around-the-World Books, and apply the balance as directed.

Dear friend, never in the course of my life, and I am now 52 years old, did I receive the news of the death of a friend with greater heartfelt sorrow than that of the death of our beloved leader and champion, D. M. Bennett. We could ill-afford to lose him at the present time, but such is cruel fate. I well knew how to sympathize with him in all his troubles and persecutions. I hav had a taste of that myself. I hav been denounced from the cowards' castle as an Infidel in whom no trust can be placed. One good clergyman said I ought to be driven out of society for propagating Infidel doctrins. Another good Christian elder said I ought to be shot for polluting the minds of the people, and several times they tried to prevent me giving evidence in court because I did not believe a snake walked on its tail, or that it held a conversation with Mother Eve, and because I could not believe that the wagging of a stick in Aaron's hands could produce storms and pestilence, frogs and lice. For this I was not fit to liv in society and giv evidence. I hav lived in this town, doing a manufacturing business, for over twenty years, and paying from ten to twelve thousand dollars a year in wages to the working class, and always considered a first-class citizen; but as soon as my judgment came to maturity and I could think for myself, and then cast off the old superstitious nonsense believed in and taught by my grandmothers, then it was discovered that I was a bad citizen, and should not be tolerated in society, and had no private rights to be respected. Our judge is just as biased and bigoted a Christian as ever Benedict was. So, persecuted between bench and pulpit, I resolved to change my business to one that gave me the most privilege of expressing my views and being independent of a bigoted public opinion; so I bought a farm of 200 acres just joining the town and looking down upon seven monuments of superstition. I am now farming, and find it one of the most independent occupations in life; and I am as much talked of for my successful operations in my new calling as I was for my Infidel belief, and I gave a challenge that I had produced more grain on 200 acres than any praying Christian in the county on the same amount of land, although I never pray for rain or dry weather, or ask favors of god or devil. My wheat grows as well and sells as well and makes as good flour as if I was sniveling out hypocritical prayers twice every day.

In a word, I am now beyond the reach of the tongue of slander, and I can look upon every man who slights me for my honest belief with an air of contempt, and I never lose an opportunity to knock a stone out of the foundation of the old monument of superstition, persecution, and falsehood when the opportunity occurs.

Now, speaking of monuments, reminds me that I must add another dollar to the amount I was going to inclose for the Bennett Monument Fund. It would never do for me not to contribute my mite to the last sad rite we offer to the memory of our dear friend, Yours, T. FEE.

SHAWSVILLE, VA., Feb. 15, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: H. S. Brown, who wrote "The Bible of the Religion of Science," that you advertise, has sent me a copy, and if you will let me say a few words more than you do in the advertisment I shall be glad, for the Bible certainly deserves it. I hav old Moses, the Catholic Bible, the Koran, the Book of Mormon, the Shaker Bible, A. J. Davis's "Revelations of Nature," and the "Bible in India," but I certainly find Brown's bible to giv me more divine and scientific knowledge than all the others together, and I want to ask all Bible readers to send to Brown or you for it. I am going to sell all I can here in Virginia, for you must know we are a Bible people, and never burn only Infidel books, and all we don't like are sure to be Infidel or obscene.

In your issue of Feb. 10th I see your letters on both sides; each party wanted to boss the job. When will the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER learn to be truly Liberal? What is Liberalism if not toleration and charity to all? I hav often felt that T. Winter and some others were not disposed to giv the Spiritualists their honest dues, and also that Brother Roberts and his party were hard on the "no-soulites." I once believed in Methodism, then Universalism; again I was sure that Spiritualism was true; yes, positiv of it, but if I were to come out squarely I must confess that I do not know what is in the future, and can see no more good to set up a belief or any guesswork about it. J. M. BARNES.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Feb. 20, 283.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: You hav my heartfelt sympathy in the death of your husband, who was first and foremost in trying to free the minds of men and women from the shackles of superstition, priestcraft, and folly of any man I ever had the pleasure of being acquainted with. He was possessed of all the faculties that go to make up a true and noble manhood. I saw Mr. Bennett at the Watkins Convention last fall, and shook hands with him for the last time. Little did I think at that time it would be my last chance to gaze into that open and manly face again, and hear him say that I had been his friend from first to last, which made me feel proud that I was his friend through that infamous trial, persecution, and prosecution by that low, mean, inhuman Anthony Comstock, set on by that order of Jesuits and bigots, the Young Men's Christian Association.

I received a postal from Mr. Macdonald stating my subscription had expired the first of this month, and requested me to let him know if I wanted the paper stopped. Will answer that twice: "No, sir; no sir-ee." Hav taken it from the first number published in Illinois to the present time, and expect to take it and pay for it while my lamp of life holds out to burn.

Inclosed is $5—$2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, $1.50 for Mr. Bennett's fourth volume of travels around the earth, and $1 for the Monument Fund.

Now, Mrs. Bennett, may you long be publisher and Mr. Macdonald editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER until we hav a new heaven here on earth.

Your sincere friend, ISAAC VAN SCHOICK.

COLUMBIA, MO., Feb. 11, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Thinking that a few lines from this place, concerning the condition of the churches and Liberalism, might be of interest to you and your many readers, I take the opportunity of writing you for the first time.

First come the Sunday-schools, which are but thinly attended in proportion to the whole number of inhabitants in the city. There are four principal denominations represented: the Methodist, the Presbyterian, the Campbellite, and the Baptist. The average attendance for each is about 125, or 500 in all, per Sunday. And as the city contains about 8,000 inhabitants, it shows that only six and one-fourth per cent attend Sunday-school. The above states the facts as near as can be learned.

The attendance at church is probably a little more than double the above, or twelve and one-half per cent. The ministers hold forth in their old tones of "Believe or be damned," "Christ crucified," "Come, ye sinners, and wash your hands in the blood of the Lamb," etc.; but slight is the impression made.

Shall we not take courage from this state of the church? Surely, the guns of Liberalism are doing their glorious work. The blackened and blood-besmeared walls of superstition are slowly but surely crumbling away.

Let us unite, dear friends, in fighting the common enemy, even if we do not agree upon minor points of our own belief. We all agree on one thing at least, and that is that reason must take the place of superstition; love and friendship the place of hatred and jealousy. Yes, now, more than ever before, we need strong, persistent, and united action.

Some of our noblest leaders hav fallen by the wayside, overcome by the powers of nature, while working manfully for their race. Who shall take their places in the van and lead us on to victory? Ah! my friends, though we may never find such a leader as D. M. Bennett, yet I am sure that THE TRUTH SEEKER will continue doing its duty. founder has performed his duty not only by writing but by suffering for our principles. Let us immortalize his name by supporting what he established. It is an everlasting and living monument to his name. Respectfully. U. F. SHULER.

MONMOUTH, ILL., Feb. 11, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: As my time has run over a little, I send you inclosed $1 until I can hav an opportunity to send you the balance for a year, and I should like to hear of many thousands doing that much.

I am a printer (compositor), and I get all the papers to read, yet when Saturday night comes I look for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which is most thoroughly enjoyed, and we miss it when it fails to come on time.

In regard to the death of Mr. Bennett Brother Putnam utters my feelings exactly, and I can only add my mite of respect for the man who has just passed on a while before us. For,

"There is no death; the stars go down
To waken on a brighter shore."
So in that life so much unknown,
Will Bennett liv forevermore.

With those who are living here is the great work of his life to be continued. It was not bigotry of class or clan he sought to create, but to waken thought, a deeper study of the intellectual, moral, and physical wants of all mankind, and how best to provide for them. In that effort every man, it seems to me, ought to be willing to write and do what he can to further these objects. Is it for a Spiritualist to say he only is right, and will not work with a Materialist, or for a Materialist to say the same of a Spiritualist? I pity those who are so narrow-minded or bigoted as that, for whoever helps my brother man also directly or indirectly aids others as well as myself. It is not our selfish opinions that do the most good, but the free discussion as practical value for aiding man in investigating theories or correcting evils. There are many, I am sorry to say, who cannot bear the thought that another should differ from them in their notions, and would rather stop their paper than hav another express views the extreme opposit. I see by the last issue (Feb. 10th) you hav a few of that sort. "Let us pray" that their eyes may be opened to see humanity, and the way to work for them in a broader light.

As for myself, a thorough believer in Spiritualism, I must say I hav read the outpourings of T. Winter and others on Spiritualism with no such feelings as he or they exhibit. If he enjoys his belief it is none of my business, but when he publishes it to the world it becomes public property, and he must not make a wry face if it happens to get well pulverized in the process.

Come, all professed Liberals, plead no "hobby act," but work together to decapitate superstition, and the belief in another life will take care of itself.

FABIUS, N. Y., Feb. 17, 1883.

MRS. D. M. BENNETT AND EUGENE MACDONALD: Inclosed I send $5 to renew my wife's subscription (H. M. S. Billings) to THE TRUTH SEEKER, also for Vols. I. and II., bound copies of the same, 75 cents; my namesake's "Crimes of Preachers," 25 cents; Col. Ingersoll's "Mistakes of Moses," 50 cents; "History of the Great French Revolution" (Besant), 50 cents; "Liberal Hymn Book," 25 cents; and "What Does Christian Theism Teach?" by Bradlaugh and Rev. A. J. Harrison, 25 cents.

Allow me to write a few lines with reference to my much lamented friend D. M. Bennett, whom I cannot keep away from my mind, for he seemed to me like an own brother. When he started his little TRUTH SEEKER at Paris, Ill., the first number was mailed to my address—I was a reader of the Index at that time—but I took the little fledgling and perused it, and found it was just what I wanted, for it had the right kind of ring in it to suit my idea; I hav nursed it and cared for it ever since, until the small bird that was has become a mighty eagle. I then wrote words of encouragement to my friend Mr. Bennett, and promised to stand by him, and hav kept my promis and do not regret it. I first met him at Mr. Cosad's at Wolcott, N. Y., at the Freethinkers' camp-meeting, when we organized the Freethinkers' Association of the State of New York. As soon as I told him my name, he thanked me heartily for the encouraging letters he had read from me; made me promis to write when convenient, saying he should class me among his firmest friends, etc., and he kept his word. His troubles and persecutions followed soon after, and when he was unjustly imprisoned, he was daily in my thoughts during his confinement; every week I eagerly perused THE TRUTH SEEKER to know how fared my friend. His subsequent journeys, both in Europe and Around the World, I read with avidity, and was convinced that Mr. Bennett was a wonderful man in many respects Genial and unassuming; honest and frank in conversation, yet modest in demeanor, with a remarkable power of adaptation, a close observer, while nothing seemed to escape his memory. As illustration of his memory, I will add that the last time I met him was at the last Freethinkers' Convention at Watkins, N. Y. Five years had passed since we had met. Upon entering the hall, I noticed my friend at his book-stand; I stepped up softly behind him and placed my hand on his head; turning around and looking me in the eye, he humorously said, "Well, Billings, old friend, you are brick; but I must scold you a little for not writing oftener for my paper." I pleaded inability and incompetency, but to no purpose. Said he, "Hav I ever refused to publish any of you articles?" "No sir," said I. "Well, then," said he, "send in your articles; they suit me well enough." I was astonished! Here was a man, whom the wise and distinguished men of all nations delighted to honor, for his moral and intellectual worth, soliciting my uncouth ideas for publication.

He valued worth, but knew no great nor small,
The rich and poor alike (to him) were brothers all.
In his simplicity, his greatness shone;
He cared for others, not himself alone.
The world now mourns his exit from this life,
And sympathy extends to his respected wife.

Fraternally, HOMER A. BILLINGS.

WRONGS RIGHTED.

IRWIN STATION, Jan. 21, 283.

MR. EDITOR: In reading an article from the pen of James Hale, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 20th, on the materialism of mind, I was interested. He states, "We see evil in the world—that cannot be denied;" then he adds, "And I think it can and will work out good." Mark! here is the old pernicious doctrin—let us do evil that good may come. And then he states, "By the contrast between good and evil we can the better appreciate the good, as we never could without the evil." According to Mr. Hale's logic here, evil is a good thing. Then he adds, "And in the hereafter we may be able to overcome the evil with the good; and then it will be all right, and we shall then see that God designed everything for our greatest good, as a kind and loving father could hav done, and that every vicissitude that we hav had to pass through here was intended to add to our happiness there, beyond all that we can conceive of here. This can be so for all that I can see, and God be just and true; and, to my mind, it must be so, or God cannot be a just God, for I can see that justice is not meted out here—that the wronged, the injured, the outraged pass off the stage of life, and their wrongs are not and cannot be righted here; it is impossible. And if they cannot be righted and are not righted hereafter, then God cannot be a just God, and I wish to believe that the Eternal is just and true."

And this is one of your reasons for a belief in a future state of existence, is it, Mr. Hale? Now, I wish to state right here that the above is as good a reason as I could wish for to make me disbelieve in a future state of existence. I think, Brother Hale, you are deeply dyed in the old orthodox, Calvinistic doctrin, and if I should giv you a few punches in a sore place, don't get angry at me, for I do it in friendship, as every true Liberal should when he finds a brother leaves his eggs before the brood is hatched out. Now, Brother Hale, you say you see evil in the world; then you say that the evil is here to make us appreciate the good as we never could without the evil. According to your logic, evil is a good thing in this life. Then what would be the use of overcoming the evil hereafter with the good, if evil is so necessary here and intended to add to our happiness hereafter? Ah! but you see the wronged, the injured, the outraged pass off the stage of life, and their wrongs are not and cannot be righted here, you say; it is impossible. Here you are right. But here the question arises, How can that God of yours right the wrongs of the outraged hereafter—even if he has a little hell to punish the persons who do the outraging? That cannot do any good to the person outraged. What could be the design in punishing except to satisfy a revengeful disposition? Does our government hang persons for revenge? If it does, I pity the government. I think persons are hung to protect others from being murdered by the same parties. We as human beings punish criminals to protect society. Has God to punish persons to protect society? I think not. But the combined forces of nature hav so constructed our physical frame that we are able at present, by the blessings of evolution, through the experience of our ancestors for many ages, to yet but dimly see the light of truth as it is manifested to us by our most energetic searches after knowledge in the different departments of science. The mind, soul, or spirit of man is of use to him to guide and protect his physical frame while he livs and moves and has an identical being among his fellows. Outside of that we hav no positiv proof of any existence.

You will find a short article of mine in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 29, 1879, page 763—"A Question for Clergymen to Answer; or, What the Soul of Man is Composed Of." With all the articles pro and con, I cannot see that any light has been shed upon the question. Every person has an ideal God of some kind who is the author of all things, and according to the education and intelligence of the person so is their God. W. N. RIDINGER.

Poetry.

Sale of the Boy.

BY C. S. T.

A boy, a boy, a boy, a boy,
Of flesh and blood—no mechanical toy.
And he up at auction, can breathe and liv,
To the highest bidder, come, what will you giv?
Look at his build, like an apple, round,
And a head like a statesman, I'll be bo und.
Look at the shades of pink and white,
He can sleep all day and cry all night;
Can smash and tear, and pull, and break.
Do what he's told not to, and keep you awake;
Can the mildest, smoothest temper roil,
And keep you changing his clothes all the while.
He'll hav cramps and worms, and chills and croup,
He will cry and yell, and squeal and whoop,
A regular snorter, household joy,
A boy, do you hear me? A real live boy.
One thousand dollars I hear you say?
Why this boy is not to be given away.
Do you think I'd speak in the way I did,
And accept such a sum on him, as a bid?
Five thousand, I think, some one over there said.
That won't buy a single hair of his head.
Five thousand dollars on this living pearl,
You've mistaken the article, this is no girl.
Must I tell you again that this is a boy?
That can crow and delight, or cry and destroy!
That can rule a whole nation of his fellow-men—
That is, when he grows up. Come now, bid once again.
Ten thousand, that's better, yet far from enough,
Twenty, thirty, and fifty, going—sixty, that's tough.
For you're bidding like men, and I want to be fair,
But that wouldn't purchase a lock of his hair.
Five hundred thousand, well that is a bid;
Who, here, made that offer? Oh, that lady did.
Five hundred, and going, going, gone! On my life
That's a bargain. What name? hey? what? thunder, my wife!

An English Appeal for a Parson.

Wanted, a rector, a vicar, or curate,
Peterb'ro isn't particular which;
One who will grab at a minimum pew-rate
Fully convinced that it's wrong to be rich.

Listen, ye black-coated brigands who prey on us,
Here is a living for one of your crew;
High, Low, or Broad is a matter don't weigh on us,
Salary's small but there's plenty to do.

Pity your bishop who's pleading appealingly,
Pity the souls that are sinking in sin;
Don't run away in a manner unfeelingly,
Don't let Sathanas go in there and win.

Can it be want of the mammon delaying you?
Think of the woes that to riches belong;
Can it be thought of the work that is staying you?
"Gird up your loins" like Samson the strong.

Oh! 'tis a sight to set angels despairing,
"Cherrybums" weep and the seraphims scowl,
As they discover, when out for an airing,
No one responds to the bishop's loud howl.

Wanted, a rector, a vicar, or curate,
Peterb'ro isn't particular which,
One who will serve for a minimum pew-rate,
Fully convinced that it's wrong to be rich.

Here is a chance seldom seen for converting 'em,
Snatching the brands from the wrath of the fire,
Should you be charged before Christ with deserting 'em,
How will you answer his terrible ire?

Gather around then, and bring the old story to Tickle their feelings with heavenly bliss,
Read of Jehovah, the grand and the gory too,
All that is naughty and nasty, why—miss.

Tell them he worked very hard when creating us,
Taking six days ere he finished the earth,
Tell them he's awfully fond of cremating us,
How we are damned from the moment of birth.

Tell them the millions of worlds all surrounding us
Took but a moment to form, so to speak.
This little fact then explain that's astounding us,
Why over us he was working a week.

Tell them how grand was the old vegetation, and Picture the earth when of beasts there were none,
Then be prepared with a good explanation, and Say how it flourished without any sun.

These little things may appear contradictory,
Scoffers may sneer at the story inspired;
Faith is the weapon that gives you the victory,
Only believe, and that's all that's desired.

Come along, parsons, tho harvest is waiting a
Psalm-twanging singer to gather it in;
Seems that the Lord is a long time inflating a
Windbag to wollop the devil and sin.

Wanted, a rector, a vicar, or curate,
Peterb'ro isn't particular which,
One who will serve for a minimum pew-rate;
Fully convinced that it's wrong to be rich.

A Southern Solomon's New Proverb.

From the Louisville Courier-Journal.

It has always seemed remarkable how quick a story to the detriment of a truly good man, a minister, or a religious man, will spread, after it once gets started. The other day the dispatches announced that a truly good Baptist minister of Racine had fallen from grace, and the story was that he had entered the room of his servant girl. Then there was a committee to investigate, and everything was excitement. Finally the minister made his statement, which was that he came home from church at midnight, where he had been writing his sermon, and in passing the room of the hired girl he noticed that the door was open, and, it being a cold night, it occurred to him that maybe she was suffering from the cold, and he went in and approached the bed and felt to see if she had bed-clothing enough over her. The girl awoke. Most any girl would. He asked her if she had enough covering, and she said she had not, and he put his overcoat over her and went away. At the investigation the hired girl corroborated the statement of the truly good man, and the investigation was ended, and the reputation of the good man, which had been so nearly tarnished, was as white as snow. The girl was sound to corroborate the statement, and shows that there is nothing mean about her. How easy it would hav been for her to hav borne "false witness," as the good book would say. A minister cannot be too careful about hired girls. And now that the explanation of the good man is so clear, and his kind heart is shown to such good advantage, instead of giving him a reception, there are lots of worldly wretches who will not believe it. They do not know by experience the feelings of a truly good man who would suffer if he knew his hired girl was not warm. Some men are so heartless that they never giv a thought to whether the hired girl has got clothes enough on her bed on a cold night, and girls might freeze for all they care. Such men would say that if a girl had not got sense enough to put clothes on her bed to keep warm, it was not the place of the man of the house to go prowling around their bedrooms at midnight, throwing overcoats, hoopskirts, corsets, and petticoats on the bed to bank them up. We hav heard of hired girls that would hav knocked the sermon completely out of that truly good man, and stood him on his head out in the hall, and poured dirty water down his trousers-legs; then there are others who would hav kept him piling clothes on them till it was time to get up and build a fire to get breakfast. On general principles it is a safe course of conduct for the average minister, as well as the average worldly man, to not to yearn to find out whether hired girls hav bed-clothes enough on their beds. "Charity covereth a multitude of hired girls," or words to that effect, but the ordinary run of wicked and perverse citizens are liable to think that the minister has sinister motivs when he goes at midnight to their apartments and leaves his coat, and a life of pious endeavor cannot get it out of their minds. As the Psalmist says, "It is better that a thousand hired girls hav cold feet than that one minister shall get into the wrong pew."

A Long Island Heathen.

In the recent discovery on Long Island of a community of full-blown heathen, the boasted civilization of the nineteenth century has received a severe shock. Right under the nose of the Foreign Missionary Society paganism rears its horrid seven-story front.

A man from the seventh ward, New York, was over on the island last week, and while leaning on a fish-cart interviewed one of the elderly and most respectable of the down-east heathen. When the old animated mummy fetched to in his starboard tack to windward, the seventh ward man accosted him:

"Why don't you hav some churches in this locality?"

"What's them?"

"Places to worship God in."

"God!" This with a profane accent which suggested that the old duffer had heard the word before.

"Yes, God. Didn't you ever hear of him?"

"Well, I've heard the clam-diggers use the word when the tide was up, and sometimes the fishermen when they'd made a poor haul."

"Who do you suppose God is?"

"Suppose! I don't suppose nothing at all about it, 'cause I don't know nothing at all about it. Do you?"

The seventh ward man took his pipe out of his mouth and spat on the shingly shore.

"How old are you?"

"Going on 72."

"Support a family?"

"Two on 'em—my own and my son-in-law's"

"Hav you a Bible in the house?"

"Is it something like a gill-net?"

"No; the Word of God, written by the twelve apostles. Ever hear about Peter the Great?"

"Naw."

"One of the apostles; drove Adam and Eve out of the garden of Eden with a sword, and afterward caught a colored man named Pontius Pilate and slit his ears."

"What was his number?"

"Whose number?"

"The pilot's."

"Didn't hav any number. What do you mean by that?"

"All of the pilots on this coast hav a number. Thought perhaps I might know him."

"Don't you hav any schools here?"

"Had a kind of a school here last chowder season, but the teacher was too willing."

"How so?"

"Oh, some of the blue fishers asked him if he taught that the world was round or square, and he said seein' as how he was outen a job he'd teach her round or square—just as the school board wanted it teached. Said it was immaterial."

"Never had any Sunday-school?"

"Naw."

"Dig clams on the Sabbath?"

"If the tide's down."

"What would you do if they should send some preachers over here?"

"Sell 'em some clams."

"What would you do if a missionary should come over from Brooklyn and build a nice big house to preach in?"

"Dry codfish in it."

"Did you ever hear of hell?"

"Only when Capt. Skidmore talks of New Jersey."

"Where do you expect to go to when you die?"

"Go to pieces."

"Well, all I've got to say, old man, is that we propose to send over some civilizers and evangelical fertilizers from New York, and—"

"From New York?" murmured the old man.

"Yes, from New York."

The old man moved a few paces down the road. Then he paused again and looked at the seventh ward man attentivly.

"From New York?" This in a surprised and querulous tone.

"Why, yes. What is it you are driving at?"

"Ha! ha! Shepherd's fold. Starving widows and children, he, he! Boss Kelly, crime, blood, and corruption. Evangelical fertilizers! ho, ho! and all from New York! It makes me tired," and with several weird, sepulchral chuckles the old heathen ambled up the white and clam-shelled road.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER
Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last word penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an accounnt of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited, The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethonght in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

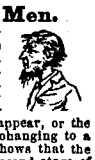
DR. FELLOWS



A REGULARLY educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove,

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES,

Spermatorrhœa and Impotency,

As the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions, (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an EXTERNAL APPLICATION in from 30 to 60 days. No medicine taken. It has never been known to fail!

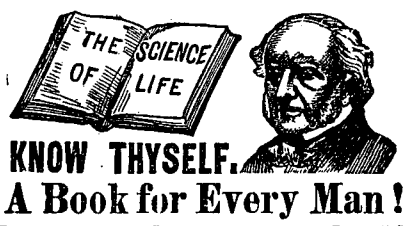
Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in cut. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.



☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

"PRIVATE COUNSELOR"

Sent to any address, securely sealed, for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhœa or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞Remember a radical cure is certain. Address, plainly, DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey, and say in what paper you saw this advertisement.

MANHOOD!

KNOW THYSELF.

A Book for Every Man!

Young, Middle-aged, and Old.

The untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase and read the new medical work published by the Peabody Medical Institute, Boston, entitled the Science of Life: or, Self Preservation. It is not only a complete and perfect treatise on Manhood, Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in man, Errors of Youth, etc, but it contains one hundred and twenty-five prescriptions for acute and chronic diseases, each one of which is invaluable, so proved by the author, whose experience for 21 years is such as probably never before fell to the lot of any physician. It contains 300 pages, bound in beautiful embossed covers, full gilt, embellished with the very finest steel engravings, guaranteed to be a finer work in every sense—mechanical, literary, or professional—than any other work retailed in this country for $2.50, or the money will be refunded in every instance. Price only $1.25. Gold Medal awarded the author by the National Medical Association. Illustrated sample sent on receipt of six cents. Send now. Address PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, or Dr. W. H. DR. THAYER'S

Magnetic Clothing

Is a stimulant and sedativ nerve tonic, identical with that dynamic force that is eliminated from the brain, and moves along our nervous tissues.

It penetrates and searches the blood, throwing off and out all poisonous matter through the pores of the skin, when all medicines fail.

It stimulates the absorbents to take up the nutriment and in its distribution to repair waste tissues.

It is quick in action, and gives permanent and ready relief to the afflicted in different diseases.

Do you suffer with functional, physical, or nervous debility? Are our female readers broken down in health and spirits from disorders peculiar to their sex, arising from a prostration of the nervous system?

Why then further neglect a subject so productiv of health, when there is at hand a means of cure?

Why not throw off the yoke of bondage altogether, and seek a remedy that has science and common sense to commend it?

It is a remedy of indisputable efficacy to the restoration of health and vigor.

Physicians indorse it, and the goods indorse themselvs.

During the past two years "Victoria" has been purchased by hundreds, and their united testimony is that it has no equal for curing disease.

Gems of Thought.

HE sees with equal eye, as God of all,
A hero perish or a sparrow fall,
Atoms or systems into ruin hurled,
And now a bubble burst and now a world.
—Pope.

HOW much easier it is to accept what is given us and say we will not inquire, as so many do say, how much easier to say: We half believe the truth is on their side; but all the more because we suspect it we will draw back in time, lest we ourselvs be involved in doubt; we will bury our heads in the sand, like the timid ostrich, so we will not see, and close our ears so we shall not hear. My friends, for such mental indolence there is no help; for such moral cowardice, there is no answer, save contempt.—Felix Adler's Radical Pulpit.

THE author of a great reformation is almost always unpopular in his own age. He generally passes his life in disquiet and danger. It is therefore for the interest of the human race that the memory of such men should be held in reverence, and that they should be supported against the scorn and hatred of their contemporaries by the hope of leaving a great and imperishable name. To go on the forlorn hope of truth is a service of peril. Who will undertake it, if it be not also a service of honor? It is easy enough, after the ramparts are carried, to find men to plant the flag on the highest tower. The difficulty is to find men who are ready to go first into the breach and did not liv to penetrate to the citadel.—Macaulay's Essays.

SOME divines hav urged that in the case of Job we hav a beautiful picture of patience and contentment under wrong and misfortune. But I reply that it is not good to submit patiently to wrong, or to rest contented under misfortune. I urge that it is far manlier to resist wrong, far nobler to wage war against wrong, far better to investigate carefully the causes of wrong and misfortune, with a view to their removal. I eagerly adopt and recommend for adoption the sentiment of the poet:

"None shall patiently endure
Any ill that he can cure."

Contentment under wrong is a crime, voluntary submission under oppression is not the virtue some would hav it to be.—Bradlaugh's Few Words About the Devil.

CÆSAR succeeded, we are told, in whatever he attempted, because he left nothing undone that might contribute to success. Never mention that blockhead of words "impossible" in my hearing, said Napoleon to one of his officers, who wished to show that some scheme of his was impracticable. Exhaust every expedient and then it will be time to talk of impossibilities.—Hylax.

OH, the great and good and glorious charm that poetry—poetry worthy of the name, not mere jingle, but reason penetrated and made red-hot with pa sion, has ever been to man. For those that want it, heaven helps them in their destitution. For myself, I would as soon suffer myself to be bereft of one of my senses as forego that most gracious sentiment. It is the lamp of life, the soul of all our finer enjoyments, the soother of our evils, the very instinct of virtue, the essence of all that is grand and generous, the promoter of benevolence, the counselor of devotion itself.—Self-Formation.

BLESSINGS be with them, and eternal praise
Who give us nobler hopes and nobler cares—
The poets. —Wordsworth.

WILL the sectarian spirit ever die? Never, so long as Christianity exists, because it is the essence of Christianity, as of every system that claims for itself the possession of a divine revelation. Every such system claims for itself an absolute superiority over the speculativ genius of man. As long as Christianity endures, it must entertain this conviction. Therefore, as long as Christianity endures, the poison of the sectarian spirit must drop into the world. A sad outlook; yes. But courage! Religion is more than Christianity. Christianity is only one form of its expression, which has had its birth, its growth, its culmination, and is verging toward its decline. The reason of man is more than any church, more than any ststem, more than all systems and churches; man is more than apostle or saint, more than law-giver or prophet.—Frothingham's Radical Pulpit.

THIS is not liberty which we can hope for, that no grievance ever should arise in the commonwealth, that let no man in this world expect; but when complaints are freely heard, deeply considered, and speedily reformed, then is the utmost bound of civil liberty obtained that wise men look for.—Milton's Areopagitica.

THE immorality of an eternal hell should brand every man who teaches it as being himself immoral. At any rate, I hav this to say: That from a God who could make possible such a hereafter I would turn away in loathing and contempt. I recall at this moment the memory of my mother: "She was a woman! Take her for all in all, I shall not look upon her like again!" How swift her sympathies, how magnificent her scorn, how loyal her friendship, how noble and complete her enmity [Mr. Miln seems to take after Dr. Johnson, who loved a good hater], how tender her love and how gentle her charity! The mildness of the stars and the brilliance of the sun beamed from her beautiful eyes. And yet, if the orthodox theology be true, that woman—my mother—upon whose bosom I leaned as a babe, is now in hell; for she never felt the necessity of joining any church. And I deliberately say to you that, if there is a God in this universe mean enough to damn that woman, I want him to damn me too, for I still wish to keep my mother's company.—Miln's Farewell Discourse.

MY mother! when I learned that thou wast dead,
Say, wast thou conscious of the tears I shed?
Hovered thy spirit o'er thy sorrowing son,
Wretch even then, life's journey just begun.
Perhaps thou gav'st me, though unfelt, a kiss;
Perhaps a tear, if souls can weep in bliss—
Ah, that maternal smile! it answered, Yes.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

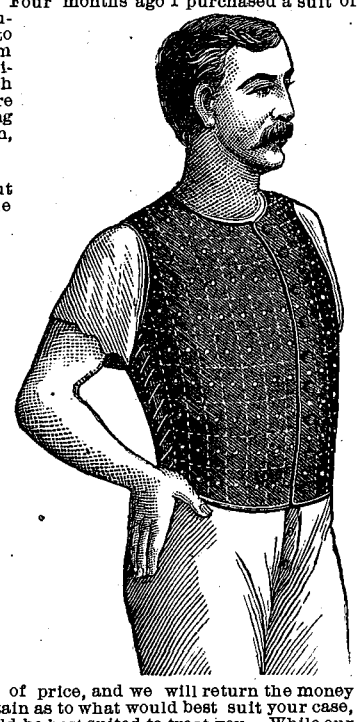
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Children's garments upon application.

Any of the above garments sent to any address upon receipt of price, and we will return the money if they are not as represented in every respect. If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case, send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselvs. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them at about

ONE-THIRD THE PRICE HERETOFORE CHARGED,

So that we can say with truth, None are so poor that they cannot procure them, being but a trifle higher than ordinary clothing.

Remember that we are offering you the cheapest and best magnetic appliances in the market, and if upon receiving the garments they do not meet your expectation, return them at our expense and we will refund your money.

Ladies' Abdominal Jackets and Gentlemen's Vests are made to order, and a fit guaranteed.

A SCHOOL INCIDENT.

How dear to my heart is the school I attended,
And how I remember so distant and dim,
That red-headed Bill, and the pin that I bended,
And carefully put on the bench under him!
And how I recall the surprise of the master
When Bill gave a yell and sprang up with the pin
So high that his bullet-head busted the plaster
Above, and the scholars all set up a grin.
That activ boy, Billy; that high-leaping Billy!
That loud-shouting Billy that sat on a pin!

"DE Halleloojah Sons 'nd Dawters ob Zine'—'longin' ter dat big church down in de fit' wahd, hav busted and gone to thunder," exclaimed Uncle Si.

"How did the society break?"

"Too much fuchers. De tresherer ob de gang wuz de 'commerdashun husban' ob de female president, an' he tuck de cash an' los' hit on fuchers—den yistidy he lit out fer Chatt'noogy."

"What sort of futures did he grapple with?"

"Well, he bought too much co'n on de rise, an' w'en hit went down he drapp'd de welf. Dat's ter say, he got drunk an' wuz froze out in er game ob seben-up down at de Beever-Slide serloon! Dat's whar meks me tink dat 'er 'ligius s'iety nohow oughtn'ter bet on fuchers 'ceptin dey's six pints in de game an's sartin dey kin turn jack without gittin kotch'd."—Georgia Major.

A MEMBER of a church congregation in Wisconsin was last month charged with gambling in stocks, and brought up before a committee for investigation. The trial began by a deacon asking:

"Brother Smith, the charge is gambling in stocks.'

"Yes, sir."

"And you plead not guilty?"

"No, sir, I plead guilty."

"Then you do buy and sell stocks, speculate in wheat and oats, and sell futures in pork?"

"I do, sir. Didn't I giv $1,000 in cash to help build this church?"

"Yes."

"Well, I scooped that in on a little deal in pork. Didn't I pay $500 on the organ?"

"Yes."

"That was part of my profits on a spec in oats, Didn't I foot a deficiency of $400 in the minister's salary this year?"

"Yes."

"That came from a rise in stocks. Didn't I chip in $700 toward the parsonage?"

"Yes."

"That came from a corner in oats. Havn't I whacked up on the orphan asylum, the new bridge, the park, and the fire engin?"

"You hav."

"Well, that means more corners and holding on till I felt my hair growing gray. Gentlemen, I will step out for a moment and let you reach a verdict."

He stepped, but it was only thirty seconds before he was called in and congratulated on the verdict of "not guilty."

MAGNETIC GARMENTS

For the cure of Disease without Medicine or Medical Treatment. The Statement made by him at that time that his Magnetic Clothing, if worn for any form of Disease (and as advised), would cure ninety per cent of the so-called Incurables, has been verified, he having Clothed and Cured Thousands of Persons of all Forms of Disease. Positive proof of this has appeared in all the leading Newspapers by Testimony of many of our most Prominent and Wealthy Citizens, who, having been Cured by the Notes and Clippings.

THERE are one million persons in London for whom no religious provision has been made by any of the churches.

A NEW JERSEY widow is said to hav changed her religion because she wished to avoid meeting her husband in the next world.

A MUCH abused minister wrote to a brother clergyman, calling him an ass, and thoughtlessly signed himself, "Yours fraternally."

THE Christian Register calls Governor Butler's Fast-day proclamation an insult and advises ministers to send it to the brass foundry.

De man what 'pends on de rooster fer ter crow
An' wake 'im up 'arly in de mawnin'
May sumtime fin' dat de rooster am no more,

THINGS are coming to a pretty pass in Kentucky, says the Christian at Work, when a preacher has his salary docked for the time lost on a trip to fight a duel in a distant part of the state.

Two hundred people of Indiana county, Pennsylvania, including ministers and deacons, hav been speculating in grain. One minister, two deacons, and twenty-one others are now bankrupt.

MR. TALMAGE is to lecture in New Orleans, and the papers of that city are informing their readers that "the Talmage troupe consists of eleven people," and that the "leading man makes a specialty of performing a marvelous trapeze act."

"IT is a poor compliment to a preacher," says the Sun, "to tell him that his sermons are acceptable because they are so short. It is as much as to say that the more there is of them the worse they are." Still a short sermon is the next best thing to none at all!

THE Holiness Band, a fanatical religious organization, are raising a general excitement at Corsicana, Texas, and it is expected they will prove themselvs as obnoxious as they did two years ago, when the leader was ridden on a rail and the band dispersed as a nuisance.

"ARE your domestic relations pleasant?" asked a Southern pastor of a colored member. "What's dat conjunction, boss?" "I ask are your family ties pleasant?" "Wall, no sah. When a 'oman ties a man when he's drunk an' whips him till he's sober, I doan' think dat it's pleasant, sah."

SOME time last summer the ladies of Cleveland, Oswego county, N. Y., made an autograph quilt and succeeded in obtaining the signatures of President Arthur and Governor Cleveland. At an auction held in the church the other night it was knocked down to a Philistine at the low price of $7. What is fame?

"YES, brethren," said a preacher from his pulpit, "you are the passengers on a train speeding its straight and narrow way to glory and I am the conductor of that train, thank the Lord." "You run her first-class, I should say," remarked a stranger, looking over the congregation, "from the number of sleepers you're hauling."

DR. GEORGE E. WALTON denies the remedial value of the climate of Florida for Northern invalids, especially those afflicted with pulmonary troubles. In a Popular Science Monthly article he advises consumptivs to keep away from there on account of the warm, humid, relaxing, enervating character of the atmospheric conditions.

A CENSUS agent in a southwestern city came into a house owned by two elderly maidens of means. The hired girl answered the call, and he made his usual stereotyped remark, "I called to see if there were any births in this house last year." For some reason the domestic failed to understand him, and made this report to her mistress: "There is a man down stairs who wants to know if you had any bursts last year." They hurriedly discussed the possible meaning of such a query and concluded it must refer to the water-pipes. One of the women went to the door and asked the canvasser if he had authority to ask such questions. He said he was acting under the law, whereupon she remarked, "Well, we did hav a little one here, but it was so slight that we were not obliged to call in outside help."

THE Observer says that "every financial concern got up ostensibly in the church to get the people's money for the church, with the promis of profit to the lenders, is to be suspected of being a pious fraud." The Christian Advocate's mining swindle is a case in point. The "Augustinian fathers" is another; and these might be multiplied.

THE Rev. Dr. Dix has been lecturing recently on woman and divorce. He attributes the decrease in the size of families to the spread of modern Infidelity. This may be true in so far as modern Infidelity has tended to discourage the practice among modern clergymen of visiting the women of the parish during the absence of the man of the house.

"WHEN," asked the superintendent, fixing his eye on the teacher of the young ladies' Bible class, "when does man most keenly and fully and conscientiously recognize and realize his own utter nothingness?" And the young man, who led himself to the altar only two short weeks ago, blushed painfully and said, with faltering voice, "When he's being married."

PASTOR JOHN JASPER, of Richmond, it is said, is more firmly than ever convinced that the world is flat, and has four corners, and that the sun moves up when it rises and down when it sets. As the good old man advances in years he becomes more positiv, and he has now reached that point from which he hurls his anathemas at all who disagree with him. Such persons he declares to be Infidels.

THE Congregationalists hav fewer candidates for the ministry than they had in 1876 by 52, and the Presbyterians hav 58 less. The number of churches, however, of both denominations hav increased, while the attendance has fallen off. The managers of the Congregational and Presbyterian educational institutions say that the indications, as they hav carefully figured them, are that the decrease is likely to continue for some years to come. The decline is said not to be local nor denominational, but widespread and general. The symptoms are regarded as the worst possible, indicating a lack of vitality in the system. Meanwhile the gospel of Liberalism is spreading.

THE Paris Figaro of April 1st will contain an interview with Mr. Barnum, in which he announces that he has engaged a reformed clergyman named Talmage to appear as Daniel in the lion's den. The part of the lion will be undertaken by a regular member of Mr. Barnum's menagerie, a highly intelligent Numidian animal. On alternate nights Mr. Talmage will put his head in the lion's mouth, and on the other nights the lion will put his head in Mr. Talmage's mouth. The reporter of the Figaro suggests that the lion is greatly to be pitied, as he will surely die, for if Mr. Talmage should accidentally bite off his head he would be a dead lion, whereas if he should bite off Mr. Talmage's head inadvertently it would be certain to disagree with him fatally. The Figaro is noted for circulating sensational stories, and the present report is not generally credited on the bouvelards.

ENGLAND has a Society for the Suppression of Blasphemous Literature. Its object is to prosecute all writers who hav uttered expressions of unbelief in Christianity, and in particular will it hunt down with ignoble zeal men known to the world as Atheists. Among those it proposes to correct first of all, we find the names of Huxley, Tyndall, Herbert Spencer, John Morley, and the publishers of John Stuart Mill's works. England has long boasted of her progress, of her liberties, and of her encouragement of scientific research, Freethought, and untrammeled expression of opinion. Is this the outcome? Are we going back to the ideas of enlightened government which prevailed in Henry VIII.'s day? Is our belief to be measured out to us as rations to a convict? Is free speech a delusion and a snare? Must all literary England submit its proof-sheets to the anti-blasphemers for approval? Did we not regard the operations of this long titled society as the broadest of farces, ironical pleasantry would become indignant protest; but, like America's society for the introduction of the name of God into the Constitution—the exact and corporate name escapes our memory—the anti-blasphemous association of England is simply an object for commiseration, especially when its feeble shafts are hurled against the foremost philosophers and men of science in our generation.—Syracuse Evening Herald.

A PROSPECT of a church row up in Chippewa county, Wis., is reported by Peck's Sun. It was desired to raise money for the church at a sociable, and one of the deacons suggested a scheme which to him seemed calculated to fill the coffers. A wash-tub was procured and filled with bran, and a silver coin was placed in the bran and concealed. For ten cents a person could take a big spoon and dip up a spoonful of bran. If they got the coin they were to keep it. The good people crowded around the tub and stood in a row awaiting their turn. The deacon appeared happy, and it looked as if the church had struck a soft snap. It ran on merrily for a while, but no one got the hidden coin, and some worldly people were inclined to marvel thereat. Finally they suggested a "show down." They intimated that there was "collugling," and appointed a committee to examin the bran. The committee went into activ session, the bran was turned out, and the coin was discovered nailed to the bottom of the tub. The deacon was not to be found, but the pastor protested that there was no use trying to run a church if worldly people were to be allowed to come in and investigate the game. What it wanted was faith. There is talk of bringing the deacon before the conference on a charge of crookedness, but he desires a suspension of judgment until he can prepare a statement. Mr. Peck concludes that honesty is the best policy even at a church sociable. At any rate, it would be well if some of them were to try it.

THE Detroit Evening News of the 3d givs this account of two pious perjurers: "Late Friday afternoon a scene was quietly enacted in the United States court that should not escape publicity. About a month ago Alva M. Hutchings and Susan C. Hutchings, his wife, of Pittsburg, Shiawassee county, were arrested and charged with being guilty of filing false pension claims. The proof was clear that Mrs. Hutchings had filed three false pension claims and a forged marriage record, and that her husband, to aid and abet the fraud, had committed perjury and connived at the forgery of a marriage record. These were serious crimes under the United States law, and the maximum punishment for one of the defendants could hav been 40 years and for the other 20 years. Hutchings and wife therefore saw that their only hope was in enlisting the aid of government officials, pleading guilty, and getting off with a light sentence. Mrs. Hutchings is 36 years of age, a Sunday-school teacher, and an alleged moral leader in the town of Pittsburg, while her husband is a well-to-do farmer. The God-and-morality racket was therefore worked for all it was worth in their behalf, and yesterday they pleaded guilty, and as a result escaped with fines of $150 and $100 respectivly. After Judge Brown had passed sentence on the twain, 'Squire Pitts, one of the pillars of Pittsburg, invoked a benediction upon the court and all concerned for the lenient treatment of his guilty neighbors. It was before this same 'Squire Pitts that Mrs. Hutchings perjured herself in her attempt to defraud the government. Some comment is indulged on the leniency shown this couple, who are both intelligent, and fully understood the serious nature of their crime, yet deliberately altered a marriage certificate and perjured themselvs for the purpose of drawing pension."

FATHER HARKINS, a Catholic priest of Springfield, Mass., has been sued by a woman for $10,000, for slander.

THE Rev. Heber Newton has had his sermons on "The Wrong Uses of the Bible" published in book form.

THE authorities at Vienna, Austria, hav closed a club of German students because the tendency of its discussions did not suit them.

EMPEROR WILLIAM of Germany has subscribed $1,000 from his private purse for the relief of the German sufferers by the Ohio and Mississippi floods.

THE Chicago, St. Louis, and Pittsburgh Railroad Company hav made a mortgage of $22,000,000, covering all the property of the road, and payable Oct. 1st, 1932.

THE supervising architect of the United States Treasury building is to be investigated. He is charged with having defrauded the government out of large sums of money.

THE Rev. Dr. Middleton, of Glen Cove, L. I., charges the men of his congregation with growing colder and colder toward the church. The pastor's complaint is not an uncommon one.

THE steamer Navarre went down in a gale in the German ocean last week. Nineteen peasons perished and six were rescued. This is the third steamer that has foundered at sea within a month.

EX-GOVERNOR SPRAGUE, of Rhode Island, who recently obtained a divorce, was remarried last week. He found his bride in Virginia. He is talked of as the next governor of Rhode Island.

CHARLOTTE TAYLOR fell dead in a Richmond church last Saturday while the congregation were singing "Swing low, sweet chariot, coming for to carry me home." Religious excitement had caused heart disease.

WEATHER Prophet Wiggins's storm was on time last week, but its fury fell short of the expectations which had been raised by the prophecy. Altogether, it was not an unusually severe storm for March.

Two murderers, Michael McGloin and Pasquale Majone, were hanged in the Tombs yard on Friday, the 9th. Both were attended to the scaffold by priests, and died praying. There is no reason to doubt that both of them migrated directly to the Catholic heaven.

THE funeral of "Jimmy" Elliott, the pugilist, who was killed in a fight in Chicago a short time ago, took place in this city last Sunday. The crowd which turned out to view the procession numbered hundreds of thousands. Elliott was a notoriously disreputable man. He spent ten years in jail for manslaughter, and was at one time connected with a gang of New York burglars. His taking off is not a matter for regret.

THE residence of the Hon. Abram Wakeman was consumed by fire on the 7th inst., and his wife and daughter perished in the flames. Mrs. Wakeman was an invalid, and the daughter lost her life endeavoring to rescue the mother. Mr. Wakeman will be remembered as the counsel of Mr. Bennett in his trial before Judge Benedict. He is the brother and law partner of T. B. Wakeman, and was at one time collector of the port of New York, and also postmaster.

BY ERNST HAECKEL.

THE CHAIN OF THE ANIMAL ANCESTORS, OR THE SERIES OF THE PROGENITORS, OF MAN.—FIRST HALF OF THE SERIES OF THE ANCESTORS OF MAN.—INVERTEBRATE ANCESTORS OF MAN.

From Vol. II., History of Creation.

First Stage—Monera.—The most ancient ancestors of Man, as of all other organisms, were living creatures of the simplest kind imaginable, organisms without organs, like the still living Monera. They consisted of simple, homogeneous, structureless, and formless little lumps of mucous or albuminous matter (protoplasm), like the still living Protamœba primitiva. (Compare vol. i, p. 186, Fig. 1.) The form value of these most ancient ancestors of man was not even equal to that of a cell, but merely that of a cytod (compare vol. i, p. 347); for, as in the case of all Monera, the little lump of protoplasm did not as yet possess a cell-kernel. The first of these Monera originated in the beginning of the Laurentian period by spontaneous generation, or archigony, out of so-called "inorganic combinations," namely, out of simple combination of carbon, oxygen, hydrogen, and nitrogen. The assumption of this spontaneous generation, that is, of a mechanical origin of the first organisms from inorganic matter, has been proved in our thirteenth chapter to be a necessary hypothesis. (Compare vol. i, p. 338.) A direct proof of the earlier existence of this most ancient ancestral stage, based upon the fundamental law of biogeny, is possibly still furnished by the circumstance that, according to the assertions of many investigators, in the beginning of the development of the egg, the cell-kernel, or nucleus, disappears, and the egg-cell thus relapses to the lower stage of the cytod (Monera, p. 124; relapse of the nucleated plastid into a non-nucleated condition). The assumption of this first stage is necessary for most important general reasons.

Second Stage—Amœbœ.—The second ancestral stage of Man, as of all higher animals and plants, is formed by a simple cell, that is, a little piece of protoplasm inclosing a kernel. There still exist large numbers of similar "single-celled organisms." Among them the common, simple Amœba (vol. i, p. 188, Fig. 2) cannot hav been essentially different from these progenitors. The form value of every Amœba is essentially the same as that still possessed by the egg of Man, and by the egg of all other animals. (Vol. i, p. 189, Fig. 3.) The naked egg-cells of Sponges, which creep about exactly like Amœbæ, cannot be distinguished from them. The egg-cell of Man, which like that of most other animals is surrounded by a membrane, resembles an inclosed Amœba. The first single-celled animals of this kind arose out of Monera by the differentiation of the inner kernel and the external protoplasm; they lived in the earlier Primordial period. An irrefutable proof that such single-celled primeval animals really existed as the direct ancestors of Man, is furnished according to the fundamental law of biogeny (vol. i, p. 309) by the fact that the human egg is nothing more than a simple cell.

Third Stage—Synamœbœ.—In order to form an approximate conception of the organization of those ancestors of Man which first developed out of the single-celled Primeval animals, it is necessary to trace the changes undergone by the human egg in the beginning of its individual development. It is just here that ontogeny guides us with the greatest certainty on to the track of phylogeny. We hav already seen that the egg of Man (in the same way as that of all other Mammals), after fructification has taken place, falls by self-division into a mass of simple and equi-formal Amœba-like cells (vol. i, p. 190, Fig. 4*D*). All these divided globules are at first exactly like one another, naked cells containing a kernel, but without covering; in many animals they show movements like those of the Amœbæ. This ontogenetic stage of development which we called Morula (p. 125), on account of its mulberry shape, is a certain proof that in the early primordial period there existed ancestors of man which possessed the form value of a mass of homogeneous, loosely connected cells. They may be called a community of Amœbœ (Synamœbæ). (Compare p. 127.) They originated out of single-celled Primæval animals of the second stage by repeated self-division and by the permanent union of the products of this division.

Fourth Stage—Ciliated Larva (Planœada).—In the course of the ontogenesis of most of the lower animals, and also in that of the lowest Vertebrate animals, the Lanceolate Animals, or Amphioxus, there first develops out of the Morula a ciliated larva (planula). Those cells, lying on the surface of the homogeneous mass of cells, extend hair-like processes, or fringes of hairs, which by striking against the water keep the whole body rotating. The round many-celled body thus becomes differentiated, in that the external cells covered with cilia differ from the non-ciliated internal cells. In Man and in all other Vertebrate animals (with the exception of the Amphioxus), as well as in all Arthropoda, this stage of the ciliated larva has been lost, in the course of time, by abbreviated inheritance. There must, however, hav existed ancestors of Man in the early Primordial period which possessed the form value of these ciliated larvæ. A certain proof of this is furnished by the Amphioxus, which is on the one hand related by blood to Man, but on the other has retained down to the present day the state of the planula.

Fifth Stage—Primœval Stomach Animals (Gastrœada).—In the course of the individual development of Amphioxus, as well as in the most different lower animals, there first arises out of the planula the extremely important form of larva which we hav named stomach larva, or gastrula (p. 126: Frontispiece, Fig. 5, 6). According to the fundamental law of biogeny this gastrula proves the former existence of an independent form of primeval animal of the same structure, and this we hav named primeval stomach animal, or gastræa (pp. 127, 128). These gastræada must hav existed during the older primordial period, and they must hav also included the ancestors of man. A certain proof of this is furnished by the amphioxus, which in spite of its blood relationship to man still passes through the stage of the gastrula with a simple intestin and a double intestinal wall.

Sixth Stage—Gliding Worms (Turbellaria).—The human ancestors of the sixth stage which originated out of the gastræda of the fifth stage, were low worms, which, of all the forms of worms known to us, were most closely allied to the Gliding Worms, or Turbellaria, or at least upon the whole possessed their form value. Like the Turbellaria of the present day, the whole surface of their body was covered with cilia, and they possessed a simple body of an oval shape, entirely without appendages. These acœlomatus worms did not as yet possess a true body-cavity (cœlom) nor blood. They originated in the early primordial period out of the gastræada, by the formation of a middle germ-layer, or muscular layer, and also by the further differentiation of the internal parts into various organs; more especially the first formation of a nervous system, the simplest organs of sense, the simplest organs for secretion (kidneys) and generation (sexual organs). The proof that human ancestors existed of a similar formation is to be looked for in the circumstance that comparativ anatomy and ontogeny point to the lower acœlomatous worms as the common primary form, not merely of all higher worms, but also of the four higher tribes of animals. Now, of all the animals known to us, the Turbellaria, which possess neither a body-cavity nor blood, are most closely allied to these primeval acœlomatous Primary Worms.

Seventh Stage—Soft Worms (Scolecida).—Between the Turbellaria of the preceding stage and the Sack Worms of the next stage, we must necessarily assume at least one connecting intermediate stage. For the Tunicata, which of all known animals stand nearest to the eighth stage, and the Turbellaria, which most resemble the sixth stage, indeed both belong to the lower division of the unsegmented Worms; but still these two divisions differ so much from one another in their organization that we must necessarily assume the earlier existence of extinct intermediate forms between the two. These connecting links, of which no fossil remains exist, owing to the soft nature of their bodies, we may comprise as Soft Worms, or Scolecida. They developed out of the Turbellaria of the sixth stage by forming a true body-cavity (a cœlom) and blood in their interior. It is difficult to say which of the still living Cœlomati are nearest akin to these extinct Scolecida, it may be the Acorn-worms (Balanoglossus). The proof that even the direct ancestors of man belonged to these Scolecida, is furnished by the comparativ anatomy and the ontogeny of Worms and of the Amphioxus. The form value of this stage must moreover hav been represented by several very different intermediate stages, in the wide gap between Turbellaria and Tunicata.

Eight Stage—Sack Worms (Himatega.)—Under the name of Sack worms, or Himatega, we here allude in the eighth place to those Cœlomati, out of which the most ancient skull-less Vertebrata were directly developed. Among the Cœlomati of the present day, the Ascidians are the nearest relatives of these exceedingly remarkable Worms, which connect the widely differing classes of Invertebrate and Vertebrate animals. That the ancestors of man really existed during the primordial period in the form of these Himatega is distinctly proved by the exceedingly remarkable and important agreement presented by the ontogeny of the Amphioxus and the Ascidia. From this fact the early existence of Sack Worms may be inferred; they of all known worms are most closely related to our recent Tunicates, especially to the freely swimming young forms or larvæ of the simple Sea-squirts (Ascidia, Phallusia). They originated out of the worms of the seventh stage by the formation of a dorsal nerve-marrow (medulla tube), and by the formation of the spinal rod (chorda dorsalis) which lies below it. It is just the position of this central spinal rod, or axial skeleton, between the dorsal marrow on the dorsal side, and the intestinal canal on the ventral side, which is most characteristic of all Vertebrate animals, including man, but also of the larvæ of the Ascidia. The form of value of this stage nearly corresponds with that which the larvæ of the simple Sea-squirts possess at the time when they show the beginning of the dorsal marrow and spinal rod.

CHAPTER XXIX.

CONCERNING CONSTANTINE.

Where is the man who, having received a tolerable education, can forget what Constantine was? He had himself acknowledged as emperor in a small corner of England by a little army of foreigners; had he more right to the empire than Maxentius, who was elected by the senate or by the Roman armies?

Some time afterward he comes to Gaul and collects together a few Christian soldiers formerly attached to his father; he crosses the Alps, ever increasing his army; he attacks his rival, who falls in the Tiber in the midst of the battle. They do not fail to say that this victory was a miracle, and that in the clouds was seen a standard and a celestial cross, upon which everyone could read in Greek letters, "Thou shalt conquer by this sign." For the Gauls, the Britons, the Allobroges, and the Insubrians who followed him understood Greek perfectly, and besides God preferred speaking Greek instead of Latin.

Notwithstanding this fine miracle which he himself had published, he did not then become a Christian. He was contented to grant, as a political move, liberty of conscience to all the world, and he made so open a profession of paganism that he took the title of grand pontiff. Thus he demonstrated that he was considering the two religions in which he conducted himself very prudently during the first years of his tyranny. I use the word tyranny in this case without any scruple, because I am not accustomed to recognize as sovereign a man who holds his place by force, and I feel myself too humane not to call him a tyrant and a barbarian, who had assassinated his father-in-law, Maximius Hercules, without the slightest plausible pretext, and who also assassinated the Emperor Licinius, his brother-in-law, in Thessalonica, by the most cowardly perfidy.

I call him a tyrant beyond doubt who had his son Crispus assassinated, his wife Fausta smothered, and who, defiled by murders and parricides, displaying the most revolting ostentation, delivered himself over to all the pleasures of the most infamous effeminacy.

Let cowardly ecclesiastical flatterers heap eulogies upon him even while avowing his crimes; let them see in him if they can a great man, a saint, because he had himself plunged thrice into a tub of water. A man of my people and my character will never debase himself by pronouncing the name of Constantine without horror.

Zosimus relates, and this is very probable, that Constantine, being as weak as he was cruel, and, like so many other princes, mixed superstition with crimes, thought to find in Christianity the expiation for his misdeeds. Well and good that interested bishops should have made him believe that the God of the Christians would pardon him for all, and that he was infinitely obliged to him for having given them money and honored them. As for me, I would have acknowledged no God who received with grace a heart so deceitful and inhuman. It is only the priests who would canonize the assassin of Uriah among the Jews, and the murderers of his wife and son among the Christians.

The character of Constantine, his pomp and his cruelties, are very well expressed in these two lines which one of his unhappy courtiers, named Ablavius, affixed to the door of the palace:

"Saturni aurea saecla quis requirat?
Sunt haec gemmea sed Neroniana.

Who can regret the golden age of Saturn?
This is the age of jewels; for it is that of Nero."

What should this Ablavius have said of the charitable zeal of the Christians who, as soon as they were given full liberty by Constantine, assassinated Candidius, a son of the Emperor Galerius, son of the Emperor Maximian, eight years old, his daughter, aged seven, and then drowned their mother in the Orontes? For a long time they pursued the old Empress Valeria, a widow of Galerius, who fled from their vengeance. They found her at Thessalonica, massacred her, and threw her body into the sea. Thus they signalized their evangelical moderation, and yet they complain of having had martyrs!

THE Jewish liquor dealers of the Russian empire are required to pay a special tax, while the Christians engaged in the same business are untaxed. The consequence is that the "followers of the lamb" hav a monopoly in the whisky trade.

Communications.

"When Shall the Harvest Be?"

A writer for THE TRUTH SEEKER, a few months since, thought that evangelical religion would "play out" and be extinct by the close of this century. I do not so think. Like Byles Gridley, I desire to "go down to the bottom of things," and start my computions deep. We hav about 71,000 clergy in the United States, in full life and force, who hav the ear of the public in their pulpits, protected by law and public opinion, to discuss "one side of the question," without "let, hindrance, or molestation." He who observes will discover that in every church there is a coterie of the strong-minded, "bull-dozing" women, who are the "blowers and strikers" for the minister and the cause of Christ, who really run the church, and their husbands impress public opinion largely. The main members of the church, by their education from their infancy, hav been ingrained, "dyed in the wool," brought to a belief in orthodoxy, and fastened to it with bolt and burr, and the bolt headed over it; that Moses's God, the Bible, and the orthodox religion are the only sacred and true things in the universe.

The church will not see, will not think, will not reason, will not listen, will not investigate the other side; will feed the flames with Liberal books, pamphlets, and circulars; in fact, ignore everything that opposes its creed, as an "enemy to God and desperately wicked." It "holds the fort," solidified by fifteen centuries; and of necessity must hold it for a time. It has millions of soldiers of the cross in garrison, well armed and equipped for theological warfare. Added to this, it has splendid writers, a powerful evangelical press, and a very large force of clergy in constant work, most of whom are well educated, and very many are talented men. These are powers that hav been highly honored, greatly feared, and severely felt in the past.

Not long since, in conversation with a noted theologian, I asked him in a modest way, as an earnest seeker after the truth, to answer me by reasonable proof the three following questions, upon the solution of which my eternal happiness or misery might hang, and which would settle the question of biblical authority and plenary inspiration; to wit:

1. How did God communicate to Moses?
2. How did Moses know it was God?
3. How do we know we hav a correct record?

"Now, my dear friend," said I, "I will listen patiently and devoutly to your demonstrations and proofs, for I hav listened much, in a long life, to rational and legal evidence."

Mark his answer: "Sir, I perceive you are an unbeliever in the blessed word of God, a caviler at the Bible, selecting a passage here and there, and not reading the connection; in short, a skeptic, an Infidel. As a rule, I do not talk much to such."

I thereupon arose, straightened myself up to the full hight of six feet, buckled on my armor, without using the rusty swivel of my neck to hav the other cheek smitten, and upon "his hint, I spake," as Othello says: "Sir," I said, "I apprehend the gist of your language; I will state its plain and real import. You mean to say that I am an enemy to God, under his wrath and eternal condemnation—a criminal in the sight of infinit justice and goodness; in short, Almighty God's eternal culprit, to be sentenced for my best and honest mental conclusions of what is truth, to torture through the everlasting cycles of the ages, to pain, the most exquisit that mundane or supernal chemistry can invent; and all for what? Because I do not believe as you do. I know what you mean to say, sir, and I understand you fully. Your reasons are vituperation, your arguments are accusation, and your real love for man, outside the church, is your hate of reason, science, and the religion of humanity. It is a wonder that you forgot withal to call me a Freelover.

"Let me say that your language to me is below even the cloth of a clergyman, and especially very far beneath the dignity of a gentleman. I warn you that should you repeat those epithets to gentlemen, you might endure physical pain, and it would be severe enough to reform your manners, though you be a theologian as huge as high Olympus." The divine subsided. We parted in silence.

Pardon the above apparent digression from the gist of my subject, still I hav inserted it, considering it germane.

I hav spoken of the power of the church; I will now present you with a few "straws," showing the direction of the wind, that is felt by the great thinkers of the world, and will increase to a cyclone, producing, by inevitable natural laws, the decadence of the Christian church.

By a seeming natural law of merging and progress, the pagan religion merged into the Jewish, the Jewish into the Christian; and from the establishment of the Christian religion by law, by Constantine, about A.D. 325, every indication points to the fact that Christianity is passing into a great universal church of humanity.

Let us look at a few potent facts. Catholicism in the Old World is not dead, but, practically, dying. The hope of the pope is now in America. The "disestablishment of the church" robs the table of theology of its daily "creature comforts." A writer in England says: "The Church of England has dismissed hell [the hub of theology] with costs." An eminent divine, who ought to know of what he speaks, says—putting it mildly—that "the whole Christian church is honey-combed with unbelief." The Rev. Mr. Pullman says: "The secret is, the ministers hav nearly all lost belief in the religion they find it necessary to profess. They preach a creed openly, but secretly their souls are honey-combed with doubt." To fortify this, I might giv an item or two from my own experience. I was once a professor in a denominational college; the president and faculty were mostly of the clergy. I was on confidential relations with all the faculty. I found that instead of their desiring that I should embrace their belief, they leaned very strongly to mine. Conversing, a few years since, with Judge B., of New York, an old friend of mine, and who holds a high position in the Methodist church, I said to him, "Now, tell me, judge, do the Methodist clergy believe what they preach?" Looking at me kindly and earnestly, he replied: "I tell you, Putnam, they do not!" And then the crimes and immoralities of the ministry a few years past are the greatest danger to the church.

It is stated that Talmage on his return from California said that religion is practically dead. Most of the thinking, observing clergy would say the same, if they durst "speak out."

The slim attendance at "divine service" is alarming to the evangelicals over the world. In Berlin statistics show that, of a population of 1,100,000, only 30,000 attend church on the "holy Sabbath." Paris, London, Edinburgh, and Dublin do a little better, but not much. Then New York, with a population of 1,300,000, has only a Protestant membership of 97,000. Its church attendance weekly may be about 60,000. Take out from those churches the cultured men and women who went in at a former day for social position, popularity, and financial profit (and such will soon be in their graves), number and weigh mentally the remainder, but "tell it not in Gath."

The greatest, wisest, and best of the clergy hear the creaking and feel the tremble of the "old ship of Zion" under their feet—feel that is sinking; but how to escape is the question. If they go to the solid land they will be denounced, bounced, and disgraced by the church. "Where will they go?" as Webster said. They hav caught the spirit, but can not claim the fellowship of the great church of humanity. Beecher, the most eminent divine of America, if not of the world, has been preaching on the center of the gang-plank, laid from the trembling, sinking old ship of Zion to the solid land of reason and humanity. He now wisely preaches on shore and is safe. So are Newton, Chainey, Miln, Thomas, Swing, and others.

The Christian church itself is evidently in a bad way, and will soon lose the help of law and outside financial support. Very many of the church edifices of New England are closed indefinitly. A large number of the clergy are without "calls," and the people are thinking. The result of thought upon the truth of orthodoxy is easily foretold. I hav facts in my mind's eye that let a religionist be free one year from orthodox influences, and he will become a Liberal.

As to the people of the broad West,

> "They don't go much on religion,
> They never ain't had no show;
> But they've got a middling tight grip, sir,
> On the handful o' things they know."

A word about the state and progress of a few of the denominations. In my youth the Universalist church was the most despised of all people by the orthodox. No epithet seemed too bad to apply to it. I knew, and hav known, that its members were good, reasonable, and sensible people. That church never believed the authority it quoted to prove universal salvation. That authority teaches brimstone and eternal damnation as strong as human language can put it, yet it made west mean east, and if it found the word apogee it said it meant a meeting-house. By a million of contortions of the plain words of the Bible it essayed to prove the salvation of all men.

The Episcopal church is generally composed of intelligent and cultivated people. It believes just what it pleases, and acts accordingly. Its form of worship might just as well be put into a machine like a music box, wound up, and set to running in the church on Sunday, and the members need not attend.

Allow me to premise a remark before coming to the Presbyterian church. Is it not infinitly strange that the loving, kind, just, and true omnipotent God of the Christians, after he had said that he would not that "anyone should perish," should say that "he would bring on them strong delusions that they might believe a lie, that they might be damned?" Is it not strange about Moses, after he had committed a foul murder, killing an Egyptian, hiding him in the sand, and fleeing from the strong hand of civil justice, that God should make him his attorney-general, to promulgate his laws and execute his justice (such as it was) upon mankind? Is it not stranger still that the only begotten son of Almighty God, the lamb of God, the meek and lowly Jesus, who said, "Love your enemies," etc., should say (Luke xix, 27), "But those mine enemies who would not that I should rule over them, bring hither and slay them before me." No desperado tyrant of earth would conceive such a monstrous act.

Think of Constantine, after he had murdered his wife, son, and others, establishing the "cause of Christ" by law. Consider John Calvin, the most atrocious desperado of religious hate, burning Servetus by the slow torture of a green wood fire because Servetus taught a doctrin different from his. This John Calvin is the founder, almoner, conservator, and great mogul of the Presbyterian church. I need not say more; the conclusion comes itself. I will only add that that church for the past year has increased its numbers not to exceed one member to each church; then deduct deaths, excommunications, and "go-outs," and tell me of the life and progress of Presbyterianism.

The Congregational church is generally demoralized on orthodox theology, and the Liberals may consider it their friend.

The Unitarian church has never believed in the monstrosities of orthodoxy. It discards the "hub" of orthodoxy—atonement. It rides in a substantial wagon of good sense and good conduct.

The Baptist church is a pot-metal concern, and always was. You may hav a kettle in your family a hundred years old that keeps its shape and grows harder by use—this is the Baptist church. But understand that all pot-metal can be crushed by superior force.

The Methodist church holds the democracy of numbers and ignorance, and will hold the fort of orthodoxy in that proportion. But reason and science are omnipotent, and must rule in the "good time coming."

I hav made many points in this paper, and could touch no one but lightly. My topic is, "When shall the harvest be?" A few words by way of application, as the minister says, and I hav done. The time I set for that harvest is thirty years, and my reasons are these: At that time the 71,000 clergy, so activ and powerful now, will be in their graves or superannuated; the coterie of women who now run their husbands and the church "will be in the same boat." Where are the filling up and the recruits to come from? That is the question. What young men are being educated for the ministry? Very few, and they are the weak-minded ones (of course). What young women are being converted who are to become the future "bulldozers" of the church? "You tell." What young men are being brought in? The Boston divine answered in the late great convocation there. He said only the "goodies." He observed, "When we implore the intellectual young men to come to Christ they answer, 'Go to thunder.'" What do the revivals promis? Let us see. I hav watched them closely in a county seat of Michigan for four winters past. Their harvest will not exceed ten, and what a harvest! "Chub" M., who is well known as a "constitutional liar," and who has an "overslaugh" in the brain, was brought in. He is a regular communicant in good standing. Lizzie A. came in, promised in public that she would "giv her ring and breastpin to the Laud." The revival of the present winter has brought in three converts. The minister said a few days since, "We had better close this meeting, for the material we obtain will not build up a future church."

But the Sabbath-schools are the sheet-anchor of hope for the future church. Let us see about them. I hav noticed that those who hav lived on Johnny-cake in their childhood detest it in middle life. Beecher calls the food of the Sabbath-schools "theological swill."

Such is the situation. The evangelical church must go with its atrocious name, its horrible, torturing, inquisitorial fame; it must go. It retains its former disposition, but it lacks the law. It must go. The eternal law of humanity and reason's progress hav decreed it. It must go. The simple fact is, the Christian religion is not founded on truth, and it must go.

I think that we will find that one world at a time will be all we will be able to manage, and a good deal more. But what is to come in that "good time coming?"—and it will come. There will be the great universal church of humanity that will teach and promote unity, sociability, charity, friendship, kindness, honesty, truth, and justice among men. Its great leading and central principles will be,

> "Believing what is known—to no creed confined:
> Our brethren are true of all human kind;
> Love truth, do good, be just and kind to all;
> Exalt the right, though every ism fall."

Liberals, Spiritualists, Materialists, Freethinkers, Radicals, Positivists, Agnostics, and the rest, "walk into my parlor;" we will reason together, and mingle soul with soul. We may differ a little in the head, but not in the heart.

WORTHY PUTNAM.

Berrien Springs, Mich.

Horrible Doctrins Taught by the Church.

"Hell is crammed with infants damned,
Without a day of grace."

A controversy has been going on between two ministers of Detroit, Mich., as to whether or not infants are damned. In support of his statement that Christianity teaches that they are, the Rev. Dr. Rexford cites the authorities given below. Rexford is pastor of the church of "Our Father." He has the better of the argument, so far as the doctrinal points of theology are concerned; but in proving his claim he has furnished the best possible evidence that Christianity is a cruel system of religion, utterly unworthy the support of any humane person. If "Our Father" creates infants, and damns them to eternal torment because "He" has not given them sufficient vitality to liv and know "His blessed name" and be "born again," then "Our Father" is a brute.

These are the proofs of this infamous doctrin:

Dr. Joseph Bellamy, a graduate of Yale College in the class of 1735, and an intimate friend of Jonathan Edwards, in his essay upon "The Nature and Glory of the Gospel," says: "It was at God's sovereign election to determin whether to grant any relief or not, and what relief to grant, and when and to whom to giv his son to die with a view to save all mankind or a part, to send the news of the gospel to all nations or a part only, to giv to every child of Adam born in a Christian land opportunity by living to hear the glad tidings or only to grant this to some, while others die in infancy and never hear. Those who die in infancy may as justly be held under the law in the next world as those that liv may in this. God is under no more obligation to save those that die than those that liv" (Works, vol. ii, p. 306).

Jonathan Edwards, in combating the views of two divines who thought there might be some hope for children after death, says: "One of them supposes that Adam's sin, though truly imputed to infants, so that thereby they are subjected to a proper punishment, yet it is not imputed to them in such a degree as that upon this account they should be liable to eternal punishment, but only to temporal death or annihilation. To suppose that God imputes not all of Adam's sin, but only some little part of it, relieves nothing but one's imagination. To think of poor little infants bearing such torments for Adam's sin as they sometimes do in this world, and then ending in death or annihilation, may set easier in the imagination, but it does not at all relieve our reason" (Edwards's Works, vol. ii, p. 494).

Dr. Edwards continues: "The other divine thinks there is truly an imputation of Adam's sin, so that infants cannot be looked upon as innocent, yet seems to think it is not agreeable to the perfections of God to make the state of infants in another world worse than a state of non-existence." In reply he says: "This seems to me a giving up of the grand point of the imputation of Adam's sin, both in whole and in part. It seems to me pretty manifest that none can, with good consistency, own a real imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity without owning that they are justly viewed and treated as sinners truly guilty, and children of wrath on that account even as much as if each one of mankind had by a direct and full act of rebellion violated the covenant for himself" (Works, vol. ii, p. 495).

Dr. Rexford then read portions of a poem entitled "The Day of Doom," by Michael Wigglesworth, a contemporary of Dr. Edwards, a fellow and tutor of Harvard College, and pastor of the old Parish church in Malden, Mass. (now a Universalist church). As a prefatory line to the stanza, he writes: "Reprobate infants plead for themselvs:"

Then to the bar they all drew near
Who died in infancy;
Who never had or good or bad
Effected personally,
But from the womb unto the tomb
Were straightway carried
(Or who at least ere they transgrest),
Who thus began to plead:
If for our transgression or disobedience
We here did stand at thy left hand,
Just were the recompense;
But Adam's guilt our souls hath spilt,
His fault is charged on us,
And that alone hath overthrown
And utterly undone us.

The children, after entering the foregoing plea, turn to their own personal innocence, as if hoping for some relief, but the judge answers them in this wise:

Adam was designed of all mankind
To be a perfect head—
A common root whence all should shoot,
And stood in all their stead.
He stood and fell—did ill or well—
Not for himself alone,
But for you all who now his fall
And trespass would disown.
A crime it is, therefore in bliss
You may not hope to dwell;
But unto you I shall allow
The easiest room in hell.

Wigglesworth then proceeds to describe this "easiest room" as follows:

But who can tell the plague of hell,
And torments exquisit?
Who can relate this dismal state
And terrors infinit?
Who fare the best and fall the least,
Yet feel their punishment,
Whereby to nought they would be brought
If God did not prevent?
The least degree of misery
Is incomparable;
The lightest pain they there sustain
More than intolerable.
But God's great power from hour to hour
Upholds them in the fire,
That they should not consume a jot,
Or in the flame expire.

John Calvin himself was next quoted, in his reply to Servetus, who held that salvation awaited all at the final judgment who had not brought upon themselvs the punishment of eternal death, by their own personal sins. Calvin said: "From which it is to be inferred, then, that all who are taken from life while infants and young children are exempt from eternal death, though they are elsewhere called accursed" (tract on the errors of Servetus). This controversy ended in the death of Servetus at the stake at Geneva, Switzerland, October 27, 1553, mainly through the influence of John Calvin.

Sebastian Castalio, who was the friend of Calvin and the translator of the Bible into Latin, incurred the enmity of Calvin by holding "that judgment should follow and not precede actual transgression." In his reply Calvin uses these words: "It cannot be dissembled that there is a hidden poison that lurks in your words, because if the similitude you propose is admitted, God will be unjust in that he involves the whole race of Adam in the guilt of original sin. You deny that it is just in God to damn anyone unless on account of actual transgression. Persons innumerable, however, are taken out of life while infants. Put forth now your virulence against God, who precipitates into eternal death harmless infants torn from their mothers' breasts. He who will not detect thus your blasphemy, when it is openly exposed, may curse me at his will."

In his work on "The Eternal Predestination of God," Calvin has these words employed against Albertas Pighias, a Catholic writer who did not believe that original sin necessitated eternal death: "If Pighias does not think original sin sufficient for the damnation of men and will make no account of the secret judgment of God, what will he do with infant children who hav been snatched out of this life before they were able on account of their age to giv any proof of their sin, since the same condition of birth and death was common to the little ones, who died at Sodom and Jerusalem, since there was no difference in their works? Why will Christ at the last day separate some of them to his left hand, from those standing on his right? Who does not here adore the admirable judgment of God in that it has been ordered that some should be born at Jerusalem whence they presently pass to a better life, and that Sodom, the entrance to hell, should be the birthplace of others?"

In his work on baptism Calvin says: "These two points are to be severally remarked, namely, that we being in all parts of our nature defiled and corrupted are already for such corruption only worthily held condemned and convicted before God, yea, and very infants themselvs bring their own damnation with them from their mother's womb, who although they hav not yet brought forth the fruits of their iniquity, yet hav the seed thereof inclosed within them, yea, their whole nature is a certain seed of sin, and therefore it cannot be otherwise than hateful and abominable to God. Moreover, it is nothing doubtful that the infants are to be saved, and verily of that age some are saved, are first regenerate of the Lord." Once more, in Calvin's Institutes (book iii, chapter xxiii, section 7), we find him asking questions like this: "I ask again, how has it come to pass that the fall of Adam has involved so many nations with their little children in eternal death, and that without remedy, but because such was the will of God? It is a horrible decree, I confess."

Dr. Rexford next quoted from Dr. Twiss, who was president of the Westminster Assembly which formulated the Westminster Confession of Faith in the seventeenth century. In writing of some authors who had rejected the extreme Calvinistic doctrin which consigned children to the flames on account of Adam's sins, Dr. Twiss says: "It were worth the knowing of this author whether any infants of Turks or Saracens departing this life in their infancy are left in this woful estate. If none are left but all are saved, is it not a pretty guilt of eternal death which not any suffer?" Dr. Twiss ridicules the idea that any man should admit the doctrin of original sin and then object to the suffering of infants to whom this sin is imputed, and in exposing the absurdity of the author he is reviewing, says: "And you may guess if this author's pretense of acknowledging the corruption of our nature be not simply from the teeth outward. If many thousands, even all the infants of Turks and Saracens dying in original sin, are tormented in hell fire, is God to be accounted the father of cruelties for this? As to the punishment of hell, it is either spoken of infants or men of riper years. If of infants departing in infancy, if guilty of eternal death, it is no injustice to inflict it; and though God be slow to anger toward some, it is not necessary he should be so toward others. It is true many infants, we say, perish in original sin only, not living to be guilty of any actual sin. Every man who is condemned is condemned for original as well as actual sin, and many thousands of infants for original sin only" (The Riches of Divine Love, published in 1653, pp. 135–6). Dr. Burgess, another member of the Westminster Assembly, in his work entitled "Original Sin," says: "The consideration of God's just and severe proceedings againt pagans and their children may make thee the more admire the grace of God in saving thee. For how many heathen perish in hell who, it may be, never committed such gross and foul sins as thou hast! To be sure, their infants never committed such actual iniquities as thou hast done, yet they appear in God's ordinary way of proceedings to be left in that lost estate of nature, and therefore it is a good quickening meditation which Videlius useth to make a godly man thankful for divine grace, and this meditation of Videlius is as follows: "Ah, how many little children are and shall be in hell, who never had the knowledge of good and evil, and might not God hav left you in the same misery?" (Dr. Burgess's Original Sin, pp. 550, 551.)

Dr. Rexford then quoted the third section of the 10th chapter of the Westminster Confession of Faith: "Elect infants dying in infancy are regenerated and saved by Christ through the spirit who worketh when and where and how he pleaseth; so also are all other elect persons who are incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the world." The section immediately following is, "Others not elected, although they may be called by the ministry of the world and may hav some common operations of the spirit, yet they never truly come to Christ, and therefore cannot be saved."

The puritan Arthur Hildersham, a contemporary of the Westminster divines, although not a member of assembly, says, in his lecture on the 51st Psalm: "It is evident that God has witnessed his wrath against the sins of infants not only by hating their sins but even their persons also, and this not only by inflicting temporal punishment, but even by casting them into hell. There is in infants a natural proneness, disposition, and inclination to sin, as there is in the youngest whelp of a lion, bear, or wolf unto cruelty, or in the very egg of a cockatrice before it is hatched. Against these damnable errors (that infants dying in infancy are saved) you hav heard it proved, first, that all infants and sinners deserve condemnation, and second, that many infants hav been vessels of wrath and fire-brands of hell" (17th lecture Ed. 1635, pp. 280–1).

THE DOCTRIN HELD BY ALL THE SECTS.

This additional testimony is by a person who signs himself "Christian Logic" in the Detroit Evening News:

"Apropos of the Rexford-Foote 'infant damnation' discussion now going on, I find the following in the Michigan Christian Herald (Baptist) of the 22d inst:

"'The Methodist Western Christian Advocate approves the mother who refused to kiss her babe until it had been baptized, because until that ordinance has been administered it is a heathen.'

"Very plain doctrin this, surely. And so, according to the Advocate, an unbaptized child is a heathen, is not in a condition of salvation, but in a condition of damnation. Ergo, Methodists believe in infant damnation. Where did they get the doctrin—from Arminius? or John Wesley? or hav they departed from the faith? or is the Advocate wrong and its editor fit only to be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone?

"Another thought: Presbyterians, Roman Catholics, Congregationalists, Episcopalians, and Methodists believe in, teach, and practice infant baptism, and if the child is taken sick and threatened with death the baptism is hastened. Why this infant baptism? Is it not because of a fundamental and necessary belief that the baptism makes more certain, if it does not absolutely and alone secure, the salvation of the unconscious infant? In other words, does not such use of water show a belief in baptismal regeneration? Or, yet further, the unbaptized dying infant is unsaved, which is, 'infant damnation.' If Rev. C. C. Foote ever baptized a dying infant he has thereby proved beyond all dispute that he, too, believes in baptismal regeneration and 'infant damnation.'"

Bradlaugh, England's Herr Most.

From the Detroit Post and Tribune.

His hold on the people is owing wholly to the fact that he attacks whatever respectable people are accustomed to regard as sacred and decent. He is a martyr in the great cause of disrepute, and can only wish to get into the Commons for the purpose of shocking all the well-bred gentlemen who may be sitting there.

The Post and Tribune has never said anything against that whisky maker, Hiram Walker; no, he owns too much of their stock. The first Presbyterian church of Detroit and Hiram Walker's distillery run very smoothly. C. L. Hawes.

Catholics Show their Teeth.

The following, taken from a Lexington, Ky., paper, shows just what the ignorant religious element will do when occasion allows. The followers of the priesthood are depraved in the matter of religion beyond comprehension. They act like dogs that bite any one their masters set them on. They are slaves to the church, and are the most dangerous element in this country. They appeal to brute force, and one might as well attempt to reason with an iron post. Every man in this country is entitled to his belief and to the free expression thereof. If any brutal religionists attempt to interfere they should be met with the strong arm of the municipal law, enforced, if necessary, by powder and ball.

Last Wednesday a Mr. O'Connor, an Infidel ex-priest from El Paso, Illinois, reached the city and advertised that on the Sunday night following he would lecture at Lell's Hall upon the subject, "Why I Became a Priest and Why I Ceased to be One." When the appointed time came quite a crowd gathered in front of Lell's Hall, although the place was not lighted up. The crowd was quiet and orderly, but one mixing in it could hear threats of lynching O'Connor firmly but not loudly expressed. It being ascertained that the lecture would not be given that night, some press reporters sought Mr. O'Connor out at his boarding place, the Madison House, to interview him about the matter. In response to their call he soon came down and stated in effect that on Saturday evening he saw Mr. Lell, and Mr. Lell told him he regretted having rented him the hall, as he had received notice that if O'Connor was allowed to lecture in it it would be badly damaged. Mr. Lell stated also that on Saturday he had not sold a loaf of bread or an ounce of groceries to his Catholic trade, and supposed he would lose this trade altogether if he allowed "the apostate priest" to lecture in his Hall. Mr. O'Connor also stated, and was borne out by the statement of the proprietor of the Madison House, that on Saturday night he was called on by three men, who wanted him to come out on the pavement and talk to them. This he declined to do, but he invited them into the house. They went in, and the spokesman said that the three were a committee representing five hundred Catholics who instructed them to say to him that if he attempted to deliver his lecture in Lexington he would be killed, and that there was not power enough in the city to protect him.

Mr. O'Connor said that on Sunday morning he applied to the mayor, appealing to him for protection, and relating to him the threats which had been made against him. The mayor was sick, and told him to come back at 12 o'clock for his answer. At 12 o'clock the mayor told O'Connor that he could only detail a couple of policemen to keep order in the hall, as he never detailed more than that many for keeping order at any entertainment. The ex-priest says he then concluded not to attempt to deliver the lecture, for he had no desire to lose his life when there was nothing to be accomplished by it.

While the reporters were having this interview a policeman stuck his head in at the door and called out Mr. Williams, the proprietor of the hotel. In a few minutes Mr. Williams came back and said the policeman told him that if he wanted to avoid trouble at his house he had better get O'Connor out of it, as there was a large mob down town who would certainly come there, and he (the policeman) was fearful of the consequences, as there was not civil authority enough in the city to disperse the mob. This intelligence frightened the household, especially the females. The landlord's daughter said she could take Mr. O'Connor to a place of safety, which she did very bravely, being accompanied by a gallant reporter.

Yesterday morning a reporter called again at the Madison House, and the proprietor said that about midnight a number of men congregated in front of his house, and shortly afterward blew a whistle, and that then men poured in from every direction until several hundred were present. They were discussing whether or not to break in the windows when Mr. Williams told them that Mr. O'Connor had left the city by the Cincinnati Southern Railroad.

Mr. O'Connor is still in the city, and stated yesterday that he would remain and lecture at the Opera House one night this week, perhaps Friday night, and that if the mayor cannot protect him he will appeal to the governor for protection. However, a large number of citizens hav signified their willingness to be sworn in as special policemen for that occasion, without pay. They say they want to see whether or not freedom of speech exists in Lexington.

Some Eminent Men on Baptism.

From the Detroit Evening News.

As the rite of baptism is at present attracting considerable attention, I thought it well to put a few questions to a number of great and mighty-minded gentlemen. The following are some of their answers:

A sheep is not shorn till after it goes into the water. I would not consign a cat—that sweet songster of the housetop—to damnation, far less a beautiful cherub of an infant, the picture of its father and the image of its mother. I think Mr. Foote has put his foot in it.—T. DeWitt Talmage.

I hav reflected much on baptism for some time back. In this present session of Parliament I intend to introduce a measure how to regulate it. This act, if carried, will be enforced in England, Ireland, and Scotland, also in Ecclefechan, the birthplace of Thomas Carlyle. I consider that both Mr. Calvin and Mr. Foote hold erroneous views. I agree with Ulysses—

> "For me the foot-path pleases more; my feet
> Shall none of all thy minist'ring maidens touch,
> Unless there be some ancient matron grave
> Among them, who hath pangs of heart endured,
> Num'rous and keen, as I have felt myself;
> Her I refuse not. She may wash my feet!"

These are my views: Lashing, splashing, dashing, dipping, sipping, nipping, reeling, kneeling, squealing, hotch-potch hot-Scotch, coons, moons, silver spoons.—Ben Butler.

I believe there is no hell, consequently there can be no damnation. I am sorry that I am not in accord with my brother Foote. The clergy of Detroit, however, could not hav chosen a better champion. With kindest love to your good lady.—H. Ward Beecher.

My countryman, Robert Burns, speaks of "Span-lang, wee unchristened bairns." These inhuman ecclesiastical ideas must be rooted out. Let us hav higher and holier opinions. I am framing a bill that will knock hypocrisy, superstition, and cant into the regions of the hyperborean, or higher than Gilderoy's kite. Given at Ottawa under my hand and seal.—John A. Macdonald.

I hav watched the controversy going on between Messrs. Rexford and Foote with much interest. It won't do. Mr. Foote is a great clerical Saul among the prophets. He won't do. Mr. Foote believes in Paul. Paul says, Rom. iii, 1, 2: "There is much profit in circumcision." Why does he not set it agoing in your city? It must be profitable if Paul says so. It won't do.—Robert Ingersoll.

TRUTH SEEKER.

Theory and Practice.

What can Liberalism offer in exchange for our hope and faith? is the oft-repeated, self-satisfied query of Christian professors. We answer: The truth; a life of love instead of a mere profession of faith; the study of science, instead of creeds and catechisms; knowledge of nature's laws, in lieu of church disciplin; the practice of justice, mercy, and truth, prompted by love for and recognition of the claims of all our fellow-creatures to the same rights, in the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness, we desire for ourselvs, instead of hate and ostracism of all who are not of our creed; doing good from love of humanity, not fear of a vindictiv divinity; practice of benevolence and virtue, from love of purity and truth, not from fear of hell's eternal burnings.

Self sacrificing by promoting the happiness of our fellow-creatures, thus best insuring our own. Promoting education, securing to all increased knowledge of science and nature's laws; to save ourselvs and our loved ones from the evils of ignorance. Happiness in the present, endeavoring to avoid the errors and profit by the experience of the past; thus securing happiness in the future, and at last a peaceful death, cheered by the best and truest comfort—the knowledge we hav not lived in vain.

But there is danger of multiplying Liberalists without increasing Liberalism. There is a class who rejoice to receive the truth, are very zealous for its propagation, who very readily accept the theory, but make little endeavor to liv out its principles. Converts to the theory, whose lives do not honor the truth, reflect dishonor on the cause.

Liberalism is doing as well as doubting—repudiating errors of life as well as errors of faith. Liberalism consists in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy. Of course we must hav doctrin, but doctrin can only be of value as the tree on which grows the golden fruit of a good and useful life.

To eradicate superstition, to weed out error, bigotry, and fanaticism, avails little; if the soil is left barren, the noxious weeds will soon crop out again. It is not alone essential that the weeds be uprooted, but that in their place the seeds of truth shall be planted, watered, and cultivated until the luxuriant vine of love, with its leaves of mercy and its fruits of truth, shall leave no place for the noxious weeds of error, hate, envy, and vice to propagate.

It is one thing to be able intellectually to comprehend the truth; it is quite another thing to hav the truth take hold of the inner life; to recognize and obey its claims; to struggle out of the ruts of error, and, turning from the way of evil, patiently, perseveringly climb the steep hill of rectitude, and with love and tenderness assist and encourage others to ascend with us.

If we embrace a new system, our growth toward its standard must be a work of time, and necessitates a sharp conflict with old prejudices, habits, and conceits which hav become a second nature. Change of belief will not at once change our nature; if selfishness, pride, sensuality, or bigotry existed, the germs will still remain, and this knowledge should induce every true and honest heart to redoubled watchfulness and energy to subdue the evil and cultivate the good.

The one sure remedy is to practice Liberalism, as well as to openly profess it, remembering Liberalism is a means to an end; and the end is a more useful, better, purer, nobler, and consequently happier life.

"The Truth Seeker" in Canada.

From the Worthington, Minn., Advance.

The Welland Tribune, published at Welland, Can., says:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER, a Freethought journal, has attained a large circulation in Welland and vicinity. Infidelity seems to be making considerable headway against the churches, owing, we believe, to the latter too often allowing the form to swallow up the substance of Christianity. In other words, there is too often too much 'church' and too little religion."

Well, we are glad to know that this view of the church is becoming general. We hav proclaimed it for years, to the distress and the shocked sensibilities of the weaker brethren in the church. But it is true, true, true.

The Tribune, however, does not take into account the important factor in the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. D. M. Bennett, its founder, was sent to the penitentiary for its publication, by an infamous gang of church bigots, whose blood-hound is one Anthony Comstock.

The people hav a sense of right and justice, when it is aroused, and they intend to take THE TRUTH SEEKER and adopt Infidelity to rebuke the bloody and infamous Vice Society, of New York, which is sending men to prison for free speech.

There ought to be five hundred subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county, just to rebuke the infamous church bigots who are using force and fraud to suppress Liberalism.

Freethought Getting into Society.

There is no more interesting and promising sign of progress than the inauguration and discussions of the Nineteenth Century Club, of which Mr. Courtlandt Palmer is the president and founder. At its meetings the Positivistic president of the National Liberal League, T. B. Wakeman, and the foremost representativs of science and theology meet on equal terms, and discuss the questions of the day with a freedom and good nature that hav hitherto been unknown. These discussions are all the more valuable because the people who listen to them belong to what is known as "fashionable society," before whom it has heretofore been almost out of the question for Freethought to obtain a hearing. On Tuesday evening of last week this club held its fortnightly meeting at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Courtlandt Palmer. Prof. Sumner read an able paper on the subject of "Sociology," and Prof. Rice criticised the musical and some of the other ideas of Herbert Spencer, who found a warm and fearless champion in Prof. Boyesen. Mr. Wakeman then made an eloquent address, tending to pacify the opposing elements. The meeting is said to hav been the liveliest the club has had.

Nothing but the greatest success can be wished for the Nineteenth Century Club, and indeed it seems destined to attain it, as it grows more popular with each succeeding meeting. Mr. Palmer is worthy of much credit for using the opportunities which he possesses as a means of carrying freedom of discussion into circles in which up to the present time it has been an almost total stranger.

E. C. WALKER spoke at Liberal, Mo., March 4th. He began a course of lectures at Humboldt, Kan., on the 17th. His address is Valley Falls, Kan.

LET none forget Mr. Watts's benefit lecture next Sunday night, the 18th, at the Liberal Club Hall. This will be the last opportunity to meet our English guest, for he lectures in Canada and Pennsylvania the following two weeks, and sails for home April 5th. The tickets for this lecture may be procured previous to the lecture at this office, or at the door on Sunday night. Price, 25 cents.

W. F. JAMIESON, after giving five lectures in Kinsman, Ohio, visited Linesville, Pa., where he was announced to deliver two lectures on Sunday, March 11th, on "Modern Spiritualism in Accord with Science;" and "Hav the Spiritualists Proved the Existence and Whereabouts of a Spirit Land?" He will deliver five lectures in Kendallville, Ind., commencing Sunday, March 18th. For lectures address Kendallville, Ind.

WE hav been hindered greatly beyond our expectations in completing the fourth volume of Mr. Bennett's travels, through having to send to various places for facts essential to a complete history of his journey from the place he last wrote about, his notes proving very inadequate. But it is at last in the printers' hands, and early in April we expect to mail it to all who hav sent for it. A good proportion of the original subscribers hav remitted, but there are many yet to hear from. We hope all will take it, if not now, at least when done. The price is $1.50 in cloth; $2.25 in leather; and $2.50 in morocco.

Mr. Heywood's Defense.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since my last report I hav received the following remittances for the expenses of Mr. Heywood's defense: J. G. Deshler, $3.00; Dr. E. B. Foote, $6.00; Mark Rowe, $3.00; J. Earnshaw, $1.00; A. M. J. Page, $1.00; A Friend, $10.00; J. Beauval, $2,00; Newark Liberal League, N. J., $13.50; F. H. Maurer, $1.00; John Cosgrove, $1.50; Elisha Hyatt, $2.00; Thos. Goddard, $2.00; A. F. Benedict, $1.00; Walter C. Wright, $10.00; A. V. H., $10.00. Total, $67.00.

Medford, Mass. WALTER C. WRIGHT.

THE TRUTH SEEKER will be sent to new subscribers three months for fifty cents. There is no better way of serving the cause than by extending the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Joined to His Idol.

The recent sermon of Rev. J. W. Chadwick at All Souls' (Unitarian) church in this city, in which he discoursed concerning "Substitutes for God," was a remarkable plea for that species of idolatry which, rejecting all concrete forms of Theism, and all traditional Theistic conceptions, seeks the more attenuated or indefinit and abstract ideals of the modern school of diluted ontologists who adore the qualities they fondly and with such uncertainty ascribe to the "impersonal Being," the abstract personality, or the great first cause, that they formulate as a "Substitute for God."

To hear the man who concedes that his mind, like that of his fellow-men, is finite, conditioned, and limited, discoursing, with a plenitude of words and of emotions, concerning the infinit and the unconditioned, is far more common than edifying—far more frequent than satisfying. It is true that to ascribe to others superior wisdom, goodness, and power is a gracious act in any one, and it givs evidence of both humility and the possession of the attributes thus ascribed to real or ideal persons; but it neither establishes nor proves anything. The same may be said of the sentiment or inclination to ascribe to others evil qualities. Out of this trait in man has arisen all the gods and devils of Theism. Out of the heart and brain of humanity in every age and land hav thus proceeded all the gods, living, dead, or forgotten. The fetich of the savage, the God of the civilized man, the entity of the metaphysician, or the abstraction of the modern Unitarian or Liberal Theist hav all had this common origin.

When, therefore, will men learn to adore the real and the true, the substance rather than the shadow, the humanity that is father and mother of all the gods, in preference to the fantastic idols their hands or brains, or both, hav wrought?

Already recognizing, as idolatry beneath the dignity of cultured and noble souls, that cultus which bows down before gods of marble, wood, or brass, the Theists fail to see the idolatry of bowing to a god made by their imaginations when stirred by the nobler impulses of their hearts.

The sentiment and impulse of God-worship, whether it find its object in tangible idols or in those made of ideas, is one that must be recognized as normal, natural, and even essential to the early development of man; and as such no one can object to its indulgence so long as it is the best and highest form of the expression of the best sentiments and aspirations of the idolater.

But when a teacher of the most advanced school of Theism insists on retaining these ideal idols, and rejects the reality of which they are the shadows or Brocken specters, and fails to indicate his knowledge of their origin and significance, or his appreciation of their necessary abandonment by a higher culture and morality, it becomes the duty of anyone who knows a better truth to protest, in its name, against its perpetual rejection by good people who are really prepared for higher religious conceptions.

Brother Chadwick, whom I heard first when he preached in Albany twenty years ago, and later in the "Church of the Holy Turtle," in Brooklyn, has had a glimpse of the higher faith and religion, as shown in his sermon on "Substitutes for God," in this city. He has a smattering of the religion of humanity, and appreciates the fact that the adoration of the Great Being meets the wants of that heart-sentiment common to all which abscribes superior goodness, wisdom, and power to a superior being.

But, Brother Chadwick insists, and with reason it is conceded, that the mind needs a resting-place for a first cause, for a mystery, for an unknown originator, and for an undetermined power that humanity does not and cannot possess. Hence he postulates a theistic idol that he calls his god or his "substitute for God."

He does this after discoursing upon Positivism or the religion of humanity, because, as he claims, that religion stops short of its Great Being, the great but imperfect humanity,

Now, Brother Chadwick, like Brother McCosh, of Princeton College, in this displays his partial reading of Positivism, and hence falls into a grievous error. Most of the critics of Positivism hav read only Mrs. Martineau's translation and condensation of the Positiv philosophy, while but few hav read the original in full, or the principal work of that religion, the "Politique Positive," in which the religious aspect and dogmas of the religion of humanity are set forth.

In this will be found the very thing that Brother Chadwick deplores as missing. Besides the great being, Humanity, past, present, and future, there are found and demonstrated as objects of our adoration and contemplation, and as the resting-places of our minds in the quest of first causes and for the contemplation of the infinit, two other realities and ideals—(1) the grand milieu, or the infinit space of the universe about us, with its worlds, systems, and potencies, and (2) the grand fetich, or the earth itself, in all its grandeur and unknown powers, history, and potentialities—Great Ge, as the Greeks adored it—the rolling planet that is the origin, home, and possession of humanity.

In these three mighty conceptions Positivists find more than a "substitute for God," and scientists find more than a realization of theory and fable. In these the heart and brain find rest, hope, and aspiration. In them are the attributes and potencies of all the gods. They are no mysterious hypotheses—they are at once real and ideal.

And he who has once worshiped here, he who has tasted the joys of the religion that rests the ladder of its faith on the rock of the real and the known, climbs the rounds of the future of the individual and of the race with a sense of security that is to him a "peace that passeth all understanding."

I hav often wondered why the advanced Unitarians were not Positivists, but I hav as often reflected that the Roman Catholics hav more of the sentiment of the religion of humanity than the Unitarians, who approach more nearly to an intellectual conception of its sublime truths. Hence I conclude that until a man or a woman ceases to "hanker" after a "substitute for God," he or she had better stick to the old original idol; but when that ceases to satisfy their hearts let them turn to humanity, that true Great Being, and giv free rein to their love for the mysterious, the unknowable, the infinit, and the cause of things in the grand milieu and the grand fetich.

A "substitute" for idolatry does not cure us of the practice of idolatry. Gods made of ideas are equally idols with those made by rude or delicate hands. Humanity as the prototype, the archetype, and mother of all gods and entities, demands and commands our worship, our labor, and our love. Let us not deny her for unreal or ignoble things. Let us recognize our limitations, and do the things best suited to us as we are.

Familiar Talk on Several Topics.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The definit and gentlemanly manner in which you dispose of the question raised by several correspondents in discussing the subject of deity, immortality, and kindred topics meets my entire approbation. It is right and justice to all that THE TRUTH SEEKER should be a medium through which Liberals of all shades of opinion may express their ideas. But I question the propriety of those who are inclined to do so being allowed the privilege of carrying on a species of combativ controversy, especially on subjects that are not susceptible of definit proof. Much time and talent hav been used in the (as I think) vain effort to prove anything in regard to those subjects. Reason may teach a person that in the nature of science there is or there is not a living personal deity or a spirit of immortal life in man. But, "reasoning at every step he treads, man often mistakes his way." I confess that reason inclines me to the opinion that we are not immortal. And yet I see no reason why we may not reasonably cultivate a hope that there is a future life. To most people it givs pleasure, and need not be a source of controversy or cost to anyone. Therefore I think we should refrain from a discussion of the subject farther than is necessary to prove its fallacy.

A portion of our Materialist and spiritual friends are very positiv on these subjects, and I hav sometimes felt that they ask too much of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its readers.

The subject of temperance or the best manner of controling the traffic in intoxicating beverages is a legitimate one and of vast importance to all. And yet I often think while reading articles on that subject that a more temperate manner of discussing it is preferable. I profess to be a temperance man practically, but am not a prohibitionist in the sense that the word is generally used. The friends of prohibitory laws usually assume that prohibition will prohibit, but here in Michigan where we tried the Maine law nearly thirty years ago, and hav tried almost everything in the shape of liquor laws before and since, we found prohibition a failure because temperance people were inclined to rest on their laurels, when after an exciting political campaign their energy seemed expended; the law became practically a dead letter until politicians gave the thing a new turn; the old spirit would revive only to die out again when it was no longer a political issue. Our present license law I think a good one because it taxes the liquor traffic heavily, the proceeds being applied to contingent expenses of the township or municipality. If people will drink and become paupers, let them pay for it. Another feature in favor of the enforcement of this law above all others is that from the nature of the case liquor dealers are inclined to watch each other, making the law more easily enforced. But even this law is not generally enforced as it should be. And where is the remedy? From my experience I know of none, except a favorable, earnest, and permanent public sentiment that shall make the use of intoxicants unpopular and dishonorable. This is an important work that the Liberal press and all good people should unite in doing. But a trouble is that people are apt to become intemperate in advocating temperance. "You may persuade people to do right, but cannot compel them to." Discourage the use of intoxicating liquor at all times and places. Make saloons and all places where it is sold, and all devices for gambling, dishonorable resorts. Persuade young men in particular to hold themselvs aloof from all such places. Make the proprietors lonesome by staying away and seeking other and better places of amusement. And to the young I would say, Do not learn to drink, and you will not wish to.

The article in your issue of Feb. 17th, by Mr. Gantz, in reply to E. C. Walker, is written in so just and temperate a spirit that I feel like commending and calling particular attention to it, although my opinions more nearly coincide with the general theory of Mr. Walker's arguments.

Liberal papers, editorially as well as through their correspondents, sometimes allow themselvs to drift into a state that partakes more of enmity, strife, and a tendency to make use of sharp epithets rather than common-sense argument. The public are, or should be, more interested in learning truth and right in regard to any question than whether A or B shall get the better of the other in a personal controversy.

Liberals can do better than follow in the track that Bible religionists hav so long pursued—of intolerant, bigoted controversy. The world needs to outgrow more fully than Christian creeds and practices allow them to the intolerant spirit of cruelty and superstition that controled the Christian world during the wars of the Crusades, the terrible persecutions of the Inquisition, and finally, so far as physical acts were concerned, seemed to spend its expiring energy in banishing Baptists, whipping Quakers, and hanging witches in our own Puritan New England.

Still there is a great good work to be performed in eradicating the old spirit of intolerance that lingers among our people. And who but Liberals shall we look to for accomplishing so desirable an object? If we cannot accomplish a better work for humanity than Christianity has been and is doing, then we had better cease our efforts, for with all its faults and errors of belief Christianity teaches many good things. Liberals should not stop with becoming mere iconoclasts; they should teach, build up, and cause to grow a better system of morals, that shall induce people to be better citizens, more charitable, benevolent, temperate, honest in their dealings with each other, because it will be better and more conduciv to our enjoyment in this life, not because by so doing we expect to gain a future heaven or escape a hell of eternal torment, but because this life that we know we possess will be more enjoyable by so doing. And if there prove to be a future life we may expect to start the better there for having done well here.

Grattan, Mich., Feb. 22, 1883. C. CLOSE.

Our London Letter.

The friends of God having up to the present time such very small cause for congratulation in their efforts to extinguish the Freethinker, by their action against the leading spirits of that paper, imagin they can attain their object by prosecuting Henry Cattell for selling the Christmas number of the journal, containing, among other things, "A New Life of Christ," grotesquely illustrated, which is the blasphemous libel complained of. Mr. Cattell is a general newsagent, selling all kinds of literature besides Freethought, and it is difficult to know why he has been chosen as a possible victim to bigotry, out of hundreds of other agents who distribute the paper, unless the fact that he carries on business in the same premises until recently occupied by Mr. Watts, and acts as his publisher. It is presumed that his persecutors, knowing him to be a young man just starting in trade, and not burdened with an overwhelming amount of capital, and consequently not having the means of making any defense, fell upon what they thought would be an easy prey. The result, however, has yet to be seen. The case comes on for trial next week, and, whichever way it terminates, Freethought will gain something.

The Freethinker has been so well advertised by the orthodox that its sale has increased marvelously, far beyond the most sanguin hopes of its proprietor; and so much anxiety is displayed by some of the subscribers that six to twelve times the published price is weekly being offered for back numbers now out of print. The great objection to the paper seems to be that its tone is not high-class, but that it is written for the masses, and in very plain, unmistakable English. Therein lies the crime. Its intention is to open the eyes of the hewers of wood and drawers of water to the oppression exercised over their minds as well as bodies by the interested upholders of kingcraft and priestcraft, the two most useless crafts in the world.

There is a little incident I would like to mention here regarding Mr. Cattell. A short time back a stranger came into his shop and expressed a wish for him to discontinue selling the Freethinker, and as an inducement tendered him half a sovereign as a bribe. The offer was promptly refused, and the religious one, judging the Infidel by himself, concluded that he only refused because the money was not enough, and said it was all the money he had about him or he would make a higher bid. Upon receiving the reply that it was not a matter of money but of principle, he seemed utterly astonished, and retired without another word. The aggressiv Christian, as a rule, with very, very few exceptions, has no practical knowledge of principle.

While on the one hand we find orthodoxy busy in striving by any means in its power to extirpate Freethought, aided indirectly by members of the government; on the other, we hav the newspaper report of an interview between Lord Granville, and that arch-impostor, the leader of the Salvation Army, who wished to lay a complaint against the Swiss government for requesting his daughter, and other members of that noisy army, to leave the country, as they declined to refrain from creating disturbances in the public thoroughfares; he also complained that the Swiss considered them as worse characters than Jesuits, and were infamous enough to say that he was making money out of the business, which was quite untrue. As it is a matter of notoriety that Booth has made many thousands of pounds without rendering any account of how the funds hav been disbursed, I think he may safely boast of being the champion liar. By the time the bubble bursts his nest will hav been well feathered. His scheme for making a pile has succeeded by a dexterous use of the cant phrases of orthodoxy, and he effectually silenced his Christian opponents by thundering anathemas upon them in the name of Christ.

London, Feb. 22, 1883. J. D.

A Materialist's "Creed."

Art. I.—It is the most important thing on earth that all children, male and female, should be trained to be honest with self from infancy to maturity, instead of being taught to "pronounce reverently the names of Jesus and Mary the mother of God" (Cath. Mission Book).

Art. II.—They should be taught to be truthful and just to others, without which they cannot be honest with self.

Art. III.—That they get all the information they can about real things here, and the law of relation that one real thing bears to another, which is of vital interest to us all; and make the best use of it.

Art. IV.—That all be taught in their youth to honestly get their living, while they liv, at their own expense—the only foundation of true morality.

WHAT I DO NOT BELIEVE.

1. I do not believe that the first chapter of Genesis is true at all. I do not believe any living man can produce any good evidence that it is true. I can not believe, because there is no evidence.

2. I do not believe a "lord god" formed man (Gen. ii, 7); planted a garden of fruit; put man into it; prohibited one tree; then made woman of a rib; then a serpent—devil.

3. I do not believe God, or any god or lord god, ever said, "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." I do not believe any god would lie so. And I don't believe any man honest with himself ever believed it. The story is, they all ate, and all became exposed to an endless punishment in hell fire. The Lord God knew before they were made that they would eat, and that all children would be born sinners, totally depraved. He could not, or would not, make mankind all sinners until they got into the man-trap. And then the only begotten son of Lord God had to be "begotten by the Holy Ghost" on Mary, espoused to Joseph, to make her into "the mother of God," so they could, all together, save a few elected ones, and damn all the rest. "Esau hav I hated before the children were born or had done good or evil," that the purpose of an impartial Lord God, according to election, might stand (Rom. ix, 9, 25).

4. I do not believe there is a personal-being God in the universe whose character is such as described in the Christian Bible; nor that the Bible is divine; nor that there is a true text in it that men had not learned by experiment and observation before it was written.

5. God is represented as the worst—infinitly the worst—being that ever was described. The Lord God got man into the damnable trap, and drowned all the world because they were in the trap. He then got up Christianity, with a lazy, lying priesthood, to get them out of the trap. Seven hundred differing sects, all working hard at falsehood, to get the poor creatures out of the trap the Lord God made for all men! These priests, for a good salary, promis the world seven hundred different heavens if they will only believe and be baptized. Paul tells of a third heaven; Mohammed tells of the seventh heaven, where we can hav as many women as Solomon, eternally young and fair. I don't believe the Bible story about it.

6. I do not believe there is one word of truth in the first chapter of Matthew, or in the first two chapters of Luke, except in the first four verses of Luke, which prove it to be a forgery.

7. I do not believe that any living creature (nephesh Syriac khaiyah) ever had consciousness or knowledge after it was really dead. I hav offered fifty dollars for good evidence to prove such post-mortem knowledge or consciousness. I shall not believe without evidence. If the story in the first chapter of Genesis—that God made man male and female; blessed and directed them, and said, "Behold I hav given you every herb bearing seed which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed: to you it shall be for meat" (no prohibition, no rib, nor serpent, nor planting a garden)—if that chapter is true, the second chapter, after the third verse, must be false. What if both are false? Why, the Bible is false from beginning to end, and Christianity is the greatest priest-fabricated curse ever inflicted upon mankind, just as all history shows it to be. God—a priest-forged name; definition, "the cause of all existence personified." Jesus Christ—two titles of dignity untranslated; definition, "the anointed savior personified." Holy Ghost—atmosphere in motion; "wind of gods," personified. Heaven—the sky placified. Hell—heathen Tartarus placified. "Hell built on spite and heaven on pride." Devil—"opposer" personified. Soul—living creature (nephesh khaiyah). Immortal soul—not in the Bible. Angels, spirits, ghosts—air in motion; pneuma, to breathe, personified. There never were any real existences such as the foregoing ever known to mortal man since man has lived—all a fabrication fastened, with the hell-and-damnation fright, upon ignorant persons by self-seeking priests, who then pardon their sins to quiet them. All this is religion! JOSEPH NOYES.

"Junius Unmasked."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. Denslow owes me no apology for omitting to notice my name in connection with the discovery that Paine was Junius. I never said I was the discoverer of Junius, or the author of "Junius Unmasked." But on the other hand I never publicly announced the name of the author, hence many hav inferred that I wrote the book. The identification of Paine as Junius in January, 1872, was at once accepted by the then literary editor of the Chicago Times, Rev. E. C. Towne, with the proviso that Benjamin Franklin assisted Paine; and Mr. Towne copyrighted that superlativ discovery. But alas! he has gone back into the pulpit, and hidden his literary light under a bushel!

If Mr. Denslow owes anybody an apology, it is the author of "Junius Unmasked," for omitting to name the book from which he (Mr. Denslow) drew most of his argument. In his first essay on Thomas Paine he enumerates a series of works ascribing the authorship of Junius to Chatham, Pownall, Horne Tooke, Dr. Wilmot, Barre, Sackville, DeLolme, Lloyd, Burke, and Francis; "and finally an anonymous work, published in Washington, D. C., in 1872, attributing the authorship both of the Letters of Junius and of the Declaration of Independence to Thomas Paine."

At the time the book came out Mr. Andrews was in Washington, and I talked with him about it. I did not think, however, that he believed me to be the author. He read it and said he was convinced that Paine was Junius.

Mr. Denslow seems to hav got a new kink about the Rev. John Horne, afterward called Horne Tooke, having something to do with the preparation of Junius. I hav noted all the points in favor of Horne Tooke. There is no evidence that he knew Paine till about 1791, when he fathered a revolutionary address written by Paine. The hypothesis that Tooke was Junius cannot stand at all; and if he ever assisted Junius he did it just as John Wilkes did, by correspondence through the medium of the publisher Woodfall. Nobody could guess at the time who Junius was. Franklin, I believe, did not know Paine till 1774. He alone probably detected Junius, but never disclosed the secret.

Mr. Parton could write an excellent Life of Paine, but he declined the task several years ago when applied to by the Free Religious Association. I was then written to about it, and referred the applicants to the author of "Junius Unmasked." But he also declined, saying the time had not yet come. He however hopes before many years to undertake the work, which he says will require about five years' research in England, France, and America.

The discovery that Paine was a contributor to a weekly paper in London called The Crisis, in 1775 and 1776, was mine. The anonymous contributor "Casca" (Paine), like Junius, was unknown to the publisher. The Crisis advocated the cause of America, and I am half inclined to suspect that it was secretly started and supported by Franklin. Paine was in America when The Crisis was begun, Jan. 21, 1775; Franklin came over in May following; but I do not discover that Franklin and Paine met in America in 1775, and I believe that Paine returned secretly to England about the beginning of hostilities to get a supply of gunpowder. And I discover that from May to December, 1775, "Casca" was in England. But, whatever Paine was doing, you may be sure that Franklin knew it, for Paine and Franklin made this nation. W. H. BURR.

Death of D. M. Bennett, F. T. S.

From the Bombay, India, Theosophist.

We had but just begun to read for our review of the third volume of Mr. Bennett's "A Truth Seeker Around the World," when the Overland Mail brought us the news of his death—on the 6th of December, at the age of 64, after an illness of less than a week. This event, which will be so gladly hailed by all enemies of Freethought, will be the cause of sincere sorrow to every friend of religious agitation, the world over. For whether in full agreement with him or not, all will admit that he was a bold, brave thinker, the champion of free discussion, a hard-working, kindly disposed, intellectually activ, honest, religious agitator. One episode in his life, his imprisonment, which has been made the subject of reproach to him by the Christian majority, will be treasured in the memories of Freethinkers as his best claim to their respect. For as time wipes out the smirched record of the case, the men who prosecuted him, and the scheme by which he was haled to prison, will be despised; and as the fact that he was made a scapegoat by a cabal of powerful bigots for the whole Infidel movement in America, will come out clearly, many who are now prejudiced by the slanders of persons like Mr. Joseph Cook, will do justice to his memory. Mr. Bennett was a rough-and-tumble theological wrestler. He struck from the shoulder straight at the mark, without caring to pay compliments or pick the best phrases. There is therefore a flavor of coarseness in his controversial writings, and a tone of scorn or bitterness throughout. This seems a little strange at first sight, since his youth was passed among the Shakers, the quietest, most honest, prosaic, and inoffensiv community imaginable. But no doubt it was his very combativness of nature which drove him out from their bosom to fight the world and win his footing; he had that in him which revolted at the disciplinary restraints of the Shaker family, and he found his greatest happiness when in the thickest of the battle. During his public career as a leader of the Freethought party he was a prolific writer, and sent out tract after tract, pamphlet after pamphlet, book after book. It was a shower of sledge-hammer blows upon the crest of Christian theology. He was engaged in numerous controversies with clergymen and others of their party, a study of which givs the inquirer about all that can be said for or against the Christian religion. The history of his memorable voyage around the world in search of the truth about the creeds and practices of all the nations is fresh in the public mind. And the work is a marvel of cheapness and full of interesting facts. His unexpected and undesired appearance as a lecturer in Bombay and Ceylon was forced upon him by unforeseen exigencies at those points. His lecture at Galle and Colombo, contrasting Buddhism with Christianity, was so admired by our Singhalese brothers that they rendered it into their vernacular, and hundreds of copies are already circulated throughout the Island. It was the good fortune of the founders of our society to aid him to some extent in both India and Ceylon to make acquaintances and procure information pertinent to his researches. He stopped with us at Bombay, and in Ceylon was the guest of our Fellows. Particulars of all these are given in Vol. III. of the work above noted, and it is also there stated that he joined our Society. Now that he is dead (but not gone, since he livs in his works) we shall always look back to our intercourse with pleasure, and the good wishes we had for him shall pass to the faithful wife of whose devotion and self-sacrificing industry it made him so evidently happy to speak. He impressed us as being a thoroughly honest man, of decided opinions, which he was conscientiously trying to propagate, and as one who in the prosecution of that work was ready to undergo every necessary privation and run every risk. His untiring industry was shown in his utilizing every moment in either the accumulation of material or writing out his notes. The fact that while actually on tour around the world, flitting from land to land, he contrived to write four volumes 8vo of about 900 pages each, shows what a great literary worker he was. We doubt if a like feat was ever previously accomplished. And though thousands of sympathizers will mourn him at the West, we can assure them that if he had lived but a few years longer, until the Asiatic people had time to become acquainted with him, there would hav been tens of thousands among the Hindoos and Singhalese to bewail him as a true friend snatched away when they needed him most.

Government Lands.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 24th a letter from Mr. C. Bursee, asking for information in regard to government lands, healthfully located. For the benefit of Mr. Bursee, and others that may be wanting to get a home in a healthy climate where there is plenty of government land that is very good for farming and stock raising, and good, pure water, I would advise them to come to northwestern Nebraska; and for further particulars, send three-cent stamp to J. R. Buchanan, general passenger agent, Missouri Valley, Iowa, and get a pamphlet, "History of Northwestern Nebraska." W. H. DORRIS, Stuart, Neb.

The Murder of Witches in Massachusetts.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you please giv a statement in the next issue of our grand old defender of truth, showing proof—from whatever source obtainable—that Christians did kill and hang people in Massachusetts during colonial times, through the belief in witchcraft? It is here declared by a Christian apologist that it is all a farce and an Infidel "blow-off." I hav declared it to be a fact easily proven. Yours for Infidelity always,

Winchester, Ill., Feb. 22, 1883. J. B. TRAVERS.

If Mr. Travers's Christian doubts what is well known to everyone familiar with colonial history, how can he forgiv himself for believing the Bible, whose authorship and authenticity are of the cloudiest kind?

The accounts of the persecutions of witches by the Christian puritans can be found in any secular history, also in "Chandler's Criminal Trials." The best account, however, is Upham's "Salem Witchcraft," which has been epitomized in the "Champions of the Church," published at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. Witchcraft was once believed in by all the leading divines of colonial times, pre-eminent among whom was the celebrated divine, Cotton Mather, who said in one of his sermons that even the meeting-house was thronged with devils! John Wesley wrote that "giving up witchcraft is in effect giving up the Bible!"

Previous to 1692, when the frenzy known to historians as the Salem Witchcraft broke out, there were several trials and executions of alleged witches. We will giv a few, mostly from Upham's book as quoted in the "Champions of the Church," which can be verified by anyone having access to a library. They are as well-proven facts as any event in history. Indeed, they are admitted by all Christians of note:

Margaret Jones was executed as a witch in Boston on June 15, 1648, and in 1650 two more women were executed, one in Cambridge and the other in Dorchester. In 1659 two women were condemned and put to death in Hartford, Conn. A Mrs. Glover, an Irishwoman, of Boston, was accused of bewitching four children. Cotton Mather said of these babes that "at one time they would bark like dogs, and then again they would purr like cats. They would fly like geese, and be carried with incredible swiftness, having but just their toes now and then upon the ground, sometimes not once in twenty feet, and their arms waved like the wings of a bird." After this testimony there was nothing to do but execute the witch, which was done in the year of Mr. Mather's blessed lord and savior, Jesus Christ, 1688.

The Salem epidemic began at the home of the Rev. Samuel Parris, pastor of a church at that place. The witch "trials" were held in the church, and this Mr. Parris and Cotton Mather were conspicuous figures at them. Among those condemned and executed by order of these ecclesiastical courts we may mention the following: Elizabeth Howe, an estimable lady, whose husband was blind, and she a mother of several children, was accused of bewitching the girls aforesaid, and was thrown into prison. Her blind husband, led by one of the children, made a trip of several miles almost daily to visit her in her miserable cell, where she was so long confined without having committed a single wrong. She was at last executed by hanging.

Bridget Bishop, a married woman of good character, passed through a similar experience. She was hung.

George Jacobs, Sr., a tall, gray-headed old man, was one of the sufferers. He, too, was executed for, as was believed, being in league with the devil.

George Burroughs, a minister and a man of excellent character, was unfortunate enough to fall under the ban of the accusing girls whose attention it was thought had been directed to him by an interested party. He had previously resided in Salem, where he preached for some years, and had removed to what is now the state of Maine. But he was denounced by these bewitched girls, a legal process was issued for him, and he was sent for and brought to Salem, being compelled to leave his helpless family unprovided for, and with hardly a moment's notice. He was thrown into prison, brought before the court, and with no evidence save what the girls said of him, was convicted and sent to the gallows.

Giles Corey's case was a hard one. He was a sufferer under High Priest Parris and his female accusers. His wife had been complained of, and he, knowing her innocence, spoke strongly in her defense. He was arraigned before the same court, but could not be induced to make a plea either of guilty or not guilty. He was man of some property and he wished what he had to go to his children. He knew that if he confessed or pleaded guilty, his effects, in case of conviction, instead of going to his heirs, would be grabbed either by the church or the court which convicted him. He adhered to his resolution, confessing nothing, and making no plea though three times brought before the legal dignitaries. In consequence of the silence he maintained, the sentence of peine forte et dure, from the code of King James I., was passed upon him, which was, that he be remanded to his low, damp dungeon, to be there laid upon his back on the bare floor, naked for the most part, a board to be laid upon him, and weights enough piled on the board to nearly crush the life out of him, and to hav no sustenance, save on the first day three morsels of very poor bread, and on the second day three draughts of standing or stagnant water, the nearest to be found to the prison door, and this to be alternately his daily diet until he died. This horrible sentence was carried out, and the suffering that man passed through cannot be conceived. The agony of him who died upon the cross after three hours of exposure was trifling compared with the protracted agony endured by the aged Giles Corey, more than four score years old. It is said the last act in this diabolical tragedy was enacted in an open field near the prison. The wretched sufferer begged his executioners to increase the weights which were crushing him that his agonies might be ended. The hope, however, that he would yield and acknowledge his guilt, so that his property could be secured, induced them to not hurry his death. But he assured them that it was of no use to expect him to yield; that there could be but one way of ending the matter, and that they might as well pile on the rocks and hav the matter ended. Calef says that as his body yielded to the pressure, his tongue protruded from his mouth, and an official forced it back with his cane. This inhuman act is attributed to the pious Parris, who made himself so officious in the Salem trials and executions. Upham, in narrating this horrid cruelty, says: "For a person more than eighty-one years of age this must be allowed to hav been a marvelous exhibition of prowess; illustrating, as strongly as anything in human history, the power of a resolute will over the utmost pain and agony of body, and demonstrating that Giles Corey was a man of heroic nerve and a spirit that could not be subdued." This was a case of Christian persecution, where the recipient was, as has been the case in thousands of other instances, vastly superior, in everything that constitutes manhood, to the person who inflicted it.

The female accusers mentioned were a coterie of women, one of whom was the Rev. Parris's daughter, the others Ann Putnam, Mary Walcott, Mary Lewis, Elizabeth Hubbard, Susanna Sheldon, Mary Warren, Sarah Churchill, and others who had entered into a kind of conspiracy. They first took lessons at Parris's house in the arts of "palmistry," fortune-telling, etc., and became very expert in performing tricks and representing various characters. Ann Putnam, though younger than most of the others, was the leading spirit of the party, and was quick at repartee and in readily devising expedients in any emergency. They soon came to understand each other well, and acted in concert in pretending to be bewitched so as to astonish beholders. They claimed that they were choked, thrown into spasms and convulsions, and otherwise submitted to torture by persons in the neighborhood who had entered into compact with the devil; and upon such claims and pretensions large numbers of persons of all ages, and many of them of unblemished character, were arrested, thrown into prison, and subjected to an ex parte trial, semi-theological in character, before which the girls appeared as accusers, and declared that they had been and were tormented by the accused; and while the trials were in progress, and whenever they deemed it necessary, they went into convulsions and spasms, often falling to the floor, insisting that the accused parties were causing this distress and torture. Upon this kind of evidence multitudes of people were torn from their homes and sent to crowded, uncomfortable prisons to remain eight or ten months.

Ann Putnam afterward confessed that she had done a great wrong by these accusations, and although in her confession, when she was received to communion in the church in 1706, imputes all the blame to Satan, there is no doubt of her having been an ignorant tool in the hands of the ministers. The world was happily relieved of the presence of this estimable lady when she was thirty-six years of age.

On the 19th of July, 1692, there were executed Sarah Good, Sarah Wilds, Susanna Martin, and Rebecca Man. John Bradstreet was accused of having "afflicted" a dog. Bradstreet escaped by flight, but the dog was killed. Upham says that "the prisons of Salem, Ipswich, Boston, and Cambridge were crowded. Every man's life was at the mercy of every other man. Fear sat on every countenance; terror and distress were in all hearts; silence pervaded the streets; all who could, quit the country; business was at a stand (Salem Witchcraft, vol. ii, p. 250).

In speaking of the unjust trial and conviction of Rebecca Nurse, Upham says: "But nothing can extenuate the infamy that must forever rest upon the names of certain parties to the proceedings. Not to attempt here to measure the guilt of the accusing witnesses, it may be mentioned that it was the deliberate conviction of the family of Rebecca Nurse that Mr. Parris, more than all other persons, was responsible for her execution; whether by his officious activity in driving on the prosecution, or in preventing her reprieve, cannot be known. Of the prominent part taken by Mr. Noyes in the cruel treatment of this woman, there is no room for doubt. The records of the first church in Salem are darkened by the following entry: '1692, July 3.—After sacrament, the elders propounded to the church—and it was, by an unanimous vote, consented to—that our sister Nurse, being a convicted witch by the court, and condemned to die, should be excommunicated; which was accordingly done in the afternoon, she being present'" (Ibid, p. 290).

On the 22d of September, 1692, these Puritan Christians, who had fled from England to escape persecution, executed eight persons for being witches, namely, Martha Corey, Mary Easty, Alice Parker, Ann Pudeator, Margaret Scott, Wilmot Reed, Samuel Wardwell, and Mary Parker.

Cotton Mather tried afterward to escape the damning guilt of these murders, but he did not succeed. Of him Upham says:

"He aspired to be considered the leading champion of the church, and the most successful combatant against the satanic powers. He seems to hav longed for an opportunity to signalize himself in this particular kind of warfare; seized upon every occurrence that would admit of such a coloring to represent it as the result of diabolical agency; circulated in his numerous publications as many tales of witchcraft as he could collect throughout New and Old England, and repeatedly endeavored to get up cases of the kind in Boston. There is some ground for suspicion that he was instrumental in originating the fanaticism in Salem; at any rate, he took a leading part in fomenting it. And while there is evidence that he endeavored, after the delusion subsided, to escape the disgrace of having approved of the proceedings, and pretended to hav been in some measure opposed to them, it can be too clearly shown that he was secretly and cunningly endeavoring to renew them during the next year in his own parish in Boston."

And he adds, "The intimate connection of Dr. Mather and other prominent ministers with the witchcraft delusion brought a reproach upon the clergy from which they hav not yet recovered." The Rev. Parris was obliged to leave Salem, and he died in well-deserved obscurity and penury. The only vestiges left of him are the records of his after quarrel with his congregation and his inscription on the headstone, erected by him as he left the village forever, over the fresh grave of his wife. (Ibid, p. 515).

These are indisputable facts, and no one who cares for his reputation will deny them. As black as these crimes are, the church must bear the burden of their guilt. "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv" is the "divine" command, and who shall say these men were not as mercifnl as their God? They honestly believed he said it, and they but acted up to their convictions. The blood of these poor men and women is upon the head of the deity as well as upon their human executioners.

Washington a Deist, and Ingersoll, Jefferson, and Lincoln No Hypocrits.

The following queries are propounded by a friend in Maine:

SANDY POINT, Feb. 26, 283.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I appeal to you for a few points. Will you answer the following question through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER? What proof is there that Washington was an Infidel? The simple assertion in THE TRUTH SEEKER is enough for me, but not so with some of those with whom I hav to contend. These state that Jefferson, Lincoln, Ingersoll, and all others who are or were Infidels, forfeited all claims to honor and firmness of principle when they took the oath of office and kissed the Bible which they hold up to scorn.

I need not repeat anything further; you will see what I want, and will explain the oath and kissing business, I trust, in connection with the presidents mentioned, as well as with Col. Ingersoll. "Your greatest Infidels—if they were Infidels—" (they always put that in) "sacrifice their principles for the sake of office every time." This I refuted to the best of my ability, of course; but I am the only one here to speak out for Freethought, and, being all alone, the enemy, like the kid on the top of the house, are very brave and do a great amount of railing, which constitutes the strength of their argument. But the way I go for them in the name of my redeemer, D. M. Bennett, is a caution to all who try such weapons as that.

I know I am gaining ground, for I now find many to read Infidel works and tracts who a few weeks ago would do nothing of the kind. Others admit that portions of the Bible are not the word of God, and if all their admissions were put together there would not be enough of it left for a text for Jo Cook, who, like the God of theology, can make something out of nothing. Yours for truth, and Infidel with a "capital," GEORGE I. PERKINS.

A Deist is one who believes in a God but rejects the Bible as his revelation, and consequently is an Infidel. That Washington was a Deist there is the following conclusiv evidence:

Jefferson wrote in his journal in 1800, and which has been published in his works (vol. iv, p. 512) that he had it from Dr. Rush and Asa Green that the clergy addressed Washington on his departure from the government that it had been observed that he had never on any occasion said a word to the public which showed a belief in the Christian religion, and they so worded their address as to make him giv a public declaration of whether he was a Christian or not, but they were not successful. Jefferson writes: "The old fox was too cunning for them. He answered every article of their address particularly, except that which questioned him about his belief in Christianity, which he passed unnoticed." Gouverneur Morris, who was intimate with Washington, said the latter believed no more in that system (meaning Christianity) than he did himself (he was well known as an unbeliever).

The Rev. Dr. Wilson, for many years a pastor in the city of Albany, in a sermon which was printed in the Daily Advertiser of that city in 1829, said: "Washington was a man of valor; he was esteemed by the whole world as a great and good man, but he was not a professor of religion, or not at least until after he was president. When Congress sat in Philadelphia President Washington attended the Episcopal church. The rector, Dr. Abercrombie, has told me that on days when the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered Washington's custom was to rise just before the ceremony commenced and walk out of church. This became a subject of remark in the congregation as setting a bad example. At length the doctor undertook to speak of it, with a direct allusion to the president. Washington was heard afterward to remark that this was the first time a clergyman had thus preached to him, and that he would henceforth never trouble the doctor nor his congregations on such occasions. And ever after that upon communion days he absented himself from the church."

Robert Dale Owen afterward called upon Dr. Wilson in Albany and conversed with him upon the subject of his sermon. After reading over the above paragraph he said: "I indorse every word of it." In relating a conversation he had with Dr. Abercrombie upon Washington, he quoted the Doctor's remarks thus: "As I conceive that truth is truth, whether it be for us or against us, I will not conceal from you any information on this subject, even such as I hav not given to the public. Sir, Washington was a Deist. I hav perused every line that he ever gave to the public, and I do not find one expression in which he pledges himself as a believer in Christianity. I think any man who will candidly do as I hav done will come to the conclusion that he was a Deist and nothing more."

This was published in a "Discussion Between Bachelor and Owen," page 367.

There is nothing in Washington's words or writings which goes to show that he regarded Christianity as the divine religion. He was a reverent man, but not a sectarian. When president, a treaty with Tripoli was negotiated, in which it was expressly stated that "the government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion." If he had been a Christian he would hardly hav signed such a document without protest.

Jefferson was a Deist (as was Lincoln), and there is no inconsistency in a Deist saying "So help me God." If Jefferson and Lincoln kissed the Bible, they did the same as the electorial college declared the vote—in a perfunctory way, and as a matter of business. The one has about as much to do with making the president as the other has with his religious opinions. As for Ingersoll, he never held office, that we are aware of. He might hav been governor of Illinois had he been a hypocrit. He was prominently mentioned for the nomination by the Republican party—and a nomination was equivalent to an election—but it was noised about that he was an Infidel, and he was waited upon by a committee of politicians to ascertain his views. He told them frankly he was an Infidel, and he was dropped by the "party of moral ideas." Had he denied his opinions—been a Judas Iscariot for five minutes—he would hav been governor of Illnois. Referring to this, he says: "I was not a believer in the Bible, and I said so. I was not a Christian, and I said so. I was not willing to receive the support of any man under a false impression. I thought it better to be honestly beaten than to dishonestly succeed. He who dishonors himself for the sake of being honored by others, will find that two mistakes hav been made—one by himself, and the other by the people." These are grand sentiments, far superior in morality to anything Jesus ever said, and they are, too, the honest expression of the most brilliant man of our times. How many Christian politicians can truthfully say they hold them? Most people who talk so glibly about Ingersoll know very little about him—and what little they do know, they don't know for certain. We fail to see wherein Mr. Ingersoll sacrifiecd principle to office. To most people it would appear just the other way. The slur which the if they are Infidels implies is just in keeping with Christian ethics and courtesy. A man who embraces an unpopular cause is the one in whom honesty is nativ. Infidelity is not popular enough yet to attract hypocrits, while Christianity is and does; and those who imply doubt of others' honesty of belief may be the very ones who need watching themselvs.

THE more the Lawrence "Augustinian Fathers'" affairs are made public, the more the whole business looks like a deliberate swindle and theft on the part of the church. Their liabilities, by their own showing, are $567,300, of which $405,400 are owing to individual depositors, the most of whom are poor working people. To meet these liabilities the "Fathers" hav a "St. Mary's church and grounds," a "parochial residence," a "convent and grounds," an "immaculate conception church," and "immaculate conception residence," a church, a chapel, and a cemetery.

This property will not be sold to meet these debts if the church can help it. The priests borrowed the money as individuals and invested it for the church. When the pope was applied to by his deluded followers to pay Archbishop Purcell's colossal debt he told them to go to—anywhere but to him Probably the same answer will be made to these poor swindled men and women. Any man who was not born a fool knows that churches and convents and cemeteries do not pay dividends, that money put into a house which is never rented is virtually money sunk; yet these priests went on year after year begging from the poor people, working upon their superstitious fears to compel them to giv, and now they shield themselvs under the cloak of "business incapacity," keep what they hav got, and beg for more. If these men were not priests they would be behind the penitentiary bars, and should be now. The plea made for them that they did not intend to be dishonest is of no weight in the face of the facts. How did they ever expect to get this money back? Any man with a spoonful of brains could see they could not, and these men did see it. Year after year they paid interest on old deposits with new money left with them. It does not appear that they invested a dollar in any property that paid, and they promised a greater interest on deposits than they could get for money loaned. These men are not imbecils, and the only conclusion left is that they are knaves. Protestant papers, remembering their own defaulting cashiers and bank presidents, and other thieves, say, Be mild with them! But it is outrageous that such crimes can be committed and their perpetrators go unwhipped of justice simply because they are pious, Christian men. Pious scoundrels are the worst of all scoundrels, because they work upon the feelings and fears of those who, however deluded, are a thousand times more honest than the men who keep them ignorant that they may rob them.

MICHAEL E. MCGLOIN broke into the store of Louis Hanier on the night of Dec. 29, 1881, intent on robbery. He was detected by Mr. Hanier, upon which McGloin shot him.

Pasquale Majone, on Dec. 9, 1881, shot and killed his wife because she refused to obey him.

Both murderers were hanged in the Tombs yard in this city on Friday, the 9th, until they were dead. For days previous the priests were constant attendants upon them. They received absolution and the sacrament was admistered. Both of their victims died unprepared. McGloin and Majone are now in heaven, while the poor woman and Hanier are in hell; that is what the Christian religion teaches.

Out upon such a system. It is barbarous. And can any one really believe it?

DIED.—In Troy, Maine, February 2, 1883, Thomas Connor, aged sixty-seven. He had been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for nearly ten years, and died with the calm assurance that no vengeful God would rack him with burning pains forever. Happy is he who can die with no dread of the future!

Superstition the Curse of the World.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: What is superstition? It is faith in what is without the least proof or evidence. Now, sir, there is no proof or evidence that a God, a Christ, a Virgin Mary, a saint, an angel, a devil, a heaven, or a hell exists. Also, there is neither proof nor evidence that a specter, a spook, or disembodied spirit exists, or ever did, or ever will. All religions now existing on this globe hav nothing in them but superstition; that is the root and foundation of the whole thing, and it is on this false and deceitful fabric the priestcraft, kingcraft, churchcraft, and political tyranny, and hateful despotism hath taken its rise and fastened its fangs on the tame, thoughtless, and credulous multitudes, who, like so many swarms of slaves over the whole earth, bow and cringe in abject servility to these numerous gullible impostures, squandering millions of money for that which is not worth one cent. Almost daily some new scheme of pious fraud is springing into existence, for no other purpose but that of swindling the shoals of dupes who, like gudgeons, nibble at every cunning bait thrown out by the fishers for plunder. It is time some strong, honest voice should cry aloud, and spare not, when gross cant and vile superstitions go forth, with brazen front, and rake in the millions of the people's earnings to live in idleness, luxury, and conceited assumption and arrogance, and drive thousands yearly to asylums, worse than death. Sir, the above are facts incontrovertible, and I defy the whole swarms of santimonious frauds to successfully repel these mighty truths. They will and must stand as keen witnesses of steel against an unconsionable priesthood. What know any of these pious sharks about gods, devils, ghosts, or future states of existence? Nothing, nothing; no more than a wild ass; it's all bosh, nothing more; and why the masses of people cannot see through and through this thin scum of canting rascality is perfectly amazing! Onward, brother Infidels of the Materialistic caliber, and pour in hot shot, so that the corrupt and rotten systems of religious humbugs might be shattered and made to acknowledge that it's all a put up job to make money easy and keep the human mind in groveling darkness. Sir, let the honest truth shine forth from your pages, that those who are blinded by priestly superstition might behold the beauteous light of Freethought! Thos. Winter.

The Christian Champion Does Not Respond.

The following correspondence from the Pittsburgh Dispatch shows that however brave and confident of their cause the upholders of the theory of special creation are when their antagonists are a good way off, they are the veriest cowards when it comes to a personal encounter. Mr. Watts will lecture in Pittsburgh sometime during this month, when it is to be hoped some Christian with more confidence in his cause than Mr. Moore seems to possess will meet him in debate. We think he would be greatly pleased to take a scalp or two back to England with him as a trophy:

A CRY FOR MOORE.

To the Editors of the Dispatch: In your issue of December 10th, under the caption of "The Gospel of Dirt," I find the following:

"The theory of evolution is inconsistent with a belief in God, morality, accountability, or a future life. . . . I am weary of the pretentious insolence with which the ignorance of these sciolists airs itself. . . . I will agree to meet any gentleman of his 'ilk' at any time and place he may select, and discuss the question here mooted, which concerns the eternal well-being of all who liv. W. D. Moore.

"Pittsburgh, February 9, 1883."

To this defiant challenge of Mr. Moore, the following "acceptance" was sent:

99 Fifth avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., February 14, 1883.

W. D. Moore, Esq., Dear Sir: We notice in the Dispatch of the 10th inst, an article from your pen, in which you take decided grounds against the doctrin of evolution, and say:

"I will agree to meet any one of his 'ilk' at any time and place he may select, and discuss the question here mooted."

Presuming that you would not trifle with a question which "concerns the eternal well-being of all who liv," we accept your challenge, affirming the doctrin of evolution as more reasonable than that of special creation, as taught in the Bible, and would indicate two evenings in March, 1st and 2d, or 5th and 6th, as the time, any suitable hall in the city as the place, and Charles Watts, of England, as the gentleman to discuss the subject with you.

Hoping that these terms may meet your approbation and that at your earliest convenience we may hav the pleasure of meeting you or your representativ, to arrange the details of the debate, we remain Yours truly,

S. F. DeJones, President,

H. Hoover, Cor. Sec. P. L. L.

Failing to elicit a response from Mr. Moore, I called on him on the 21st inst. and was informed by that gentleman that a press of business had prevented his writing a reply until the previous day, and that as soon as he could copy said reply I should receive it. In fact, he would send it that same day.

Thinking Mr. Moore now meant business, I waited until the 26th inst., when the following communication was sent:

99 Fifth avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., February 26, 1883.

W. D. Moore, Esq., Dear Sir: I hav not as yet received the promised reply to our communication of the 14th inst. I am somewhat at a loss to know how to construe your silence. I trust I shall be spared the necessity of interpreting your tardiness in a light unfavorable to your prestige as a public debater. I will await the issue of to-morrow before doing so.

Yours truly, Harry Hoover,

Cor. Secretary Liberal League of Pittsburgh.

The only inference to be drawn from the foregoing correspondence and its results is that Mr. W. D. Moore, however valiant a champion of special creation he may be on paper, has not the moral courage to enter the arena when a "foeman worthy of his steel" takes up the gauntlet. If this surmise is correct, it is to be hoped that we shall hear no more of Moore.

Having invited Mr. Charles Watts to this city to lecture on evolution, we hereby challenge any advocate of special creation within the county of Allegheny, with a respectable following, to discuss the subject with him. We mean business, and hope that the advocates of special creation will embrace this opportunity to disprove evolution or cease throwing mud at Darwin. H. Hoover,

For the Pittsburgh Liberal League.

Prof. Denslow's Omissions.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav been greatly amazed at Prof. Denslow's omission to reply to the substance of Mr. Andrews's great speech at the Paine anniversary; but I am amused at another significant omission which I notice in his avoidance; to wit: in the first sentence of his communication on the question of "Who Unmasked Junius?" he says:

"Mr. Andrews's oration is full of a spirit of candor and large-hearted justice and appreciation, as well toward Paine, the American people, and Mr. Burr, as toward myself and also toward Jesus Christ," etc.

So far very good. Mr. Andrews is a candid and appreciativ gentleman, as everybody who knows him knows. But Prof. Denslow ought not to hav overlooked another object of the Pantarch's appreciation in his Paine anniversary speech, namely, "Antichrist." With that addition, full justice would hav been done to the Pantarch—that is to say, he appreciated Paine, the American people, Mr. Burr, Prof. Denslow, Jesus Christ, and "Antichrist." The full breadth of Universology cannot be felt with the latter gentleman omitted, T. B. W.

Answer to a Question for Financiers.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: A recent issue of the veritable Truth Seeker contains the following pertinent inquiry: "Why should not the government issue paper money and loan it to landowners at an interest not to exceed three per cent per annum to the amount of say half the land is worth, interest payable annually, principal payable at the will of the borrower provided interest is paid?" Inasmuch as this is by many deemed a very important inquiry, I offer the following definit answer: Because individuals and corporations, or, in other words, the bullionists and bankers, hav enjoyed the exclusiv privilege of issuing and loaning money for public and private use, from the birth of the nation up to the present time. The attention of A. W. Logan is called to the fact that when Secretary Chase proposed to coin and issue paper money, not to loan, but to carry on the expenses of the government, during the Rebellion, the monied oligarchy gav him to understand that if they were not allowed the privilege of loaning money for the use of the government and private parties, they would join the southerners, and use their money to overpower and break up the government. At a subsequent period, they found themselvs so firmly entrenched in their prerogativs that they issued their manifesto through the columns of the New York Tribune setting forth that "Congress cannot pass any law to overcome or resist their decisions." This is the true issue, the "irrepressible conflict," whether the government create money for public use, or create it for individuals, thus compelling every citizen who is engaged in any legitimate business to pay tribute (interest) to them. The money changers say it shall be created for their especial benefit. What do the people say? Charles Dutton.

Christ Far from Perfect.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I am greatly pleased at seeing on page 136 of The Truth Seeker a radical and strictly truthful analysis of the character of Jesus Christ, as portrayed in the Bible. I refer to the latter part of the excellent article, "The Old and New Testaments Must Go Together." Why so many pronounced Infidel and Atheistical writers and speakers, including even Thomas Paine and Col. Ingersoll, should so continually express their admiration of the moral character of Christ, has for a long time been beyond my comprehension. For many reasons in addition to those given in the article mentioned (which alone would be amply sufficient to condemn him) it seems evident that his character (so far as such a weak-minded person can be said to hav a character) was despicable to a degree seldom seen among the most degraded wretches of the present day. He habitually depreciated and opposed education, because he was an ignorant man himself; he forbade the accumulation of any of this world's goods whatever, because he was a pauper and likely to remain so. His insolent reply to his disciple who told him that his mother wished to speak with him—"Who is my mother?"—shows him to hav been one of the most heartless of men, as do also his refusal to allow those going wrong to be set right, and his expressed determination to speak in obscure language, or, as he said, parables, with the very object of being misunderstood—"that having ears, they should hear not; and having eyes, see not." I wish to disclaim any intention of exaggerating, even in the smallest degree, for I am confident that it does harm. I seriously do not believe that one convict out of one hundred in our prisons would express the heartless sentiments to which Christ, according to the Bible, so delighted to giv utterance. It is a satisfaction to me that our honored friend, D. M. Bennett, accorded entirely with this view, and I am glad to add that few things could, in my humble opinion, gratify him more than the able manner in which The Truth Seeker has been conducted since his death.

Herndon and Lincoln.—Was Lincoln a Spiritualist?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: At the conclusion of Mr. Herndon's somewhat lengthy and greatly to be valued article entitled "Lincoln's Religion," published in the January issue of the Liberal Age, and republished in last week's Truth Seeker, he remarks:

"Religiously Mr. Lincoln was an Infidel—a Liberal. In his philosophy he was a realist, as opposed to a Spiritualist. As a logician he lived on facts, figures, and principles. In short Mr. Lincoln was a material, practical man—a wise, long-headed, deep policied man, and of the very best, greatest and, noblest of mankind."

After reading the above, I cited to Mr. Herndon a circumstance that came to my knowledge during Mr. Lincoln's life-time which caused me to think that Mr. Lincoln did not, at least, disdain to casually investigate Spiritualism, even were it certain that he did not become a right-down believer; to which Mr. Herndon responds as follows:

"There is one idea in your letter which I wish to clear up and make plain, and it is this. I said that the tendency of Mr. Lincoln's general life was Materialistic—scientifically so; as opposed to Spiritualism, practically so. What is meant is that he was contradistinguished from Spiritualism by his Materialism in tendency. He was a Materialist, as opposed to a Spiritualist. I do not mean by that expression that he opposed Spiritualism by any means. The words which I used mark the man, define his general nature, and do not say that he held this opinion or that—this philosophy or that. Mr. Lincoln may hav been a Spiritualist; he may hav attended the meetings of such and tried to get all the facts, and the science of them. I do not deny this, nor do I affirm it. I know that Mr. Lincoln sought for facts—truth—principles, wherever to be found. Lincoln never dodged the truth, and never dispised a fact, come from any quarter of the globe whatever. I hav heard it introduced here by some one that Mr. Lincoln did occasionally attend the meetings of the Spiritualists, but to what end I cannot get at—cannot find out. If I knew the facts I would tell them to the world or perish." . . . "You may explain to the Spiritualists of the country what I mean by Mr. Lincoln's Materialism, as opposed to his Spiritualism. My language was simply to mark the nature of the man, and not to deny his Spiritualism, if such was the fact."

Dr. Andrews.

Honest with Himself and His Church.

Seth D. Bowker, formerly pastor of the First Baptist church of Kansas City, Mo., has resigned from the ministry because of his disbelief in the cardinal doctrins of Christianity, and his church has accepted his resignation, content to stand still itself and see him climb the hights alone. The minute a man begins to think and doubt he must leave the church. The "fold of Christ" is no home for a man intellectually alive and honest. Only dead brains and whited sepulchers find it congenial. Among the dogmas given up by Dr. Bowker are these, and it will be seen that they are the fundamental ones of the system. Without them Christianity is a pulseless corpse. He says:

First. I do not believe in the "fall of man," if that phrase is made to mean that man ever crossed a line beyond which he was worse, as the representativ of his race, than he was before. God permits no retrograde movements under his government.

Second. I do believe that man is the product of the creativ laws of God, and that he came upon this earth just in time to fall into the order of "evolution" as the most perfect specimen of God's work, and whatever of failure he has made in fulfilling the design of his creation is the result of present incompleteness in his development, rather than the result of his theological depravity with which orthodoxy has blamed him. I agree with Paul that "sin is the transgression of the law," and up to that period in a man's development where he knows that a certain act is opposed to the will of God there is no such thing as sin.

Third. I do not believe in the redemption of the human race by the blood of Christ, for the reason that there was no occasion for such redemption. If you can prove a "fall," then it is quite natural to expect a "redemption," but the one being a myth, the other becomes the same.

Fourth. I do not believe the Bible is any more the "Word of God" than any other instructiv book. Any book that is profitable and instructiv in matters of science or religion always carries with it God's approval. In this sense, and this only, is the Bible the "Word of God."

I do not believe in eternal damnation. Where in the order of God's work do we discover anything like the orthodox idea of "probation?" Does God put the planets on "probation" before he admits them into the order of development? Where do we behold him binding in the chains of "probation" any of the works of his hands. All who reason and open their eyes to facts know that the human body is man's most primitiv mode of existence, and who dare say that God's care for him drops at the death of his body?

Shall We Worship the Sun?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I see by The Truth Seeker of March 3d that my old friend J. H. Cook is a worshiper of the sun, and calls it the "true, real God." Now, the sun is a very fine thing, no doubt, and deserves to be well spoken of; but what it has done, or what it is, as compared with the rest of universal nature, that it deserves to be especially "looked up to," I do not understand. Still, if the sun is a special favorit of my friend Cook, I certainly hav no objection. The probability is, however, that after he has explored the universe outside of our solar system for a thousand years or so, he will come to the conclusion that our sun is a comparativly small affair, and so not worthy of worship as the "real, true God," and that will be hard on the sun, you know.

But my quarrel with my friend is not because he worships the sun, but because he calls it "God." He means it as a compliment, but I claim it is anything else than that! No term is offensiv except as it is associated in the mind with offensiv ideas or things. Belief in "God" is degrading, demoralizing, and heathenish. The idea of a God is the most pernicious ever cherished by superstitious and ignorant humanity. So the term God is the most offensiv in the English language.

Now why does my friend, who regards the idea of a God with as much repugnance as do I, seek to dignify the term by lugging it into respectable company? If we would get the degrading idea of God out of the minds of men, we must make the term odious by which the idea has by common consent been described. Francis Barry.

"Answers to Christian Questions and Arguments."

This is one of the last and best books written by our Bennett, and every reader of The Truth Seeker must want a copy of it for this reason if for no other. It is, as it were, a voice from his very grave, coming back to us from its silent depths, and consequently every argument seems to hav a double force for us who hav so loved and venerated our leader, guide, and friend.

It is a complete refutation of every claim that Christianity makes as to being an original, truthful, happifying, or humanizing religion. It is an epitome of all the best arguments against the dominant mythology that can be collected, and it contains invaluable ammunition for anyone who wishes to carry on an argument with a Christian friend or opponent. It is written in Bennett's most cordial, kind, and genial manner, and though forcible, strong, caustic, and convincing, it is tempered by that beautiful spirit of charity and benevolence of feeling that always characterized all that came from his pen. Strong in his defense of truth and right, but always willing to giv an opponent fair play, and equal justice, few men ever won more golden laurels in debate than D. M. Bennett.

In reply to Mr. Whitehead's question, "If your work was already accomplished, would you not hav despoiled man of all those virtues which make life worth living?" he says: "To this the answer is emphatically and forever, 'No.' There is no virtue in man's believing senseless fables and dreams to be divine truths. There is no virtue in believing falsehood. There is no merit in accepting vagaries and inventions as truth and reality. A sham is a sham, and though repeated millions of times it is still a sham, and can never be anything else. Virtue consists in truth, and in disseminating it among men. Real truth is in nature and the universe, not in idle fables and dreams, the inventions of a designing, wily class of men, who liv by playing upon the fears of credulous dupes. Man is never filled with virtue by believing a lie, and is never despoiled of virtue by being taught the truth. The great mistake of all religions based upon supernaturalism is their falseness. The foundation being false they cannot be otherwise than false. Let it be repeated, then, there is no virtue in a falsehood, though a thousand times repeated; there is no virtue in believing a falsehood."

The good old man is gone, but his incontrovertible utterances are left us as a valuable and lasting legacy, and I hope Liberals will buy and circulate them all over the land. If you hav a pious friend to whom you wish to show the dark and blasting character of the Christian religion, and the beautiful and blessed truths of Liberalism, send him this twenty-five cent volume of Bennett's "Answers to Christian Questions," and the work is done. If for every one hundred dollars poured into the treasury of the church we could send out just barely one of these little truth tellers, we should completely neutralize the larger sum, because facts are fadeless and eternal, while fiction is shadowy and ephemeral.

In losing Bennett Liberalism has lost its strongest and stanchest defender, its greatest and grandest leader, and its most indefatigable worker. Few men possessed such a glorious faculty of universally pleasing and charming. No unprejudiced person can pick up one of his books and read a page or two at random therein and not feel that sympathy and nearness of heart which won for him so many worshiping friends and loving admirers.

"Him all wait for, him all yield up to, his word is decisiv and final,
Him they accept, in him lave, in him perceive themselvs as amid light,
Him they immerse and he immerses them."

Liberalism's Hope in Germany.

From the Hebrew Leader.

The party of progress in Germany pins all its hopes upon the crown prince of Germany, who is a Liberal in religion and whose wife belongs to the ethical school of theologians, and is strong minded at that. If the prince is quite prepared to seize upon the progressiv issues of the age, when the retrogressiv old emperor dies, he will prolong his dynasty, and this is his only hope of wearing a peaceful crown. If not, Germany will again be divided up into its former principalities or many more, or else a republic will be built up on the ruins of the Hohenzollern dynasty. Bismarck and the aristocracy are trying to build up and revive the old feudal state of the medieval German empire, but it is entirely too late to do this successfully. Bismarck has already succeeded in promoting democratic and social views in the lower and middle classes, which are now ripe for revolution. The aristocrats believe in a military absolutism, but the people are ready to demand the rights of enjoying the fruits of their own labors, and the attempt to force absolutism only hastens the day of freedom. Royalty, nobility, and the priesthood only survive on sufferance. Southern Germany is republican; so are Alsace and Lorraine, which take their key-note from France. In any event, the Jewish population of Germany can look forward to toleration on the death of the present emperor. The crown prince is known to be friendly to the Jews, and if his throne should be torn down and a republic set up, universal toleration would, of course, be the rule. The fanatics hav their day now, but it is a short day at best; and freedom of conscience may be delayed, but will be the rule in the end.

Religion Saved.

From Music and the Drama.

Religion and morality are still safe! When Salmi Morse on Saturday night was arrested for giving a free rehearsal of a religious spectacle in his house on Twenty-third street, on Twenty-seventh street, four blocks distant, herds of abandoned women rampaged on the sidewalk, tugging at men's coat collars, soliciting them, and by their acts and language rendering it impossible for a lady to pass. When Morse stood on Sunday at the bar of the police court, several thousand saloons were selling rum in violation of the law, and in one-half of these that rum was cheap rank poison. The religious world now feels safe, though it has just been told how the whole machinery of the Methodist Episcopal church has been used to push the sale of stock in a bogus mine, while one of its brightest lights was "let in on the ground floor" at $5 per share, and secured against loss for lending his name and influence to the swindle.

Religion and the Bible are safe, because Salmi Morse has been prevented from giving the "Passion Play," while the Augustinian Society, a Massachusetts bank managed by priests, has just swindled 700 poor female mill operativs out of half a million. Religion and the Bible are safe, because Salmi Morse has been prevented from giving the "Passion Play," while Assistant District Attorney O'Byrne recommends for license a notorious den kept by Eliza Parret and known as "The French Madam's," said Eliza Parret having been smart enough to employ the firm of O'Byrne and Stewart as her attorneys.

A religious spectacle, respectful and devout in its intent and motiv, is forbidden in a man's own house, while scores of vile dens in the town are open to boys of twelve or fifteen years. The sanctity of the Bible is under the protection of Captain Williams's club, and any amount of tall swearing is slobbered over its worn and greasy cover at the courts major and minor, yet out rush the lies like an Ohio flood.

Millionairism, Billionairism, Monopoly, and Pulpit—Endorsed—Greed, sank comfortably in their cushioned front pew on Sunday and looked complacently at a high salaried minister torturing and twisting the precepts of a Nazarene without cash, without land, without a house, without a bank account, without credit "on 'Change," without a carriage, without a Long Branch cottage—precepts twisted and sugar-coated with unintelligible generalities and capsuled with inferred excuses for the heaping up of gold, to make them slip all the easier down the bond-burdened Crœsus's throat, while he, good man, dreamt of next week's "operations" in the line of respectable and legitimate swindling and gathering of more land, houses, and railroads into his insatiate maw.

Religion is safe! The Bible shall not be profaned! The law and Captain Williams did it with his little club.

The Bible is protected by the law and wife murder gets four years in state's prison.

The Bible is safe, and the penitentiary on Blackwell's Island is full of boys, and four thousand more wander about the city's streets, untrained, uncared for, arrested for thieving at the rate of four per day and growing up to become McGloins [a murderer hanged on Friday, the 9th, in this city]. "Consistency thou art not a jewel," but a myth!

The pious Crœsus rests easier on his downy pillow, and eats his strawberries at fifty cents apiece with a sanctimonious relish. The curse of the Passion Play is happily averted, and church-going Dives is still in receipt of his rent for houses of well-known disrepute. Allah Achbar! The Bible is still safe! Trinity, with its remunerativ tenement houses smiling benignly on Wall street, is safe! Religion and the Bible are vindicated and under the protection of the law and Captain Williams. Arabi Bey.

Consolation for the "Christian Advocate."

From the Pittsburgh Leader.

The Liberal League will take comfort, we suspect, out of the religious statistics of the Western penitentiary. As given in the biennial report of the institution yesterday, the figures show among the inmates sixty Methodists, fifty-eight Catholics, thirty Presbyterians, twenty-two Lutherans, nineteen Baptists, nine Episcopalians, three Universalists, two Hebrews, seven of other religious beliefs, and twenty without any religious belief. Summing these figures up, we hav as one result two hundred and ten convicts with a religion, as against only twenty without any. Or, carrying the Universalists, Unitarians, Jews, etc., over to the other side, the figures would show one hundred and ninety-eight religious convicts to thirty heterodox ones. Still further analyzing the matter, we find that there are one hundred and forty Evangelical Protestants in the number against seventy Jews, Catholics, Infidels, and all the rest put together! We look to see President DeJones of the League "point with pride" next Sunday to the fewness of the Infidel elect that are now expiating their guilt behind those frowning prison walls; and if our Methodist brethren do not clamor for the chaplainship of the institution at their next conference they will be blind to their rights. As for the Presbyterians, General Cass's biting jest, when told that an Episcopalian chaplain had been removed, and Mr. Milligan been appointed in his place, some years ago, will no longer apply. Cass said that the change was quite right, because he always did think the parson should be of the same sect as the majority of the congregation. But as the Presbyterians only number thirty now over there, Milligan would hav to step down and out by this rule, and giv way to a presiding elder, assisted by a priest.

The "Old Gentleman" Growls.

From the Grand Rapids Times.

I am tired of reading in the newspapers of disasters on sea and land. It seems that we hav fallen upon an era of calamity, such as the world has not been afflicted with for years. The columns of the daily press groan with the ghastly record of death from fire and flood, and wreck and other forms of disaster. The list is a long and sickening one, and its victims are drawn from the ranks of the just and the unjust with apparent indiscrimination. I hav about arrived at the conclusion that we liv in a third-rate, cheap, one-horse sort of a world, any how. Our pleasures hav no permanence, but our sorrows are forever with us. From the cradle to the grave is a continual round of pain and vicissitudes—a minimum of joy, and a maximum of misery. We are roasted in summer and frozen in winter; malarial afflictions are succeeded by colds and catarrh. Disease lies in ambush everywhere to trap the unwary—and the wary too, for that matter. And over all broods the ever-present certainty of death. We are often reminded by pulpiteers and other sanctimonious drivelers, of the "merciful providence" which is said to watch over the race, and preserve it from harm. The facts don't warrant the conclusion. Only the utmost vigilance in observing certain physical requisits enables a sound man to escape the dangers which beset him, and exist to the natural limit of his years. We are told that the conditions are favorable for the development and continuance of life on this planet. The fact that life has existed and extended in spite of all obstacles, appears to favor this hypothesis; but to an impartial observer it appears that, if the creativ power designed to make the environment of human life as unfavorable and disagreeable as possible, and still leave margin enough to insure the continuance of the race, the result is a complete success. The continuance of the race should not be attributed so much to favorable environment as to that baleful provision which draws men and women together with irresistible attraction, and furnishes fresh victims for the carnival of destruction. And even this passion often leads those who share it to slay one another—though the balance is of course on the side of increase. With a full knowledge of all the troubles on earth, there are those so cruel as to threaten us with another hell beyond—as if we didn't get a great deal more of that sort of thing here than we deserve. I can't swallow such teaching, and couldn't digest it, even were I able to gulp it down. But, as I am beginning to get out of the frying-pan of metaphysics into the fire of theology, I will stop right here. Old Gentleman.

Letters from Friends.

UVALDE, Feb. 18, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Having seen a copy of your paper today I was so well pleased with it as to become induced to subscribe for it. The copy I hav now is September, 1882, showing the subscription to be $3.00 per year, but was told by one of your subscribers that the subscription was only $2.50 now. I am the only one of a family of nine who does not belong to the Second Advent church. My brother says I am lost. I am a Texas cowboy.

I expect I am the only subscriber for your paper in this county, but I think I will send you some more subscribers from this office soon. I think our town has quite a hard name abroad, and probably your paper will do as much good in the way of reformation as so many preachers of different denominations.

I hav only been in this county twenty-two years, and hav seen the red man several times when I didn't want to see him.

Hoping to see another copy of your paper soon, I remain, Respectfully yours, E. L. DOWNS.

WEATHERFORD, Feb. 20, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find post-office order for $1.50 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I find that I can't get along without it; and you may now consider me a lifetime subscriber, and I will endeavor to keep my subscription paid in advance, although the stamps are but few in this part of the moral vinyard.

I think every true Liberal should lend a helping hand to carry on the good work that THE TRUTH SEEKER so ably advocates, in showing up the priestly frauds and superstitions that they impose on the unthinking people. And I can say to you that the Freethought movement is progressing in this portion of Texas. There are a few of us that hav come to the front, and are outspoken; and we hope to be able in a short time to organize a Liberal League. Then we hope the good work will begin in the right way.

As this is the first you hav had from me since the death of Mr. Bennett, I will tender my heartfelt sympathy to his bereaved friends. The Liberals of this community deeply mourn the loss of the great and good man, who gave his life and suffered so much for the cause of mental freedom. He is gone, but his good work will liv, and future generations will honor the name of D. M. Bennett; for he was the greatest hero of his age, and did more for the good of the human race than any one in his time, in helping to free his race from the bonds of superstition. His works are bound to liv for all time to come; and when his persecutors are forgotten, he will be honored.

I hav said more than I intended, and will close by adding that I hope the good work will continue until every priestly fraud is exposed.

Yours for truth and justice, the only true worship,
D. O. SULLIVAN.

FARLINVILLE, March. 1, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is to me a source of pleasure—the gratification of one of the needs of my nature, one of the things of my nature, one of the things that make life more bearable; and when the terrible announcement of Mr. Bennett's death was made the questson arose in my mind, Shall we lose our paper? Will it degenerate?

The last few numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav answered these questions very satisfactorily to me and all your readers that I know. I believe it is more interesting and better conducted than ever before, and if Spiritualism be true, and Mr. Bennett has a conscious existence, then I take the improvement in the paper as an evidence that he still takes an interest in the work he was engaged in while he was with us. Be that as it may, you are making it a success.

Inclosed you will find an oration delivered at the grave of a Liberal by a young lawyer, and although it may not equal an effort of Col. Ingersoll, it certainly has merit and is, I think, worthy of a place in your paper. If there is anything more needed than another by Liberals it is an intelligent person who has the courage to step to the front and make a few appropriate remarks at the grave of one who has dared to die without faith in Christ. Christians never lose an opportunity to cite instances of Liberals accepting the services of a minister either in their last sickness, or by their friends after death.

Asserting that man's necessity is God's opportunity, they penetrate unbidden into the chamber of death when disease has done its worst, and in our dire extremity, in the presence of weeping and disconsolate friends, they get our assent to sentiments which they could not obtain under any other circumstances, and when we hav in our last moments self-control and presence of mind sufficient to tell them, like the immortal Paine, that we do not need their services, they renew the attack on our friends and relations as soon as we are dead, and it often happens that the only alternativ left our friends is to accept their services or to bury us like a dog without a word being said.

This is the condition we were in a few months ago here. A lady died who was a decided Liberal. We buried her without anything being said more than that some one thanked the crowd for their sympathy. Then another one died, but protesting to the last against any of the solemn mockery being performed at her funeral.

Then it was that this man came forward and nobly did he perform his part. In a week he was agaid called to speak words of consolation at the grave of a brother Liberal. Then a Liberal sister passed into the great silence, and this I send you is his third effort. But it has produced a social earthquake here. The ministers and the "unco guid" hav worn themselvs out seeking for words to express their indignation, and in proving from scripture and the traditions of the elders how wicked and blasphemous it is for anyone to officiate at a funeral who is not a believer in the Bible and the Thirty-nine Articles. But one after another the strongholds of superstition giv way before the increasing and advancing hosts of Liberalism.

"Tho' hearts brood o'er the past, our eyes
With smiling futures glisten;
For lo! our day bursts up the skies;
Lean out your souls and listen—
The world rolls Freedom's radiant way,
And ripens with her sorrow.
. . . . . .
We'll sow the golden grain to-day,
The harvest comes to-morrow."

Hopefully yours, H. E. DEWEY.

EUREKA, MICH., Feb. 11, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Again I come up with my contribution to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am a little later than usual this time, but just as ready and willing as ever to cast in my mite to help on the truth and the right. D. M. Bennett is no more, but his soul, his words and works, go marching on. I and mine hav realized his loss with all other truth seekers, and our hopes for the good cause are now growing brighter. We hope soon to see THE TRUTH SEEKER established on a cash basis equal to its merits and the great good it has done and is doing. In the course of a year I cast my eyes over many papers, and they all seem weak and insipid beside THE TRUTH SEEKER. They seem to think their readers are all Christians, and that they must talk Christian or they will be lost. They however are very much mistaken; for the Christian does not want all Christianity. They want to see a little wickedness once in a while in a newspaper. And they would like to see a paper toned up by a little downright Infidelity—just enough to start a new thought or two. The rose that all are praising becomes an odious or an odorless rose after a while. Thus far I had written when I received your postal card informing me that my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER had expired, etc. So you see I hav not forgotten you, and was writting a little letter to send you with the money. I should hav done so before, but hav been very busv this winter, and sometimes sick and tired so that I could not attend to it. I want THE TRUTH SEEKER and calculate to want it about as long as I shall want any paper. I shall drop all other papers before I do that. There are so many sound and well written articles and letters in it written by so many sound and intelligent persons, it is health and peace to read it. So herein find the money for another year's subscription. I send you $5—$2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, $1 for the Bennett monument; $1 for Mrs. Bennett; the rest for a Webster's Dictionary, 50,000 words, 25 cents; and a few "Jewish Jehovahs."

Yours truly, P. S. TITUS.

YPSILANTI, February 27, 106.

MR. EDITOR: Excuse me for the date (106) as above. Until a period shall be agreed upon from which to start I think the birth of these United States is good enough for me.

Let me say briefly, without identifying persons, that there is evidence of great intolerance cropping out from many who profess to be Liberals, which is regretted. Such should not complain of the Christians and the churches for some of their persecutions for opinion's sake. One case out of very many will be sufficient to convey my object. Take Brother Walker's article on the natural requirements of mankind, that is, what they desire to eat or drink, or wherewithal they shall be clothed.

The reasonings therein are cogent, and every attempt thus far to overthrow his truths with sophistry, misrepresentations, or misunderstanding, in my opinion, has utterly failed. If critics make it clear that man has not the right to supply his natural wants, then load up and fire away, but don't spit against the wind, for that will afford meager satisfaction.

Now, friends, since we cannot be of one mind upon all subjects, let every issue except that which concerns all be suspended, and engage against the common enemies of mankind, which are a mythical Bible, a false religion, despicable bigotry, and intolerable persecutions; and let us endeavor to promulgate and establish truth and friendship as far as in us lies.

Mr. Miller asks for information about the constellations and signs of zodiac. Permit me to reply. Many centuries ago, perhaps in prehistoric times, the pagans, as they supposed, ascertained that the sun traveled around the earth in 365 days, nearly. (It would hav been heresy to suppose the earth moved around the sun.) They discovered also that the moon traveled around the earth a fraction over twelve times in the same period of time, and therefore they divided the period into twelve moons or months. They also divided the clusters of stars along the pathway of the sun (which they named the Ecliptic) into twelve groups or constellations, and gav them significant names, Aries, Taurus, Gemini, etc.

The sun and earth are in opposition on the ecliptic.

Now, on the 5th March, the sun will be in the center of Virgo, and the earth will be in the center of Pisces. On the 20th March, the sun will enter Leo and the earth will enter Aries.

The signs as given in the almanac denote the place of the moon. The moon passes through the twelve signs in about twenty-seven and a half days, and through one sign in a fraction over two days. The object of the human form was to illustrate the subject to the ignorant people. Very ingenious. Common sense and common observation teach us that the situation of the moon in the ecliptic has no influence over things of this earth. Long ago, when the priests held all the knowledge, they predicted what disease would prevail by the moon, if in the head, disease of the brain, etc.

Very truly, J. W. BABBITT, M.D.

A PRAYER.

COLUMBUS, February 18, 283.

O thou glorious, irrepressible, and immortal TRUTH SEEKER, we realize that it is through thy unbounded mercy and forbearance that we hav not been cut off on account of our short-comings, and that we are still on praying ground and interceding terms with thee, whom we revere with unspeakable gladness of heart, for thou hast been a lamp to our feet and a guide to our pathway out of the wilderness of intellectual damnation into the cultivated regions of science, our only savior, the fairest among ten thousand and the one altogether lovely. He is the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley, blooming more and more unto the perfect day, and shedding his aromatic fragrance upon all who are fortunate enough to come within the comforting influence of his holy spirit, under whose inspiration and thy leadership we are enabled to rejoice in our conflict with the devil of ignorance. Ere thou didst manifest thyself unto us, gracious TRUTH SEEKER, yea, even before we were cognizant of thy existence, our benighted and yearning spirit, writhing under its load of unutterable disgust, had begun to explore the desert of hell prepared for the devil and his angels by designing Christian priests; but thou didst prove a welcome oasis to our thirsty and ever-waiting soul, which even now reverts with ecstatic remembrance to its first draught from thy fountain of knowledge, wherein thou didst ridicule the science of an old Jew book for the benefit of a deluded individual by the name of Humphrey.

We thank thee, honored guest, for the continuation of thy weekly visits, and we deeply sympathize with thee for the irreparable loss of thy heroic founder, who was a host in himself, and fought, bled, and died, that we might cut our own intellectual vine and fig-tree without being molested or any one daring to make us afraid. We acknowledge his departure as the saddest bereavement we hav ever experienced in the death of any one whom we hav never had the opportunity of meeting vis a vis. We sincerely regret that the present generation, because of their stubborn willingness to foster the idle traditions of their fathers, are unable to fully appreciate the philanthropic labors of the lamented and immortal D. M. Bennett, who lived a hundred years too soon for the comfort of his days; but posterity will do him justice; his name is destined to go thundering down the ages as that of a man who reared his own monument and wrote his own epitaph. Do thou, O messenger of living light, record his deeds in characters of fire, and publish them not only from Dan to Beersheba, and from Egypt to the river of Hamath, but let his praise be heralded even to the uttermost parts of the earth, that coming generations may cherish his memory as ardently as it is enshrined in the hearts of his surviving friends, who find a morsel of consolation in the reflection that he now rests quietly where the sleuth-hounds of superstition can bay his track no more. We are willing to confess that we entertained serious apprehensions for thy future prosperity, but we rejoice to make the discovery that we still hav in thee an advocate fully able to continue the prosecution of our cause for the defense of liberty in the sacred halls of justice, and that we hav a successor of our late lamented general-in-chief fully equal to every emergency who will bring us off more than conquerors in our warfare with the legions of bigotry and superstition. May thy career be as honorable and brilliant in the future as it has been glorious and successful in the past. Let thine enemies feel the strength of thine arm, and let thy right hand find out them that hate thee. Their fruit shalt thou root out of the earth and their seed from among the children of men, for they intended mischief against thee, and imagined such a device as they were not able to perform. Therefore shalt thou put them to flight, and the strings of thy bow shalt thou make ready against the face of them. Thy counsels are undefiled, converting the soul; thy testimony is sure, and giveth wisdom unto the simple; thy statutes are right, and rejoice the heart; thy commandments are pure, and giv light unto the eyes; more to be desired are they than fine gold, yea, than much fine gold, sweeter also than the honey and the honeycomb; moreover, by them is thy servant taught, and in keeping of them there is great reward; even the wild asses, if they choose, may come and drink from the stream of thy wisdom. (Selah.)

Praise Truth, from which all blessings flow;
Praise it, ye Seekers here below;
Praise it—on earth the conquering host
Of father, son, and holy ghost.

And now may the graceful spirit of Liberalism, the unanimous support of those who cherish the love of liberty in their hearts, the communion and fellowship of the good, the true, the beautiful abide with thee evermore. Amen. J. J. BURDGE.

A SERMON BY J. PETTY.

LACROSSE.

MY CHRISTIAN FRIENDS: You will find my text in the first chapter and the first verse of the gospel according to St. John, in the so-called Holy Scriptures—"In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God."

Well, my Christian hearers, the trouble is there never was a beginning. It was not 6,000, nor was it 16,000, nor was it 1,000,000 years ago, nor did it ever begin at all. But the text says, "In the beginning was God, and the word was, and that word was with God and was God in the beginning." Then there was a beginning, and at that time of the beginning there was a word, and that word was not only with but was God. Now, my Christian friends, I want you to open your eyes and ears. "All things were made by God, and without God there was nothing made that was made." Open your eyes and ears a little wider yet. "In God there was life; and the life was the light of men." Now, my good Christian friends, God began a beginning. God is a word. The word made all things. Now, my good hearers, the word is the light, and the light is the life of man. The light is the life, the word, and God are all the same, and the life the light of man. There are representations here in plenty. In the beginning was the word, and a word was God, and the light was God, and the life was the light of man, and by God the light was made all things. What a great and strange light that was! "Made all things that were made." That implies a doubt. The light made the world, and the world knew not the light. The light was the word. The word was made flesh, and dwelt among men. The flesh was the son; the son was Jesus. Jesus was the father. "He that hath seen me hath seen the father." Yet, "No man hath seen God at any time."

Well, my good Christian friends, who and what is this God? "God is omnipotent, omnipresent, infinit, and eternal." So says the Holy Scriptures, and so say our great ones. One attribute is enough. God, then, infinit. Infinit includes all. Two infinits cannot exist at the same time, nor can two things occupy the same space at the same time. If God is the infinit he must be the universe and all. Then there is no finite. If infinit exists this covers the whole ground. Then he did not begin a beginning. He being all things he could not create more. Full, unlimited, no end. I say he did not begin. The word could not be the infinit with God, also the infinit. He says, "I and my father are one." Jesus Christ is his father, and his father makes or creates him flesh.

Now a thing can't be a thing, and some other thing. God can't make himself. While he is himself he is all. In order for him to make himself, the all must cease to giv room for him to make himself. When all is gone there will be nothing to make himself out of.

Kind brethren, good Christian brethren, the infinit can't begin when it is already in existence. The infinit, the all, a God can't be a God, and become Jesus in the flesh. Jesus could not be God when God was all. Jesus could not be a something more than all.

My dear brethren, infinit is one, complete, whole, full. You can't add any more. You can't begin a beginning in infinit. Hence it necessarily follows there could be no such thing as a beginning; for the word was; it could not be more than was; it could not was-er. The infinit word was—the infinit—there can't be any more than infinit. The word which was God could not get into God. Two gods could not get into each other and both be infinit. A cause might produce an effect when means are used to accomplish it. Finite is something. If something it must be an entity. If an entity, it must be matter. That, my brethren, you must all allow. If it is, it always has been, it certainly will continue to be. For all I can see, matter is self-existent, self-regulating, and self-compensating. All science, all observation, proves this to be true.

I will add, in conclusion, my Christian brethren, what a glorious blessing it is and was for us that a young virgin gave birth to a babe that made her, and this maiden was the mother of her own father, and that her son was her own redeemer, and that this redeemer or savior made us disbelieve in order that we should become kindling-wood for a hell that he had made for us.

Now, my Christian friends, one of the brethren will hand round the plate, and you must shell out very liberally, as I hav got some very pretty mansions in the skies to dispose of, and as good as any that can be found in the market, and those that are the most liberal will get the best and finest situations. So, my brethren, let us sing while the collection is going on.

Your faithful minister in the cause of unbelief,
J. PETTY, in the church of Freethought.

CEDAR SPRINGS, MICH., Jan. 22, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I am very much interested in the question of prohibition, so ably handled by E. C. Walker, C. C. Johnson, and others. I will not take issue with either of these gentlemen, for they are all right in their way. The question of the evil of intemperance is a settled question with all right-minded men. To prohibit is the question, and to do that without too much friction, contention, and hard feelings. The question should be carefully considered by all concerned. I hav thought on this subject a great deal. Whether my thoughts are of any value or not depends upon whether they contain a principle.

Legislation must result in doing good for the greatest number, or legislation becomes an evil. I will suggest a plan to prohibit as far as necessary the sale and use of distilled liquors. First I will relate a little stratagem on the part of some of our generals in the late war. The plan was not to pay any attention to the rabble force on their way to victory, but to strike boldly to the sea-coast and giv the enemy a grand surprise. Whoever suggested the plan saw the result as clear before it was undertaken as the result appeared when it was accomplished. The result we all know, but it required co-operation.

Just so with my plan of abolishing intemperance; not total abstinence, for that is too impracticable to think of. We must adopt a principle of love and charity.

Force has lost its grip on mankind, if it ever had any. We must learn wisdom by experience. The Christians hav used force and talked love. Will Liberals follow in the footsteps of their enemies and be despised of all men? Oh, for more charity and wisdom! The plan that I will suggest is this: Uncle Sam shall buy a number of distilleries and utilize the convict labor in manufacturing pure liquor to be sold at first cost—labor cost. Liquor will thus be so cheap that to offer to treat your friend will be an insult. Thus a dealer at the bar will not find it profitable, and will abandon the business for some one more remunerativ. The quantity drank will not be more than at present. Pass a law making the adulteration of liquor a penal offense, so that the dealers could not squeeze a profit out of a gallon to buy ten. As the license laws and the high revenue both operate in the interest of the dealer, we should abolish both. It is a false notion that the high revenue tax levied on the so-called luxuries has a tendency to stop the use of the same, but there is nothing in history that tends to prove this assertion. But on the other hand the poor victim of the bad habit is robbed by law and degraded by the ruinous practice. Let us hav charity for the down-trodden.

I hav two objects in view, as you will see, not the least of which is the abolition of our ruinous convict labor system, which must be settled in some way, so that it will not be in competition with free labor.

Only giv us something practical. I would like to receive a postal card from all who consider this a practical suggestion.

Yours for liberty, A. S. CROXTON.

ROSS, Feb. 22, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Some of the Christian newspapers of the Lone Star state hav become very vehement at Mr. Shaw for deserting the pulpit to become a follower of Voltaire and Paine; but even that is no drawback on Infidelity. When a minister discovers he is teaching a system of religion that is false, he acts like any other brave man would do—he just steps down and out. He is denounced also as a follower of Ingersoll. So much the better; we are now satisfied that he has become intellectually developed, and no longer instructs men and women in the mysteries of a revealed religion. Such men as Ingersoll and Shaw are the men who kept bright the spark that Voltaire and Paine kindled over one hundred years ago; it is no proof of blasphemy just to make the bare assertion. Paine and Voltaire stood in front of ignorant superstition in the darkest hour mental liberty ever saw. They were the heroes of absolute freedom. When men nowadays are denounced as blasphemers, we will not rely on the word of Texas clergyman alone, but want some proof of even their honesty. Some men are born liars; some follow it as a profession, and they are as liable to be of that profession as any other. Men who hav been the heroes of humanity are due the civility of our fellow-creatures, not those who hav been the liars of posterity. Paine and Voltaire came to the front when theory was enslaved in the deepest gloom, and everything looked dark to man; liberty was in bondage, and priests wore the divine mantle of charity. Paine stood in the very midst of the bigots of that century, and counseled them to reason. To reason was his motto, and liberty was the effect. In one hand he held the rights of man, and in the other he wielded the pen of steel that wrote the "Age of Reason," and that work struck the vital blow to the creed of Christendom. He was the intellectual monarch of the age in which he lived. His body is dust, but his works liv on, feared by bigots and loved by his fellow-men. A few more brave men to follow in his work, a few more heroic men like him, and this world will be one great store-house of knowledge and truth. Paine tested Holy Writ, and it would not stand the test. If a book written at the divine command of an infinit being will not stand the test, how can it be expected of the systems and disciplins and confessions of faith?

One by one the ministers step down and out, and leave the pulpit empty, and I don't blame them. I would not teach any system of religion that God would not brace up; and they with Paine and Voltaire are pronounced blasphemers. he would not do a little of the rough, outside work, I would not do it all. With independent hands Paine tore the mysterious veil from miracles and prophecies, and nought remained. He then seized the robes that encircled the ignorant monks of the monasteries; but ignorance would cling to the cross. A few more Voltaires and Paines to glitter like stars in the intellectual sky of the future! They were the electric-lights of the age in which they lived. Most of the noted Infidels of to-day were raised by Christian parents. Their parents taught them the holy scripture; but the virtue of its truth seemed so absurd to intelligent children that they did not grasp the faith of kindred. The religion taught by parents is not always the religion for their children. When free speech and free thought and free press go down, I expect some of Paine's and Voltaire's followers will be found amid the debris.

Truly yours, J. WILLIS BROCK.

MR. EDITOR: It seems to me by the intelligence which your last week's issue brought to me that there are still men and women among the Liberals who, in spite of all the advice and instruction they hav received through the columns of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, are yet as bigoted and narrow-minded as the worst Christian fanatic ever was or ever could be. Shame on any person who, calling himself enlightened, will order his paper stopped because it publishes something contrary to their way of thinking, or criticises what they believe. I would most emphatically say that if any such narrow-minded bigots are subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, who will not hav all questions brought up for discussion, no matter to what ism they belong, whether Materialism, Spiritualism, Mohammedanism, or Christianity, I should think their loss would be but little, and, as the saying is, their absence would be good company. The sooner they join the church the better, as they never hav been truly emancipated in thought or liberty, but hav only stopped paying pew-rent on account of not being promoted. Such Liberals as these are traceable away back in the dark past, when the Inquisition was in its hight of power. It was such men that made poor Socrates drink the deadly hemlock, and burnt poor Servetus and Bruno; the same bigotry which burnt and drowned witches at a later date, and still later, in our own time, it was the very same spirit which convicted and imprisoned our beloved and worthy friend and brother, D. M. Bennett. This, to my mind, is far from being the aim and object of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I understand it, the avowed mission of that paper being to instruct and enlighten its readers and bring them up to a higher standard of knowledge, not even hinting that it ever expects to attain that perfection of wisdom that some of its patrons so positivly believe themselvs to hav reached. Nothing of this nature is the desire of our grand old TRUTH SEEKER. But it will pry into all things in investigating and in trying to arrive at the true facts appertaining to the benefit and welfare of its readers, regardless of belief or ism. It seems to me, that, as Freethinking men and women, if we go under the name of Spiritualist, Materialist, or any other ist, we are following in exactly the same paths as our old creed-believing ancestors. In this way we would become as corrupt in our beliefs as ever they were. And the belief which had the most power, no matter whether it was Christianity, Spiritualism, or Materialism, would, according to T. Winter, J. F. Chase, and some others, compel the minority to believe with them or lose their bread and butter, or perhaps their heads. Now I don't pretend to class myself with any belief whatever. I am not a party man, neither am I a Christian, a Spiritualist, a Materialist, a Mohammedan, a Buddhist, or a Brahman. But I am what THE TRUTH SEEKER styles itself, a truth-seeker, and am always ready to search for the truth and proclaim it, no matter what may be the consequence, or whether it pleases or displeases. D. M. Bennett did not go around the world to try and misconstrue the meanings of things, and please a Spiritualist or a Materialist. Nothing of the kind was his desire, but instead he started as a truth-seeker, in defiance of all isms or beliefs, in search of truth, and disseminated the same to the world as he found it. Never, to my knowledge, has D. M. Bennett avowed himself anything else but a truth-seeker in search of truth, and to this his paper has ever been devoted.

Yours for more truth, ROBERT FLEMING.

Poetry

The Causeless Cause.

BY J. W. WELLMAN.

The smallest dust, a speck of earth,
A prophecy before its birth,
Unfolds, transforms, perfects, extends,
Prophetic ever, never ends;
Receives in union other name,
In plant or thought remains the same;
And as through lower forms it ran,
From rock to thought and song of man,
Released, it fell, as all things must.
Again it joins prophetic dust,
But to repeat, in ceaseless rounds,
Its work of dust through endless bounds.

But what's the hand that lifts it up
From granit rock to carol cup?
And what's the choice by which it leaves
The rock for thought, and laughs and grieves?
Is all but dust in council lone,
Prophetic man, beast, plant, and stone?
Or must there be a vital part,
An outward form, or central heart?
Tell, ye who can, exhaust your lore;
But ere you place effect before,
Unveil the niche in lawless laws
Where skulks the form of causeless cause.

A Burdened Soul.

From the Brooklyn Eagle.

"It is really a most delicate thing that I come to see you about," she fluttered, and as the managing editor placed a chair for her he looked grave, for the blushes chased each other over the prettiest face he had seen for many a day.

"What's his name?" asked the managing editor with soothing encouragement.

"Sir!" faltered the beauty, turning a puzzled pair of bewildering blue eyes full upon him. "How—how did you know? What made you ask me that question?"

"And I suppose you hav set the figure at $75,000," continued the managing editor, smiling covertly at his superior sagacity.

"Do you measure my precious soul by paltry money bags and filthy checks?" she demanded, with a flashing glance and blushes that chased each other faster than ever.

"I don't," replied the managing editor, "but the jury will. I would if I were a juror!" and he smiled again, this time in admiration of the delicacy of his compliment.

"I don't think you quite understand me," sighed the fair visitor. "I—am in great trouble, and I hav come for advice. There is a young man—" and here she broke down entirely and sobbed bitterly.

"Is there any way I can brace you up?" inquired the managing editor, rubbing his nose with a corkscrew as a gentle hint in the direction of his resources.

"No, thanks!" she remonstrated, recovering herself with an effort. "You are very kind. I don't think you can do anything for me at all. Is your religious editor in? He will be more apt to understand the nature of my trouble than you will."

"Shouldn't wonder," retorted the managing editor, dryly. "Here he is," and he pointed out the man who does the truly pious for the paper.

"What is it?" asked the religious editor, sharply. "Feller in the Bible-class, librarian, tenor in the choir, any of them?"

"Y—yes," she stammered. "It's the tenor. We were converted at the same time, and now we are afraid—"

"Infernal rascal?" growled the managing editor, wiping away a tear. "Just let us write him up."

"Well," continued the religious editor, still more sharply. "What about him? Is the librarian getting jealous? Class leader threatening to tell your mother? Anything of that kind?"

"If he does, I'll write an editorial on him myself, muttered the managing editor chivalrously.

"Not exactly that," smiled the sufferer through her tears. "You see—Oh! how can I tell you?" and she broke down again.

"Want him clubbed?" demanded the managing editor, brandishing a bottle.

"Not for worlds!" she exclaimed, throwing herself before him as if to protect some one in danger.

"Let her alone!" shouted the religious editor. "She is all right. Now go on. You left off by both being converted together. What next? Is he after the soprano?"

"She thinks he is, and there is where my trouble is. You see she isn't a Christian—only a singer, you know—and she can dance with him at parties. Now what I want to know is—is whether it would be wicked for me to dance too, until I cut her out. Please tell me!" and her lips parted and her eyes were suffused with tears of anxious inquiry.

"Certainly not!" growled the religious editor, who didn't seem in the least dazed by the question.

"W-w-what?" demanded the managing editor, his lower jaw dropping. "Is that all?"

"Why certainly," responded the beauty. "Isn't that enough? What did you suppose was the matter? The whole church was against me, and when I said I would leave it to you, the superintendent bet the tenor $5 you would decide against me."

"That's about the way with them all," explained the religious editor, as the gratified girl took her departure and the two editors stood gazing at each other. "You'd think they were in all sorts of scrapes until you come to question them, and then you find that it is only some little point in religious etiquet that anybody could decide. By the way, what did you suppose the matter was?"

"Nothing," replied the managing editor. "I didn't know but what she had lost some money on a dog fight, or something of that kind," and the managing editor went back to his work with a sigh, while the religious editor surreptitiously abstracted the corkscrew, and winked at himself with a prodigious wink.

Book Notice.

From the Universe.

"Answers to Christian Questions and Arguments," by the late D. M. Bennett, is a neatly printed pamphlet of 146 pages. The answers are in the best style of the late lamented Bennett, who in his peculiar view of writing on biblical subjects was not excelled by Paine or Voltaire. He was much more than a master for any Christian foeman; he was an annihilator of the defenders of the myths and frauds from which hav flown an immense amount of unnecessary and most noxious piety. The contents of the pamphlet hav at separate times appeared in newspaper articles, but seem much more attractiv in their present form. For sale at the TRUTH SEEKER office.

Now, Girls!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am in need of a companion, and as girls are scarce in this part of the country, and I am so situated that I can't go East for a wife, I thought I would try to get one by advertising through your paper or by writing to you.

I am twenty-five years of age, six feet tall, and weigh one hundred and seventy-eight pounds. Now, if you know of a good respectable girl who wants a good companion, and you will send me her address, I will make it all right, providing your figures are not too high. I am growing cattle and horses out here, and I can giv good reference if required. I hope to hear from you soon.

JOSEPH KENTZLER.

Miles City, Custer Co., Montana.

Not having any spare girls on hand, we print the above that all may hav a fair chance to compete. We only stipulate that if Mr. Kentzler gets a wife by means of it he shall become a life subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and pay in advance.—ED. T. S.

FREETHOUGHT WORKS,

PUBLISHED AT THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE.

Bible Myths, and Their Parallels in Other Religions. Being a comparison of the Old and New Testament myths and miracles, with those of heathen nations of antiquity. Considering also their origin and meaning. With numerous illustrations. Cloth, $4.

The Figures of Hell; or, The Temples of Bacchus. Dedicated to licensers of beer and whisky. By Mrs. ELIZABETH THOMPSON. A neat little volume of between two and three hundred pages. Price, $1.

Liberty and Morality. A capital full lecture on these important subjects. By W. S. BELL. A pamphlet of thirty-six well-printed pages mailed for 15 cents.

Superstition in All Ages. By JOHN MESLIER, a Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastorate of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his last will and testament to his parishioners, and to the world, the work entitled "Common Sense." Price, cloth, $1.50; paper, $1.00.

Marriage and Parentage and The Sanitary and Physical Laws. For the Production of Children of Finer Health and Ability. By a Physician and Sanitarian. "The virtues of men and women as well as their vices may descend to their children." Price, $1.

The Bible—Whence and What? By RICHARD B. WESTBROOK, D.D., LL.B. The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation. Whole libraries are here concentrated into one little book. Printed in good type and bound in cloth. Price, $1.

The Bible of The Religion of Science. By H. S. BROWN, M.D. "This volume is most respectfully dedicated to those persons who will cordially unite with others to establish the religion of truth and a just government, by the scientific methods of reason, experience, experiments, and observations. For this is the way to wisdom, and to the material, mental, moral, social, and spiritual sciences, that make peace on earth and good will among men." Price, $1.50.

Socialism and Utilitarianism. By JOHN STUART MILL. Price, $1.50.

Specimen Days and Collect. By WALT WHITMAN. Including autobiography, hospital sketches, democratic vistas, etc. Three hundred and seventy-four pages of hearty, wholesome prose and poetry, never before published. Price, $2.00.

Ingersoll and Jesus. Conversation in verse between the two great reformers. By SAMUEL PUTNAM. Price, 10 cents.

The Sabbath. By M. FARRINGTON. A thorough examination and refutation of the claims of Sabbatarians who are trying to foist upon the country their holy day by unconstitutional legal enactments. The author shows by an appeal not only to the facts as they exist in the nature of things, but by reference to the Bible, the writings of distinguished historians and theologians of past ages, that Sunday is no more a holy day than Saturday. Price 10 cents.

The Religion of Common Sense. By Prof. LIEBRECHT ULICH of Germany. Price, 25 cents.

The Sunday Question. A Historical and Critical review, with replies to an objector, By GEORGE W. BROWN, M.D. Price, 15 cents.

KERSEY GRAVES'S WORKS.

Sixteen Saviors or None. By KERSEY GRAVES, author of the World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors; The Bible of Bibles, and Biography of Satan. Price, 75 cents; cloth, $1.

Bible of Bibles; or, Twenty-seven Divine Revelations, containing a description of twenty-seven bibles and an exposition of two thousand biblical errors in science, history, morals, religion, and general events. Also a delineation of the characters of the principal personages of the Christian Bible and an examination of their doctrins. Price, $2.

Biography of Satan; or, a Historical Exposition of the Devil and his Fiery Domains. Price, 35 cents.

The World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors; or, Christianity Before Christ. Containing new and startling revelations in religious history, which disclose the oriental origin of all the doctrins, principles, precepts, and miracles of the Christian New Testament, and furnishing a key for unlocking many of its sacred mysteries, besides comprising the history of sixteen oriental crucified gods. Price, $2.00.

FREETHOUGHT WORKS,

PUBLISHED AT THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE.

Resurrection of Jesus. Showing the contradictions and doubts in which the subject is involved. By W. S. BELL. Revised edition. 25 cents.

Revelations of Antichrist. An exhaustiv work proving conclusivly that no such person as Jesus Christ existed in the reign of Tiberius, but that a Jesus, the son of Mary, was stoned and hanged about a century before, and that his disciples, Simon Kepha, alias Peter, and the apostle Paul, both lived and died before the Christian era. 446 pages and full index. Price, $2.

The Anonymous Hypothesis of Creation. A Brief Review of the so-called Mosaic Account. By JAMES F. FURNISS. Cloth, 50 cents.

The Brain and the Bible. By EDGAR C. BEALL. With a Preface by ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, who says of it: "This book, written by a brave and honest man, is filled with brave and honest thoughts. The arguments it presents cannot be answered by all the theologians in the world." Price reduced to $1.

The Creed of Christendom. Its foundation contrasted with its superstructure. By W. RATHBONE GREG. One of the clearest and ablest works ever written. $1.50.

The Essence of Religion. From the German of L. FEUERBACH. Author of th Essence of Christianity, etc. In cloth, reduced to 50 cents.

The Godly Women of the Bible. A History of all the women who figure in the Bible. Sharp and telling in style. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Legends of the Patriarchs. By S. BARING-GOULD. $1.50. The Congregationalist, in speaking of it, says: "There are few Bible readers who hav not at some time wished for just such a volume. It is a thoroughly interesting book, and will be seized with avidity by all students of the Bible.

The Martyrdom of Man. Embracing the four divisions of War, Religion, Liberty, and Intellect. A work of rare merit, and written in a superior style. By WINWOOD READE. New edition. 544 pages. Price reduced from $3 to $1.75.

The Old Faith and the New. A Confession. By DAVID FRIEDERICH STRAUSS, author of the "New Life of Jesus," etc. Authorized translation from the sixth German edition. By MATHILDE BLIND. Two volumes in one. The translation revised and partly rewritten, and preceded by an American version of the authors "Prefatory Postscript." Strauss is too well known by the readers of America to require a single word to be said in his praise. Price, $1.50.

The Outcast. A deep, finely-written Radical story. From the London edition. By WINWOOD READE, author of "Martyrdom of Man." 30 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion. Both sides fairly and ably presented. By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

MAGNETIC GARMENTS

For the cure of Disease] without Medicine or Medical Treatment. The Statement made by him at that time that his Magnetic Clothing, if worn for any form of Disease (and as advised), would cure ninety per cent of the so-called Incurables, has been verified, he having Clothed and Cured Thousands of Persons of all Forms of Disease. Positive proof of this has appeared in all the leading Newspapers by Testimony of many of our most Prominent and Wealthy Citizens, who, having been Cured by the

Wilsona Magnetic Garments

After all other Treatment had failed, were pleased to assist the Inventor in giving confidence to the Suffering Invalids of America by allowing him to use their well-known and respected Names as Reference; and it is now admitted by many most highly accomplished Scientists and Physicians that the Success and Cures attending the introduction of "Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing has been unprecedented in the history of Electrical Therapeutics. In the face of such Positive Proof as given by us no person can doubt the value of this Invention in all cases.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last word penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

DR. THAYER'S

Magnetic Clothing

Is a stimulant and sedativ nerve tonic, identical with that dynamic force that is eliminated from the brain, and moves along our nervous tissues.

It penetrates and searches the blood, throwing off and out all poisonous matter through the pores of the skin, when all medicines fail.

It stimulates the absorbents to take up the nutriment and in its distribution to repair waste tissues.

It is quick in action, and gives permanent and ready relief to the afflicted in different diseases.

Do you suffer with functional, physical, or nervous debility? Are our female readers broken down in health and spirits from disorders peculiar to their sex, arising from a prostration of the nervous system?

Why then further neglect a subject so productiv of health, when there is at hand a means of cure?

Why not throw off the yoke of bondage altogether, and seek a remedy that has science and common sense to commend it?

It is a remedy of indisputable efficacy to the restoration of health and vigor.

Physicians indorse it, and the goods indorse themselvs.

During the past two years "Victoria" has been purchased by hundreds, and their united testimony is that it has no equal for c ring disease.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES,

Spermatorrhœa and Impotency,

As the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions, (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an EXTERNAL APPLICATION in from 30 to 60 days. No medicine taken. It has never been known to fail!

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in cut. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.

☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

Gems of Thought.

THE greatest virtue which men and women can attain to is to do their full duty to their fellow-beings, and to do naught that will cause pain or sorrow to visit a fellow mortal. That is the highest duty that we are called to fulfill.—D. M. Bennett.

IF it is not right, do not do it; if it is not true, do not say it.—Antoninus.

ARE we yet Christians? is the question which is forcing itself upon the minds of all students of the tone and temper of the times, who cannot fail to recognize, with anxious speculation as to the results, that a vast proportion of the higher and stronger intellect of the age in nearly all branches of science and thought—as well as large bodies, if not the mass, of the most energetic section of the working classes—is day by day, more decidedly and avowedly shaking itself free from every form and variety of established creed. It is the question, finally, which is implied, rather than openly asked, in the various uneasy and spasmodic, perhaps somewhat blind, attempts on the part of the clergy, in the shape of "Speaker's Commentaries," new churches, open-air preachings, pan-Anglican synods, and the like, to meet a danger which they perceive through the mist, but of which they hav scarcely yet measured the full significance and bearing.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

WITH the dead there is no rivalry. In the dead there is no change. Plato is never sullen. Servantes is never petulant. Demosthenes never comes unseasonably. Dante never stays too long. No difference of political opinion can alienate Cicero. No heresy can excite the horror of Bossuet.—Macaulay.

OF one thing we may be perfectly sure: the coming man's religion will inculcate and actually produce a genuin and high morality. Much more is requisit, but this is preliminary and indispensable. Philosophers and litterateurs, who survey the scene of human life from a library window, may not know that the practice of the homely moralities is the first condition of all welfare and all excellence. It is the fact, nevertheless. For my part, I avow my conviction that the most blind and bigoted religionist, Catholic or Protestant [Buddhist or Mohammedan], who performs with loyalty and diligence the duties of his sphere and home, is not only a better man, but, in truth, a more intelligent man than the most brilliant philosopher who does not.—Parton's Coming Man's Religion.

FOR forms of government let fools contest,
Whate'er is best administered is best;
For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight,
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right.
—Pope.

THERE is only one cure for the evils which newly-acquired freedom produces, and that cure is freedom. When a prisoner first leaves his cell, he cannot bear the light of day; he is unable to discriminate colors or recognize faces. But the remedy is, not to remand him to his dungeon, but to accustom him to the rays of the sun. The blaze of truth and liberty may at first dazzle and bewilder nations which hav become half blind in the house of bondage. But let them gaze on, and they soon will be able to bear it. In a few years men learn to reason; the extreme violence of opinions subsides; hostil theories correct each other; the scattered elements of truth cease to contend and begin to coalesce; and at length a system of justice and order is educed out of the chaos. —Macaulay's Milton.

JESUS affirms that it is more difficult for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven than, etc. The only intent of such teaching could be to induce the poor to remain content with their want and misery attendant on their wretched state in this life, in the hope of a higher recompense in some future life. Is it good to be content with poverty? Is it not far better to investigate the causes of poverty, with a view to its cure and prevention? The doctrin is a most horrid one which declares that the poor shall not cease from the face of the earth.—C. Bradlaugh.

SEE yonder poor, o'er-labored wight,
So abject, mean, and vile,
Who begs a brother of the earth
To giv him leave to toil;
And see his lordly fellow-worm
The poor petition spurn,
Unmindful, though a weeping wife
And helpless offspring mourn.

If I'm designed yon lordling's slave—
By Nature's law designed—
Why was an independent wish
E'er planted in my mind?
If not, why am I subject to
His cruelty or scorn,
Or why has man the will and power
To make his fellow mourn? —Burns.

I KNOW whereof I speak when I say that there are misisters of high standing, who are thorough disciples of the evolution philosophy, who hav lost every atom of belief in the inspiration of the scriptures, according to the definitions of creeds, who read the Old Testament with only the same credence that they giv to Herodotus and Josephus and Eusebius, and yet, by a discreet reticence, a use of old phraseology, in a private sense, with mental reservations, they maintain their status, and their hearers hav no conception of their true belief. . . . My reason told me, years ago, that Christianity was merely the best form of morality and religion that the human mind had been able to develop, and its literature only the best religious writings of men. The difference between them and all other religious and sacred books is only one of degree, not of kind. . . . More honest avowal of doubt is a duty which ministers will soon awaken to? They now hinder advancement by fearing to allude to the researches of the ablest scholars of the day, which they privately delight in, but feel it inexpedient to make public. —R. C. Adams.

THIS life of ours is a wild eolian harp of many a joyous strain;
But under them all there runs a loud perpetual wail. —Longfellow.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,
WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain
Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,
Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Children's garments upon application.

Any of the above garments sent to any address upon receipt of price, and we will return the money if they are not as represented in every respect. If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case, send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselvs. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them at about

ONE-THIRD THE PRICE HERETOFORE CHARGED,

So that we can say with truth, None are so poor that they cannot procure them, being but a trifle higher than ordinary clothing.

Remember that we are offering you the cheapest and best magnetic appliances in the market, and if upon receiving the garments they do not meet your expectation, return them at our expense and we will refund your money.

Ladies' Abdominal Jackets and Gentlemen's Vests are made to order, and a fit guaranteed.

Odds and Ends.

A BOY joining the Reno public school was catechized by the teacher as to his religious fitness in this way:

"John, do you know how many Gods there are?"

"The applicant for school privileges scratched his head and marshaled to his assistance a long train of thought. Finally he answered:

"Six, ma'am."

The teacher, irate at his ignorance, said:

"If you don't answer me correctly I will punish you."

The new boy surveyed the surroundings with the eye of an engineer and bolted for the door, and while fleeing from the threatened punishment he met a belated pupil on his way to school, and accosted him:

"Say, how many Gods are there?"

"There is but one God," replied boy No. 2.

"Only one God—and you're going up there to school? You go up there with your little old one God, and you'll catch the devil. I just left there with six and got run out."

SOME time ago an Arkansas paper published an article concerning a well-known politician. There was an evident lack of compliment in the article, and the politician was grieved. Calling his son, a young man who was studying for the ministry, the father said:

"Son, during your theological studies you did not neglect your muscle, did you?"

"No," replied the young man, rolling up his sleeve, and displaying a well-developed arm.

"I am pleased to see that you hav neglected nothing that may be of use in your business. The editor of the Weekly Lash, a paper published over in Longhorn county, has insinuated that I am a liar and an eminently recognized thief. I do not think that in justice to our family pride I can allow such a departure from pleasantry to go unpunished. I ain't feeling very well myself, and I would like for you to go over and maul the gentleman."

"I will go." replied the young man, "mainly to be revenged, but partly to exercise myself, especially as I hav an appointment to preach in an irreligious neighborhood next Sunday, and I will want practice."

The young man went. When he entered the office he found the editor feeding a 'possum that he had put into a barrel for fattening purposes.

"I am the son of the noted Mr. Laskins," said the young man, advancing.

"Oh, you son of a gun," mused the editor.

"Are you talking to me?"

"No; I was addressing the 'possum."

"You hav slandered my father, and I can maul the iniquity out of you."

"You are the biggest fool I ever saw."

"Are you addressing me?"

"I am talking to the 'possum."

"Prepare yourself for a death struggle."

"I'll choke the life out of you in a minute."

"Me?"

"The 'possum."

"Defend yourself."

"Look out!"

The struggle was characterized by an impressiv earnestness. The young man suffered. The next day the noted politician received a letter wrapped around the torn fragment of a human ear. The letter read: "Inclosed please find the remains of your son."

HOW THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT PEOPLE WOULD LOOK AT THEM.

Imagin with what dire dismay
Old Matthew, Mark and Luke and John,
Could they come back to earth to-day,
Would view the present goings on!
Where once they walked, or rode on asses,
The engin whistle cuts the wind,
And new disciples, fixed with passes,
Curse because the train's behind!

And those Wise Men, imagin them,
Following the guiding Star—
That rose and fell on Bethlehem—
On the top shelf of a sleeping car!
And think of Solomon, the great,
Laying, craftily, his lines
To get some kind of special rate
For all his wives and concubines!

There's Adam, too, how he would sigh,
And turn to Eve, and speak her low,
When first he heard the brakeman cry,
"E-dun! Change cars for Jericho!"
And Moses, how surprised h'd be,
When standing back upon the ridges,
And looking on the old Dead Sea,
He saw all Israel mending bridges!

There's old Nebuchadnezzar, too,
Doomed in the fields his life to pass;
How he would stare, when first he'd view
The sign: "Park. Please keep off the grass!"
And Dives, could he leave Below,
And come on earth, how he would wilt,
When he should undertake to show
Down wealth with Gould and Vanderbilt!

And Samuel, what would he do
If he, when kneeling all alone,
Should hear the brisk "Hello, hello!"
Of Eli at the telephone?
How would those Children whom the bears
Ate up for telling him to "go,"
Stare at Elisha's scattering hairs
In the front row of a burlesque show?

How long would David, with his sling,
Contrive to linger round about,
With Sullivan still in the ring,
With cash up that he'd "knock him out?"
And how the multitude, who fed
Upon the Sermon on the Mount,
Would feel their hair raise as they read
The Associated Press account!

The scene has changed by Galilee,
And altered is old Palestine,
Jerusalem, ere long, will be
A little station where you dine;
And should the ancient residents
Come back in all their early rags,
Some fresh policeman, with no sense,
Would run the outfit in as "vags."

Notes and Clippings.

THERE are eleven states in which women can vote for school directors.

AMONG the things taken by burglars from an Illinois minister's house were a box of tobacco, six bottles of whisky, and a pistol.

VICTOR HUGO attained his eighty-first birthday on Feb. 27th. The anniversary was celebrated by a banquet, at which politics, literature, and art were represented.

A NOTE made on Sunday is void, which may account, says the Yonkers Statesman, for some men sleeping all through church service, and making no note of what the preacher says.

THE czar of Russia is to hav an immense and gorgeous procession at his approaching coronation. Nothing has ever been seen in this country to equal it except one of Barnum's circus parades.

PREACHERS receive a good many nickels and dimes with holes in them—probably because they are holy. But the Kentucky State Journal wishes to know how the deuce they manage to pass them off again.

IT is said that a section of the Salvation Army is endeavoring to convert Pennsylvanians by means of a hand-organ. When a member of this army gets at a hand-organ there is a conjunction of "cranks."

"WHY," asked a governess of her little charge, "do we pray to God to giv us our daily bread? Why don't we ask for four or five days, or a week?" "Because we want it fresh," replied the ingenuous child.

A KANSAS church deacon said in prayer-meeting, "Brethren and sisters, let us pray for G. M. Smith and make a better man of him." G. M. Smith sued the deacon for slander, and was awarded $500 by a jury.

AN ingenious wife out West named her baby Fort, so that her husband, who is fond of revival hymns, would hold it. She complains now that he has the general complaint of Christians, and don't put his theory into practice at all.

BISMARCK thinks that farmers are right in taking advantage of a sunny Sunday to harvest hay or grain, or to do anything in which delay may cause injury. He says: "I could never bring myself to bind tenants of my farming land not to do such labor."

A CERTAIN little three-year-old likes very much to go to church, and especially enjoys the singing. One day the choir sang, "Rock of ages, cleft for me," and after she got home the little one was heard singing, very seriously, "Rock the babies kept for me."

A WESTERN colporteur was once conversing with an Illinois man on his religious duties. Said he, "Do you attend church regularly?" "Oh, no; I never go to church, but I allers make it a p'int to 'tend all the funerals. They be jest as solemn, and thar isn't no kerlections."

THE proper church contribution-box trick now is not to drop a big old-fashioned copper into it with sufficient noise to make people think it was a half-dollar, but to close the hand, empty, of course, then open it when well into the box, and folks will imagin it was a bill you put in.

A LITTLE four-year-old, upon retiring the other night, began to say her evening prayers as usual, and after repeating, "If I should die before I wake," paused a moment and added: "What a rumpus there would be in this house!" Then she recited the concluding line of the prayer and scrambled into bed.

A LITTLE girl, reading the Bible aloud to her old grandmother, said: "And these five children Milcah bore." "Read that again, daughter," said the old lady, whose hearing was not good. "And these five children Milcah bear," read the girl. "There, that will do," said the grandmother; "they might milk a bear, my dear, but they could not milk a boar."

THE use of instrumental music in church service is increasing to that extent in England that a few of the advanced congregations think of introducing the bass drum and cymbals.—Chicago Inter-Ocean. The time may yet come when no fashionable church orchestra in America will be complete without bones and banjo.—Troy Times.

IT appears that there are three Baptist clergymen in the country who receive the princely salary of $6 a year. The reason they don't get any more is because their flocks are such large ones, and keep them so busy immersing them that they don't get a chance to get out of the water long enough to drum up the revenue and guard the contribution boxes.

THE last descendant of the famous Portuguese navigator Magellan appeared the other day in a Paris police court; but nothing could hav been more distinguished than the way in which, when asked by the magistrate to giv his name in full, he apologized for having to detain the court, explaining that he was "Jeronimo Collao de Maghalaens da Gama Monez Vellasco Sarmento Alarcao Bulhoes de San de Maria Salema."

"WHAT is promised to the righteous?" asked a mild and amiable Sunday-school teacher of a small child at the far end of her class. "Eternal bliss," quickly responded the child. "Quite right, my dear child," said the mild and amiable. "And now tell me what is promised to the wicked." "Eternal blister, ma'am," was the prompt reply. The teacher pronounced it theologically correct, but peculiarly expressed.

THE audience hung spellbound upon the tide of language which flowed from the preacher. One could hav heard a pin drop. Throwing himself in a listening attitude, the preacher exclaimed, with thrilling emphasis: "Listen? What sounds are those which break the stillness of these solitudes? It is—it is the—" "Me-ow! row! mew! wow! reow-wow! phish! phis!" suddenly screamed a chorus of cats outside.

THE Independent publishes some unpleasant things about the East Tennessee Wesleyan University. It charges that the university received money for the establishment of a normal department, but did not establish the department. It also charges that the profuse promises of its printed catalogs were never fulfilled, and that a "suitable building" rented by the trustees proved to be a dilapidated cow-shed which had twice been offered to some negroes for a school, but which the negroes had the good taste to reject.

A LADY residing in Middletown, N. Y., says the Mercury of that place, the mother of a bright little boy, was talking to him the other night, just as she was putting him to bed, about the efficacy of prayer, and told him that if he would ask God for anything that he particularly desired she had no doubt his request would be granted. The little fellow knelt at his mother's knee and prayed God to send him fifty little sisters and one hundred little brothers. The prayer was never finished, for the mother, aghast at the prospect of having her house turned into an orphan asylum, lifted the boy to his feet and tucked him into bed without a moment's unnecessary delay.

FOR cool assurance in looking after the interests of number one a Western Episcopal minister is now several "laps" ahead. The canons of that church require the pastor to devote the results of the communion service to the poor of the parish, leaving the method of its distribution entirely to his own discretion. This pastor was about to retire from his parish when he was requested to make a report of these funds. He reported that he thought himself the most needy person in the parish, and accordingly had made a judicious concentration of the funds into his own purse. Rural ministers of other denominations that hav no such provision will look with envy upon so neat a method of enlarging small incomes.—Boston Globe.

THE pastor of the colored church at New Brunswick, N. J., announced on Sunday last that the coal supply of the church was exhausted, and that a collection would be taken by him personally for the purchase of a fresh supply. The first man he struck—a white visitor—gave him a two-dollar bill. With a mighty effort the pastor overcame his great joy, and passed slowly through the entire church. It did not take him long to count up. He found that the members of the church had contributed just eleven cents.

A LITTLE girl wore a dress with a flounce around it in the Vicar of Wanborough's parish school in England recently, although he had ordered the pupils to be plainly dressed. The vicar said that the child must either take off the ornament or remain away from school. Her parents refused to remove the ornament, and the little girl was put out of school. Next the parents were summoned to the county court to show cause why the child did not attend school. Upon hearing the facts, the court upheld the vicar and his ordinance forbidding any but plain apparel, but mercifully omitted the fine that might hav been imposed. Whether the vicar's prohibition extends to variegated garters is not set forth, but it is in keeping with the magnitude of the subject that they should be investigated.

THE Methodist church at Otisville, N. Y., was closed on Sunday, the 11th. This was done as a matter of policy by the congregation, as the pastor, the Rev. A. M. Woodworth, had been on a drunk for a week, and they thought it best not to giv him a chance to exhibit his infirmity in the pulpit. When a brother reverend called on Mr. Woodworth, the latter gentleman explained that he had been advised by one of his congregation to use whisky as a remedy for malaria, from which he was suffering. He took, he says, quite a stiff horn from a jug, which he had in the house, but probably drank more than he intended. He then started by rail for Port Jervis, after his arrival at which place he lost all recollection of "consecutiv events." Several persons who knew him saw him sitting in a saloon in an intoxicated conditiom. He was also induced to drink some beer and to enter into a game of cards with a bar-room loafer. He left the saloon by a back door, lost his way, but finally turned up at the depot and took the train for home. His congregation very generously acquitted him of any intent to get drunk, and he will be allowed to resume services at the church. A minister may wrestle successfully with the force of Satan, but when he grapples with that form of sin known as furlong whisky, a long life of Christian endeavor will not keep him from going under.

THE Rev. Dr. Kirkus, an English clergyman, rector of a fashionable Episcopal congregation in Baltimore, vigorously attacked the Sunday and liquor laws on the 25t ult. As examples of almost perfect specimens of bad laws, Dr. Kirkus instanced Sunday laws and liquor prohibition laws. He characterized such laws as tyrannous in principle and impossible of execution. There never had been a civilized society which did not habitually use and very largely abuse alcoholic stimulants. Their use is as universal as the use of cooked meat instead of raw meat; and for whose benefit are these laws intended? Clearly not for the benefit of their promoters. Nobody proposes a law compelling them to drink. They hav no personal grievance. It must be intended, then, either to benefit nobody or to benefit the people who do not want it, who regard it as a monstrous tyranny, and who will certainly resist it by every possible means at their command. The ten thousandth part of those who use alcoholic stimulants never were and are never likely to be intoxicated. It is within the legitimate functions of government to protect men by physical force from all the possible temptations or occasions of crime? What kind of monastic institutions and rigorous seclusions would not be necessary to protect men from every temptation or occasion of breaking, for instance, the seventh commandment?

News of the Week.

CARL MARX, the great German Socialist, is dead.

RENTS are reported to be on the advance in New York city.

CHARLES WITTE, the German lawyer and writer, died on the 17th.

THE Mississippi is subsiding, and the danger from floods is considered past.

WILLIAM JONES, indicted for assault on Guiteau, was docketed for trial last week.

A WORLD'S international exhibition at Calcutta is set down for some time during 1883.

A BRANCH of the Salvation Army is encamped at Syracuse, N. Y., and excites much interest among the Syracusians.

AMERICAN hog products, including sides, bacon, and sausages, hav been prohibited importation into Germany.

THE Austrian Reichsrath has given its sanction to the prosecution of one of its members for indulging in free speech.

IT is suspected that Prince Gortchakoff, of Russia, was poisoned and his intestins hav been sent to Freiburg to be analyzed.

A MAN has been sentenced to three years' banishment for firing at the coat-of-arms on the front of the Austrian embassy at Rome.

THEY hav a ridiculous Sunday law in Baltimore, and idiots to enforce it. A man has been fined five dollars for starting his watch on Sunday.

PARNELL says that the recent crimes against life and property in England should not be charged to the Irish party, but are the work of individual cranks.

Two million dollars annually are appropriated by Congress for the printing of public documents, most of which, according to the Sun, find their way into junk shops.

LAST Sunday was the twelfth anniversary of the establishment of the Commune in Paris. The day was celebrated with appropriate ceremonies by the Socialistic societies of this city.

A MURDER incidentally took place at the christening of an Italian baby in this city on the 18th. If a man must be killed for every baby that is christened, the Italians cannot hope to add much to the increase of the American population.

DUKES, the acquitted slayer of Capt. Nutt in Pennsylvania, whose daughter he (Duke's) had seduced, has again been arrested on a charge of sending obscene literature through the mail. Great indignation is felt over the acquittal of Dukes.

SIX thousand persons with high hats and green ribbons turned out last Saturday in this city, and marched in procession to celebrate St. Patrick's Day. There was much enthusiasm, but fewer fights and less drunkenness than usual on such occasions.

THE great bridge over the East River between New York and Brooklyn is to be opened June 1st. The event will be celebrated, and the President is expected to be present. It has been proposed to march the Decoration Day procession across the bridge.

Two men in female attire attempted last Sunday to assassinate Lady Florence Dixie, an English woman who has been writing against Fenianism in the London papers. Two thrusts were made at her with a dagger, but a corset rib broke the weapon and saved her life.

A BOMB exploded in the government offices in London on the 15th, shaking the members of Parliament in their seats, and breaking a good many windows. The design was evidently to blow up the offices occupied by Sir Charles Dilke and the local government board. The Fenians are suspected and one arrest has been made.

BY ERNST HAECKEL.

SECOND HALF OF THE SERIES OF HUMAN ANCESTORS.—VERTEBRATE ANIMAL ANCESTORS OF MAN.

From Vol. II., History of Creation.

Ninth Stage—Skull-less Animals (Acrania).—The series of human ancestors, which in accordance with their whole organization we hav to consider as Vertebrate animals, begins with the Skull-less animals, or Acrania, of whose nature the still living Lancelet givs us a faint idea. Since this little animal in its earliest embryonal state entirely agrees with the Ascidia, and in its further development shows itself to be a true Vertebrate animal, it forms a direct transition from the Vertebrata to the Invertebrata. Even if the human ancestors of the ninth stage in many respects differed from the Amphioxus—the last surviving representativ of the Skull-less animals—yet they must hav resembled it in its most essential characteristics, in the absence of head, skull, and brain. Skull-less animals of such structure—out of which animals with skulls developed at a latter period—lived during the primordial period, and originated out of the Himatega of the eighth stage by the formation of the metamera, or body segments, as also by the further differentiation of all organs, especially the more perfect development of the dorsal nerve-marrow and the spinal rod lying below it. Probably the separation of the two sexes (gonochorism) also began at this stage, whereas all the previously mentioned invertebrate ancestors (apart from the 3—4 first neutral stages) exhibited the condition of hermaphrodites (hermaphroditism). The certain proof of the former existence of these skull-less and brainless ancestors of man, is furnished by the comparativ anatomy and the ontogeny of the Amphioxus and of the Craniota.

Tenth Stage—Single-nostriled Animals (Monorrhina).—Out of the Skull-less ancestors of man there arose in the first place animals with skulls, or Craniota, of the most imperfect nature. The lowest stage of all still living Craniota is occupied by the class of round-mouthed animals, or Cyclostoma, namely, the Hag (Myxinoidea) and Lampreys (Petromyzontia). From the internal organization of these single-nostriled animals, or Monorrhina, we can form an approximate idea of the nature of the human ancestors of the tenth stage. In the former, as also in the latter, skull and brain must hav been of the simplest form, and many important organs, as for example, the swimming bladder, the sympathetic nerve, the spleen, the jaw skeleton, and both pairs of legs, may probably as yet not hav existed. However, the pouch gills and the round sucking mouth of the Cyclostoma must probably be looked upon as purely adaptiv characteristics, which did not exist in the corresponding stage of ancestors. The single-nostriled animals originated during the primordial period out of the skull-less animals by the anterior end of the dorsal narrow developing into the brain, and the end of the dorsal chord into the skull. The certain proof that such single-nostriled and jawless ancestors of man did exist, is found in the "comparativ anatomy of the Myxinoidea."

Eleventh Stage—Primeval Fish (Selachii).—Of all known Vertebrate animals, the ancestors of the Primeval Fish probably showed most resemblance to the still living Sharks (Squalacei). They originated out of the single-nostriled animals by the division of the single nostril into two lateral halves, by the formation of a sympathetic nervous system, a jaw skeleton, a swimming bladder, and two pairs of legs (breast fins or forelegs, and ventral fins or hind-legs). The internal organization of this stage may probably, upon the whole, hav corresponded to the lowest species of Sharks known to us; the swimming bladder was however more strongly developed; in the case of the latter it exists only as a rudimentary organ. They lived as early as the Silurian period, as is proved by the fossil remains of sharks (teeth and fin spines) from the Silurian strata. A certain proof that the Silurian ancestors of man and of all the other double-nostriled animals were nearest akin to the Selachii, is furnished by the comparativ anatomy of the latter; it shows that the relations of organization in all Amphirrhina can be derived from those of the Selachii.

Twelfth Stage—Mud Fish (Dipneusta).—Our twelfth ancestral stage is formed by Vertebrate animals which probably possessed a remote resemblance to the still living Salamander fish. They originated out of the Primeval fish (probably at the beginning of the paleolithic, or primary period) by adaptation to life on land, and by the transformation of the swimming bladder into an air-breathing lung, and of the nasal cavity (which now opened into the cavity of the mouth) into air passages. The series of the ancestors of man which breathed air through lungs began at this stage. Their organization may probably in many respects hav agreed with that of the still living Ceratodus and Protopterus, but at the same time may hav been very different. They probably lived at the beginning of the Devonian period. Their existence is proved by comparativ anatomy, which shows the Dipneusta to be an intermediate stage between the Selachii and Amphibia.

Thirteenth Stage—Gilled Amphibians (Sozobranchia).—Out of those Mud Fish, which we considered the primary forms of all the Vertebrata which breathe through lungs, there developed the class of Amphibia as the main line. Here began the five-toed formation of the foot (the Pentadactyla), which was thence transmitted to the higher Vertebrata, and finally also to Man. The gilled Amphibians must be looked upon as our most ancient ancestors of the class of Amphibia; besides possessing lungs they retained throughout life regular gills, like the still living Proteus and Axolotl. They originated out of the Dipneusta by the transformation of the paddling fins into five-toed legs, and also by the more perfect differentiation of various organs, especially of the vertebral column. In any case they existed about the middle of the paleolithic, or primary period, possibly even before the Coal period; for fossil Amphibia are found in coal. The proof that similar gilled Amphibians were our direct ancestors, is given by the comparativ anatomy and the ontogeny of Amphibia and Mammals.

Fourteenth Stage—Tailed Amphibians (Sozura).—Our amphibious ancestors which retained their gills throughout life, were replaced at a latter period by other Amphibia, which, by metamorphosis, lost the gills which they had possessed in early life, but retained the tail, as in the case of the salamanders and newts of the present day. They originated out of the gilled Amphibians by accustoming themselvs in early life to breathe only through gills, and later in life only through lungs. They probably existed even in the second half of the primary, namely, during the Permian period, but possibly even during the Coal period. The proof of their existence lies in the fact that tailed Amphibians form a necessary intermediate link between the preceding and succeeding stages.

Fifteenth Stage—Primeval Amniota (Protamnia).—The name Protamnion we hav given to the primary form of the three higher classes of Vertebrate animals, out of which the Proreptilia and the Promammalia developed as two diverging branches. It originated out of unknown tailed Amphibia by the complete loss of the gills, by the formation of the amnion, of the cochlea, and of the round window in the auditory organ, and of the organs of tears. It probably originated in the beginning of the mesolithic or secondary period, perhaps even toward the end of the primary, in the Permian period. The certain proof that it once existed lies in the comparativ anatomy and the ontogeny of the Amniota; for all Reptils, Birds, and Mammals, including Man, agree in so many important characteristics that they must, with full assurance, be admitted to be the descendants of a single common primary form, namely, of the Protamnion.

Sixteenth Stage—Primary Mammals (Promammalia).—We now find ourselvs more at home with our ancestors. From the sixteenth up to the twenty-second stage they all belong to the large and well known class of Mammals, the confines of which we ourselvs hav as yet not transgressed. The common, long since extinct and unknown primary forms of all Mammalia, which we hav named Promammalia, were at all events, of all still living animals, of the class most closely related to the Beaked animals, or Ornithostoma. They differed from the latter, however, by the teeth present in their jaws. The formation of the beak in the Beaked animals of the present day must be looked upon as an adaptiv characteristic which developed at a latter period. The Promammalia arose out of the Protamnia (probably only at the beginning of the secondary period, namely, in the Trias) by various advances in their internal organization, as also by the transformation of the epidermal scales into hairs, and by the formation of a mammary gland which furnished milk for the nourishment of the young ones. The certain proof that the Promammalia—inasmuch as they are the common primary forms of all Mammals—also belong to our ancestors, lies in the comparativ anatomy and the ontogeny of Mammalia and Man.

Seventeenth Stage—Pouched Animals (Marsupialia).—The three sub-classes of Mammalia—as we hav already seen—stand in such a relation to one another that the Marsupials, both as regards their anatomy and their ontogeny and phylogeny, form the direct transition from the Monotrema to Placental animals. Consequently, human ancestors must also hav existed among Marsupials. They originated out of Monotrema—which include the primary Mammalia, or Promammalia—by the division of the cloaca into the rectum and the urogenital sinus, by the formation of a nipple on the mammary gland, and by the partial suppression of the clavicles. The oldest Marsupials at all events existed as early as the Jura period (perhaps even in the Trias), during the Chalk period they passed through a series of stages preparing the way for the origin of Placentalia. The certain proof of our derivation from Marsupials—nearly akin to the still living opossum and kangaroo in their essential inner structure—is furnished by the comparativ anatomy and the ontogeny of Mammalia.

Eighteenth Stage—Semi-apes (Prosimiæ).—The small group of Semi-apes, as we hav already seen, is one of the most important and most interesting orders of Mammalia. It contains the direct primary forms of Genuin Apes, and thus also of Man. Our Semi-ape ancestors probably possessed only a very faint external resemblance to the still living, short-footed Semi-apes (Brachytarsi), especially the Maki, Indri, and Lori. They originated (probably at the beginning of the Cenolithic, or Tertiary period) out of Marsupials of Rat-like appearance by the formation of a placenta, the loss of the marsupium and the marsupial bones, and by the higher development of the commissures of the brain. The certain proof that Genuin Apes, and hence also our own race, are the direct descendants of lemi-apes, is to be found in the comparativ anatomy and the ontogeny of Placental animals.

Nineteenth Stage—Tailed Apes (Menocerca).—Of the two classes of Genuin Apes which developed out of the Semi-apes, it is only the narrow-nosed, or Catarrhini, which are closely related by blood to Man. Our older ancestors from this group probably resembled the still living Nose-apes and Holy-apes (Semnopithecus), which possess jaws and narrow noses like Man, but hav a long tail, and their bodies densely covered with hair. The Tailed Apes with narrow noses (Catarrhini Menocerci) originated out of Semi-apes by the transformation of the jaw, and by the claws on their toes becoming changed into nails; this probably took place as early as the older Tertiary period. The certain proof of our derivation from Tailed Catarrhini is to be found in the comparativ anatomy and the ontogeny of Apes and of Man.

Twentieth Stage—Man-like Apes (Anthropoides).—Of all still living Apes the large tail-less, narrow-nosed Apes, namely, the Orang and Gibbon in Asia, the Gorilla and Chimpanzee in Africa, are most nearly akin to Man. It is probable that these Man-like Apes, or Anthropoides, originated during the Mid-tertiary period, namely, in the Miocene period. They developed out of the Tailed Catarrhini of the preceding stage—with which they essentially agree—by the loss of the tail, the partial loss of the hairy covering, and by the excessiv development of that portion of the brain just above the facial portion of the skull. There do not exist direct human ancestors among the Anthropoides of the present day, but they certainly existed among the unknown extinct Human Apes of the Miocene period. The certain proof of their former existence is furnished by the comparativ anatomy of Man-like Apes and of Man.

Twenty-first Stage—Ape-like Men (Pithecanthropi).—Although the preceding ancestral stage is already so nearly akin to genuin Men that we scarcely require to assume an intermediate connecting stage, still we can look upon the speechless Primeval Men (Alali) as this intermediate link. These Ape-like men, or Pithecanthropi, very probably existed toward the end of the Tertiary period. They originated out of the Man-like Apes, or Anthropoides, by becoming completely habituated to an upright walk, and by the corresponding stronger differentiation of both pairs of legs. The fore hand of the Anthropoides became the human hand, their hinder hand became a foot for walking. Although these Ape-like Men must not merely by the external formation of their bodies, but also by their internal mental development, hav been much more akin to real Men than the Man-like Apes could hav been, yet they did not possess the real and chief characteristic of man, namely, the articulate human language of words, the corresponding development of a higher consciousness, and the formation of ideas. The certain proof that such Primeval Men without the power of speech, or Ape-like Men, must hav preceded men possessing speech, is the result arrived at by an inquiring mind from comparativ philology (from the "comparativ anatomy" of language), and especially from the history of the development of language in every child ("glottal ontogenesis") as well as in every nation ("glottal phylogenesis").

Twenty-second Stage— Men (Homines).— Genuin Men, developed out of the Ape-like Men of the preceding stage by the gradual development of the animal language of sounds into a connected or articulate language, or words. The development of this function, of course, went hand in hand with the development of its organs, namely, the higher differentiation of the larynx and the brain. The transition from speechless Ape-like Men to Genuin or Talking Men probably took place at the beginning of the Quaternary period, namely, in the Diluvial period, but possibly even at an earlier date, in the more recent Tertiary. As, according to the unanimous opinion of most eminent philologists, all human languages are not derived from a common primeval language, we must assume a polyphyletic origin of language, and in accordance with this a polyphyletic transition from speechless Ape-like Men to Genuin Men.

It is now about three months since Mr. Bennett's decease, and it is gratifying to note that THE TRUTH SEEKER, under the management of Mr. Macdonald, shows no falling off in point of interest.

Does Josephus Describe Manahen, Paul's Associate?

Paul and Barnabas on their return from Jerusalem to Antioch, brought with them John, who was surnamed Mark—supposed to be the evangelist Mark, and the nephew of Barnabas (Col. iv, 10).

Now there were in the church at Antioch several prophets and teachers: Barnabas, and Simon called Niger, and Lucius, who was from the city Cyrene (in Africa), and Menaen, a son of the guardians of Herod the Tetrarch, and Saul (Acts xiii, 1, 2).

Of the five prophets and teachers at Antioch, our Saul is the last named. Ten or fifteen years hav elapsed since his conversion, and he is still quite obscure according to Acts. But what do we know of the other four prophets and teachers? Contemporary history is silent, even as to Barnabas. The Epistle ascribed to him by Clement of Alexandria and Origen is now generally regarded as a work of the second century. We might not expect to find a trace of Simon Niger or of Lucius of Cyrene, but why should Josephus take no notice of Menaen, "son of the guardians of Herod the Tetrarch," or, as the Greek version has it, "who had been brought up with Herod the Tetrarch;" or, as in the Vulgate, "Manahen, who was the foster-brother of Herod the Tetrarch?" Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee (Luke iii, 1, 19; ix, 7), otherwise called Herod Antipas, was a son of Herod the Great. He was banished A.D. 39, and his government was assigned to Herod Agrippa I. The Jewish historian givs the minutest details of all the Herods; why does he not mention this foster-brother of Herod Antipas?

The inferential answer is: Because Herod had no such foster-brother.

But the father of Herod Antipas, when a boy, knew a prophet Manahem, and held him always in great esteem. The only difference in the two names is in the last letter—m for n. We now quote from Josephus (Ant. xv, 10, § 5) concerning Manahem and Herod the Great, about 20 B.C.:

"Now there was one of these Essenes whose name was Manahem, who had this testimony, that he not only conducted his life after an excellent manner, but had the foreknowledge of future events given him by God also. This man once saw Herod when he was a child and going to school, and saluted him as king of the Jews; but he, thinking that either he did not know him, or that he was in jest, put him in mind that he was but a private man. But Manahem smiled to himself and clapped him on his back with his hand, and said: 'However that be, thou wilt be king, and wilt begin thy reign happily, for God finds thee worthy of it. And do thou remember the blows that Manahem hath given thee, as being a signal of the change of thy fortune. And truly this will be the best reasoning for thee, that thou love justice (toward men) and piety toward God, and clemency toward thy citizens. Yet do I know how thy whole conduct wilt be—that thou wilt not be such a one; for thou wilt excel all men in happiness and obtain an everlasting reputation, but wilt forget piety and righteousness; and these crimes will not be concealed from God, at the conclusion of thy life, when thou wilt find that he will be mindful of them and punish thee for them.' Now at that time Herod did not at all attend to what Manahem said, as having no hopes of such advancement; but a little afterward, when he was so fortunate as to be advanced to the dignity of king [37 B.C.], and was in the hight of his dominion, he sent for Manahem and asked him how long he should reign. Manahem did not tell him the full length of his reign, wherefore upon that silence of his he asked him further, whether he should reign ten years or not. He replied, 'Yes, twenty; nay, thirty years,' but did not assign the just determinate limit of his reign. Herod was satisfied with these replies, and gave Manahem his hand and dismissed him. And from that time he continued to honor all the Essenes."

If the Manhem of Josephus is not the Manahen of Acts, the parallels are nevertheless most remarkable, to wit:

Manhem of Josephus	Manahen of Acts
Was a prophet and Essene;	Was a prophet and teacher;
Knew Herod the Great when a boy;	Was brought up with Herod's son Antipas;
Is mentioned as living about three years after the great famin of 24–23 B.C.	Is mentioned just after the famin in the reign of Claudius, about A.D. 47.

There appears to be no question of the identity of the name Manaen with the Jewish name Manahem, and some hav conjectured that the Manahen of Acts might hav been a son of Manahem the Essene (St. Paul, by Canon Farrar, p. 182). But the interval between the two would be too great. Manahem the Essene must hav been an adult when Herod the Great was a boy; and Herod was born about 73 B.C. Therefore Manahem the Essene must hav been about the same age as Paul, and it is ridiculous to suppose that a man in his prime A.D. 47 has a father who was born 96 B.C., or earlier.

Josephus mentions another Manahem, a leader of a band of robbers and the son of Judas of Galilee. This Manahem besieged Jerusalem A.D. 66, drove out the Roman soldiers, and killed the high-priest Ananias. Emboldened by this success, he aspired to be king, and marched to the temple in royal garments. But a reaction followed; the people fell upon him and his party, slew many of them, and drove the rest out of the city. Manahem skulked in the suburbs, but was taken and slain (War ii, 17).

If Paul lived in the first century he was contemporary with this Manahem. But no Christian thinks of identifying him as one of Paul's associates.

☞ In our next article we adduce from Josephus a possible if not probable reference to Paul, under the name of Pollio the Pharisee, 37–20 B.C., contemporary with Manahem the Essene. ANTICHRIST.

Disagrees with Mr. Peck About the Soul.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Permit me briefly to reply to some remarks of John Peck contained in an article published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 3d. Under the head of "Infidel Philosophy," he says: "There never was a soul, or mind, or thought, without a physical organization, a nervous system, and a nerve center; and never can be." That is a very positiv assertion. It may be true; but I hold that man, in his present state, is incapable of judging to that extent. "The mind is developed only as the brain is developed." Let us reverse this. It is apparent to me, and I believe it can be clearly proven, that the brain develops only as its activ force, mind, impels it. "It grows with its growth and strengthens with its strength." It may be said that they go hand in hand, but it is evident that mind is at the wheel, and also at the helm, in all well-balanced organizations. I hav observed changes in the disposition and mentality of youths long before the conformation of the form of the head was apparent, although such conformation invariably followed.

It seems quite clear to me that there is a principle of mind or thought—a germ inherent in nature—which, as a motiv, precedes and produces organisms. I cannot conceive of any other mode of procedure. This seems in accordance with the theory of evolution and that of progress. To suppose mind to be the offspring of organization presupposes a creator of organism—or, that inert materials coming in contact produce the beginnings from which motiv first proceeds and then propels the organism up to the point where mind assumes control.

Why not suppose intelligence to be a first principle, as well as to suppose that organism first produces it? We find it in connection with organism; we also observe that it controls organisms. "There may be brain without mind, as in the case of idiots, but never mind without brain." Another positivism. "It is just as idle to talk about a mind or soul after the brain has been dissolved as it would be to expect music from a fiddle after the instrument had been destroyed." There is no analogy between a fiddle and an instrument of mind or an organism. In order for any such comparison we must suppose a germ which develops in the form of a fiddle and plays of its own volition—its music the expression of its feeling and the offspring of its mind.

Christianity Is a Failure.

"A Christian is the highest style of man."—Dr. Young's Night Thoughts.

Many years ago, when I found infinit satisfaction in reading "Night Thoughts," I often thought what a sublime and truthful sentiment was penned by that devout poet when he recorded the above line. But, is it not strange that now, after I hav become gray-headed, I should think that a Christian is the lowest style of man. All my paternal and maternal ancestors, clear way back to Dr. Jonathan Edwards, were devout and zealous Christians; and early in life I was taught that Christianity descended from the great creator, and is as true as the unchangeable laws of nature. During more than fifty years past I exerted myself to be a sincere and intelligent Christian. I was taught, early in life, to pray; and I hav been a praying man for more than fifty years. But I do not pray now. Five times a day, year after year, all through life, I was accustomed to pray to the Christians' God for favors and blessings. But when I look back through my long career, and reflect how much time has been spent praying, and how many thousand prayers I hav offered, I feel surprised at the conclusion, that no instance can be recalled when I was the recipient of any favor or blessing in answer to my prayers which I would not hav received if I had not prayed for it. I believe in the religion of the Bible, which is to help the needy; but that religion is not Christianity.

Prior to the time when I commenced to do my own thinking, and concluded that I didn't need a priest any longer, I thought that Christianity was founded on the truth. But now the entire system seems founded on unmitigated falsehoods. Is it not strange that a man who was bred a Christian, born a Christian, educated to be a Christian, and who always clung to the rotten system until he was more than fifty years old, should come to the sage and philosophic conclusion that he had better save his breath to blow his hot pudding with than to expend it in offering petitions to whom, or to what, he cannot tell, so long as he has never known a single prayer to hav been answered?

Christianity is predicated on the divinity of Christ. I hav sought diligently and prayed earnestly and fervently for light, light, LIGHT. But my vision is bounded by nothing but impenetrable darkness. I cannot compel nor persude myself to believe that Christ was any more than a Jewish rabbi. The fall of man and his redemption appears as absurd to me as it would be for God to kill himself in order to satisfy the justice which might be demanded by himself for violating a law which he himself had made.

A great many professedly good people believe that the creator is the author of laws which it is his high prerogativ to violate; but I cannot so believe. I hav tried to, but it is utterly impossible for me to believe such a palpable absurdity. Ever since I was large enough to read the Bible I hav been studying the subject of conversion and regeneration, and the work of the Holy Spirit in renewing and sanctifying the sinner's heart; but it all seems to be idle, sacerdotal twaddle. I am unable to learn that any part of Christianity is founded on immortal truth.

I make a distinction between Christianity and religion. I am a firm believer in the declaration of the person who wrote the Epistle of Peter (or John): "Pure and undefiled religion is to visit the widow and the fatherless in their afflictions, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." I believe in this kind of religion; but this is not Christianity. My religion consists in doing something toward aiding the needy in solving the great problems of life. I hav honestly embraced the opinion (belief, Christians call it) that a Christian is the lowest style of man.

Christianity fails to satisfy the aspirations and longing desires of thinking and reasoning people. Intelligent people who are competent to investigate and look into the reason of things, discover the fact that the Bible and the creed of Christians is full of errors, contradictions, gross superstitions, false doctrins, false teachings, and marvelous statements of occurrences in which there is no truth. Hence Christianity fails utterly to satisfy honest inquirers after truth. If Christianity were delivered to mortals by the great author of all things, is it not safe to assume that the entire scheme would hav been as perfect and above criticism as the immutable laws of nature?

During all my long life I hav constantly been looking for some intelligent person who would assure me that he was really satisfied with Christianity as it is; but I hav never been able to find such a person. As the light of truth grows brighter and more refulgent, intelligent thinkers lose confidence in Christianity. Is the scheme, then, not an impressiv failure?

Orange, N. J. ESS E. TEE.

"That's the Way the Money Goes, Pop Goes the Weasel."

"Are ye still gittin' pensions?"

This was asked by a rough, unkempt, ignorant-looking man, who held some papers in his hands.

"Not much; they are not giving pensions so easily."

"Well, here I hav the papers, and I am to fix 'em up and git a pension." He showed some circulars of the usual kind sent by Washington claim agencies to urge men to make claims.

"How did you get these papers? Did you write to the men to send them?"

"No, sir-ee; that's jest it. Bill Wyble, he come up to town and got some papers, and he comes to me and says he: 'Jo, you're a-goin' to git some papers.' 'Gosh!' says I; 'you don't tell me.' 'Yes,' says he; 'now, I tell you this day that you're goin' to git some papers from Washington; and,' says he, 'I shouldn't wonder if Bill Beeby and Jack Mowl 'll git some too.' True enough these here papers come."

"What claim hav you for a pension? Did you get shot or hurt?"

"No; but I had the 'flux' once, and I hav fits now—'spells,' I call 'em. I hurted my head ag'in' a rail fence in one of 'em, and I bit my tongue—see that," running out his tongue. "The other fellers has got their papers too."

"What are they going to do?"

"They're a-comin' up soon to put 'em through."

"Did you get the fits in the service?"

"No, sir; never hed a spell till lately."

"But you can't get a pension unless you got disabled while in the war and in the line of duty."

"I'm a used up community. Once I was like these young bucks swellin' around—before I went to war. Now I'm used up. Ain't that enough?"

"No indeed! It will take a lot of proof."

"Then what are these papers sent here for?"

"I will tell you. The men who sent them will get you to file a few papers and go to some expense. After that they will get a half-dollar out of you for postage; next year a dollar, and so on year after year. The more you hav spent the more you will. Each of these Washington firms has thousands of names and gets a big income thus. Congress, to save pensioners from exactions, has made laws that, like all laws of the kind, drove the business from honorable competition, and result in greater evils to the protected."

"But what am I to do about these papers?"

"Do? Do nothing. The papers won't hurt you if you let them alone."

The man went off very much dissatisfied. I found that he afterward got another lot of papers and went to one of these men who naturally get the loose change of foolish or ignorant persons, and who drew up a claim for him for a dollar to cover present costs.

And thus one more out of tens of thousands of pension claims was made. From one learn all, under this system. There are thousands of men to whom the getting of a batch of circulars from Washington is a great event at first—a mystery. "Somebody has told them I ought to hav a pension," they will think. How many also confound the legal right to a pension under the law as it stood up to the end of the service with the gratuities that hav been voted under pretext of pensioning long after the end of the service? One is a right by statuable contract, the other is a gift voted after the service was ended. Is there no limit to the right of Congress to dispose of public money? C. I.

Editorial.

GEORGE CHAINEY has changed the style of This World to an eight-page newspaper form, thus increasing the space at his command. He announces his intention of competing with his older contemporaries in a legitimate shape. The change is an improvement, and we hope will do all Mr. Chainey desires.

This seems to be a good spring for new Liberal papers, and new departures for old ones. Man announces his intention of being henceforth more a newspaper and less an organ. Dr. Williams's Liberal Age has increased its size. Light for Thinkers, a Spiritual paper published in Atlanta, Ga., will double its size next issue. The Radical Review is decidedly a better paper than was the Alliance, and improves with each issue in tolerant tone, and altogether the Liberal cause is looking up in the matter of journals. That they may all prosper is our earnest wish.

THE next parlor meeting of the members and patrons of the Institute of Heredity in and about New York, will be held at Dr. Foote's parlors, 120 Lexington ave., on Thursday evening, March 29th, at 8 o'clock. Prof. Nelson Sizer and Mrs. Lucinda B. Chandler will speak, and it is expected that the meeting will be in many respects unusually interesting. Those interested in the subject are invited by the president and secretary to attend.

AT the Liberal Club on the 23d Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr. will lecture on, "Anything to Beat Bacteria." The lecture will be on the best methods of preventing the spread of germ diseases, and showing the futility and danger of vaccination. Dr. Foote has made these subjects a special study, and will undoubtedly hav something to say about them new to most medical men and interesting to the general public.

THE Spiritualists of Erie, Pa., are to celebrate the thirty-fifth anniversary of Spiritualism, March 31st and April 1st and 2d. J. H. Burnham, of Michigan, Moses Hull, and Mattie E. Hull, of Erie, are to address the meeting. The whole is to close with a dance.

Charles Watts's Lectures.

Sunday, March 18th, was a splendid field day for Liberalism. In the morning Mr. Charles Watts spoke in the new hall at Newark, which the Liberals of that city hav secured for their future home, and elegantly furnished, and this mainly through the impulse of Mr. Watts's addresses; and it was fitting that he should speak the first word in the new hall, which was crowded to its utmost capacity.

From Newark he hastened to Williamsburg, and in the afternoon delivered his noble discourse on "Liberalism—Its Aims and Methods," before the Philosophical Association. It is needless to say that he was received with the warmest applause.

In the evening, at the Liberal Club rooms on Fifteenth street, this city, he gave his farewell lecture before a representativ assembly, in which could be seen the familiar faces of the leaders of our cause—Mr. Wakeman, Stephen Pearl Andrews, Dr. Foote, and the Nestor of American Liberalism, Elizur Wright, of Boston, with others who in many ways hav been foremost in Freethought advancement. The theme of his evening discourse was handled with great clearness and strength, and drew forth the repeated plaudits of the audience. It was one of the best presentations of civilization, its aids and its obstacles, to which we hav ever listened.

He commenced by stating that that condition of society was termed civilized wherein order, justice, freedom, enlightenment, individual rights, and general comfort were obtained. To secure these essentials to civilization it was necessary to hav good laws and also the fair and impartial administration of those laws; to possess political and intellectual liberty; to hav a correct knowledge of the nature and obligations of mutual societarian rights, and to establish a sound system of education, which consisted in the physical, moral, and intellectual training of the human race. Monopoly of power should be destroyed and social recognition should be the heritage of all. General comfort is also a feature of true civilization; each person should hav some of the earth's product, labor should be justly distributed, and wealth properly proportioned. Several misconceptions, said Mr. Watts, existed as the causes of civilization. For instance, some persons alleged that religion was the greatest factor in aiding national progress. That this was not so was evident from the fact that an individual's belief is seldom reflected in his conduct, and orthodox Christianity is positivly opposed to civilization. Several facts and illustrations were given in support of this position. The second misconception was that improved religion has been the cause of a superior civilization, whereas the very reverse is true. Intellectual activity was shown to hav been the cause of religion assuming a higher character, as instanced in the dark ages, in the Protestant Reformation, and also in our own day. This explains how it happens that in educated nations higher forms of religion are to be found. Another misconception alluded to by Mr. Watts was that Christianity had largely contributed to progress on account of its unique moral teachings. It was clearly shown that the New Testament contained nothing new that was of a progressiv character.

Mr. Watts then mentioned that among the principal factors in the promotion of civilization were the natural development of man's intellect; the expansion of mechanical genius; the extension of commerce; the invention of printing; the promulgation of secular knowledge, and the rise and spread of skepticism. Many interesting facts were selected from history in support of the views here taken. The obstacles to civilization were shown to be ignorance, fostered so tenaciously by the church; aristocratic misrule, and religious fanaticism. Mr. Watts traced at great length the evil results of ignorance and class distinctions, and demonstrated that in proportion as theological fanaticism obtained, progress was impeded. This part of the lecture was exceedingly interesting, and embraced an extensiv survey of the struggles endured in seeking to emancipate the human mind from the nightmare of ignorance and superstition.

After paying a glowing tribute to skepticism as a civilizing agency, Mr. Watts concluded with an earnest peroration, urging all to encourage the application of science, to foster unfettered thought, and to hav faith in human effort; thereby people could aid human progress, augment human happiness, and assist in consolidating the noblest civilization of the world.

At the conclusion of the lecture Mrs. Watts gave an exquisit rendering of Hood's "Bridge of Sighs" and Fannie Fern's "Challenge to Men," and showed that while her husband could delineate the splendid thought of this age, she could express the nobleness and beauty of its art. The pathos of that wonderful song of Hood was eloquently given. The young art of America responded in the person of Stella McCarthy, whose piquant elocution quite captured the listeners and gave promis of something brilliant yet to be. Mr. Wakeman then made one of his admirable addresses wherein a few words express so much. He called Mr. Watts an apostle and showed how worthy he was of that name in its noblest meaning. He was like St. Paul of old carrying the gospel from land to land, but a far nobler gospel than that of the ancient apostle—the gospel of liberty, science, and humanity. He was the representativ of the brotherhood of the race, and through his labor the best thought of the world was brought into more living communion.

After Mr. Wakeman we had a pungent talk from that unique reformer Mr. McCarty, who was years ago in London an opponent of Mr. Watts, battling for orthodoxy against all sorts of infidelity; but alas! he was overcome by the logic of his own mind, and when after years of separation Mr. Watts met his old time orthodox foe he found him a most stanch Liberal. Elizur Wright gav us the benediction of his venerable presence and stirring words. The following resolution was unaminously passed:

Resolved, That in the visit of Mr. Charles Watts the Liberals of America hav experienced a rare pleasure and noble stimulation. His able and interesting lectures, his clear presentation of the vital and practical issues of the day, his thorough sympathy with humanity in all its varied struggles, his eloquent appeals to our highest sentiment, through motivs based upon actual knowledge, hav made his labors in our country of inestimable value. We cordially thank him for his strenuous exertions in behalf of human progress. We regret that we cannot giv in outward things a more ample reward for his generous services; but we assure him that in spirit and in mind we would pour upon him the best of gifts, and that we hold in grateful memory the instruction and the inspiration which he has given us by his thoughtful and brilliant discourses. We feel that through him the Liberals of England and America hav struck hands for a more cordial union and more unremitting efforts for the universal advancement of the race.

This was the last time Mr. Watts will speak in New York, as he left last Tuesday for Montreal and Toronto. He will return to this country and sail for London in the "Grecian Monarch" on April 5th. We think that could he remain with us for a year or so and visit the West and Northwest, he would do a great deal to further Liberalism, for his presence inspires an enthusiasm which many other speakers fail to arouse. Wherever he goes he has the people with him. In returning to his home, where bigotry has succeeded in imprisoning another heretic, he will bear with him the esteem of all who hav known him while here.

Our London Letter.

The conflicting and multitudinous sects in this highly-favored Christian land hav for a moment ceased consigning each other to eternal damnation, and to relieve the monotony of mutual recrimination, combined in the more cheerful and pleasant pastime of Infidel-hunting. Now that success has in a measure attended their efforts, and through the instrumentality of a corrupt judge and a packed jury, all the victims of bigotry were convicted, and three of them sentenced to terms of imprisonment, great joy is manifested by all the assembly of psalm-smiters, and though some of the weaker vessels hug themselvs with glee and whisper congratulations in fear and trembling, carefully looking over the shoulder in case an Infidel may be near enough to overhear them and destroy them with a glance, for though they may "place their trust on the rock of ages," they are mighty afraid of the Atheist, especially now they hav it on the authority of the judge, that Atheists are leagued with the devil. It would not greatly surprise some of the superstitious weaklings to hear one morning that the three prisoners had mysteriously disappeared in the night.

That the whole business was carefully planned beforehand appears pretty clear. The corporation of London, perhaps the most corrupt in the world, instituted the preliminary proceedings, and the defendants having been committed for trial, the matter was at once taken up by the public prosecutor on behalf of the government. The application to remove the case to a higher court was heard before two judges. One of them, the infamous North, at once refused it, saying that he intended to try the case himself. The first trial proved abortiv, some of the jury being in favor of an acquittal, and though the most Christian judge did his best to induce them to convict, his efforts were of no avail, and they were discharged. A more complacent jury, acting up to their instructions, found H. Cattell guilty of selling the Freethinker, but with a recommendation to mercy.

The judge had now a fine opportunity for showing his petty malice. He ordered all the defendants to prison, refusing to allow them bail, although they had all appeared when called upon for trial. No doubt his zeal for his almighty fetich will be handsomely rewarded both here and hereafter. The second trial was arranged more carefully; a pious jury was got together, who settled the case before it was heard; one of them was challenged, and admitted saying he intended to giv a verdict against them; he was ordered to leave the box, but another man was ready prepared to take his place. Three heavily-feed barristers appeared on behalf of the crown, but as the costs come out of the taxes, of course expense was not spared. G. W. Foote, and W. J. Ramsay defended themselvs, and H. A. Kemp, employed a barrister, who did him but little good.

The great point made by the prosecution was that the wicked pictures constituting the libels tended to "hurt the conscience and feeling of Christian people." It is doubtless very shocking that a Christian's tender susceptibilities should be offended in any way. Freethinkers hav no feelings, and consequently they cannot be hurt by having as they pass along the streets the lying rubbish called religious tracts thrust into their hands. As Foote said, Freethinkers do not push their literature forward in that manner; if people want it, they must buy it. The delicate and sensitiv believer must be protected from the snares of the wicked Atheist, but the Atheist may be insulted and annoyed by the Christian without obtaining redress. Yesterday one who had been "dipped in the blood" called at the shop of H. Cattell merely for the purpose of telling him that he was sorry he had been discharged under bail bonds to come up for judgment if called upon, and that he had sincerely hoped that he might hav had a long imprisonment. This is a fine specimen of the gentle Christian who does not like to be grieved by blasphemers.

Hannibal Liberals.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I see a letter in your columns from Mr. O'Mahony here, in which he states that Liberals in Hannibal are rather needing help and he thinks of starting a Liberal society here, to help the cause.

There has been a Liberal society in Hannibal known as "The Moralists" for some years, composed of some of our best citizens in town and country. I attended their meetings occasionally for the last several years, and the past fall and winter hav met with them every Sunday afternoon at three o'clock, at their place, No. 9 Broadway. At a summer grove meeting, the local papers stated, there were three hundred present. Mr. O'Mahony was not there, nor did I ever see him at any other of our grove meetings, nor at any other meeting anywhere in town or country, day or night. He livs in town where we meet. I am a farmer, and liv a good way off in the country, and am in poor health, but I hav gone through the driving sleet and snow, and braved the elements for six long miles, almost every Sunday during the past winter, to attend the meetings of this society, and I don't think I hav ever known them in a better or more hopeful condition. Being composed of respectable citizens, the papers all refer to us respectfully and keep a standing notice of our days of meeting, without charge.

A gentleman heretofore known as the most prominent Christian lawyer, while addressing last week the largest audience ever assembled in Hannibal, took occasion to remind the church publicly that the stain of human blood was on their garments.

I hope Brother O'Mahony (who is a respectable merchant here of long standing) will start his Liberal society—and attend its meetings, too.

Lincoln a Spiritualist.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: There seems to be a good deal of agitation over the religious opinions of Abraham Lincoln, and as I always believe in establishing the truth, if possible, upon such as well as all other questions, I will briefly state what I know on this subject.

Mrs. Lincoln visited us in 1872, I think. She came from Waukesha, where she was spending the summer, for the purpose of consulting her husband through Mr. Severance's mediumship. She informed us at that time that Mr. Lincoln and herself were firm believers in Spiritualism; that they first attended a seance in Washington on the recommendation of, and in company with, John Pierpont, who was a friend of theirs; that they received evidence satisfactory to them of spirit return and communion. She further informed us that during the war he kept a clairvoyant medium at the White House, through whom he often learned of the progress and result of battles before they were officially reported; that he consulted them in regard to proposed movements, and relied much upon their advice.

I hope professed Liberals will not adopt the old methods of the church in trying to make persons, by misrepresenting them, appear to hav held opinions they did not.

When Mr. Bennett was here last summer I asked him (before several witnesses) this question: "Are you a Spiritualist?" He replied as frankly, "I am."

Yours for truth, Juliet H. Severance, M.D.

A Reverend Deposed.

The church has discovered that there is something for them to do to keep their skirts clean besides heresy-hunting. While the Philadelphia Conference of the M. E. church is trying to publicly censure the Rev. Cleveland, of Reading, for speaking in a Universalist pulpit, and for speaking his own own honest thought, which is a little in advance of the average preacher, the Lebanon classis of the Reformed church hav tried and condemned the Rev. Alex. S. Keiser, of Pottsville, on three distinct charges—fornication and bastardy, breach of promis to marry, and falsehood. The trial before the classis brought out the facts that while he was attending Ursinus College, Montgomery county, Pa., he formed the acquaintance of Miss Miller, residing at Bower's Station, in the family of Rev. D. K. Humbert. He repeatedly promised to marry her by word and by letter, just as soon as he had finished his course and entered the ministry, and so completely did he secure the confidence of Miss Miller that a bouncing boy was the consequence. This seemed to cool the ardor of the young gentleman, and he went about to be released from his engagement. He had a paper written, and by representing that it was a mere form only to show in case it was brought up against him at his ordination, he succeeded in getting the young lady to sign, again repeating his promis to marry her, releasing him from his engagement. He was admitted to the ministry, but instead of marrying the young lady as he promised, he won the heart of another very estimable lady in Pottsville, where he was stationed. Miss Miller brought suit, and the classis hav expelled him, taking from him his license and his charge. The Berk's county court will attend to the matter further. So I say the church is finding that they hav other matters in hand which demand attention besides heresy.

Will the people never learn that a man is no better for being a preacher? That an entire devotion to God only serves to weaken the honest devotion to mankind which people ought to possess? One of the arguments which the despicable man used to secure his release was, "I know it is hard for you, Lizzie, to bear this; we both did wrong, but it resolves itself to this, I must drop one thing or the other; either drop this thing, which is for a time, or the work in which I am engaged, which is for eternity." Could anything more heartless be uttered? His duty to God interfered with his duty to the young lady. Hence it is plain that the God server is not, and in the nature of things cannot be, true to his fellow-man.

If God don't damn such conduct we must, and continue to damn it until society takes measures to make such things impossible. Legislation has no effect. The laws are severe enough upon such cases if it was of any advantage. The remedy must be sought elsewhere. L. E. H.

Not Sued but Ought to Be.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The following appeared in the last issue of The Truth Seeker, first page: "Father Harkins, a Catholic priest of Springfield, Mass., has been sued by a woman for $10,000 for slander." As I am sure you wish to print only the truth I have written to you to correct the above, and I also send you a paper, the Springfield Republican, where in the Holyoke items you will see that no suit was authorized. The facts of the case as far as I can learn are as follows: Father Harkins is pastor of the St. Jerome Catholic church in this city (not Springfield), and a young girl, Miss Margaret Clune, rented a pew in the church, and when the the last quarter rent was paid she gave up the pew.

For this simple reason (that the young girl could not afford to keep the pew and therefore gave it up) the priest, Rev. P. J. Harkins, made some remarks the very next Sunday in the church, though not giving the name (but well understood by the congregation whom they were meant for) that reflected on her character.

I write this not to defend the priest (as the remarks he made were untruthful, the young girl being respected by all who knew her), but in order that The Truth Seeker cannot be accused of publishing anything untrue even in the least.

The proof would hav to be plain and positiv beyond doubt to secure judgment against that priest before the local judge, as he (the judge) has decided in favor of the above priest before, when public opinion was strong in favor of the plaintiff, which is the reason, I think, that the girl did not sue the priest. The judge's name is W. B. C. Pearsons.

Another Murder through Religious Insanity.

From the Cadez, Ohio, Republican.

Bejamin Ripley, who resides a few miles west of Freeport, this county, killed his wife's cousin, Nathan Bear, on Tuesday morning, this week, while laboring under a fit of insanity.

Mr. Bear and his wife, and little child, had recently come from the West and had been visiting the Ripley family for several days. Mr. Ripley's family consisted of himself, wife, and two little children. Some two or three weeks ago Mr. Ripley had joined church, during a religious revival, and had professed conversion, and his friends had noticed that his mind had seemed unbalanced ever since, and they had made some efforts to divert his attention to other subjects.

On Tuesday morning Ripley arose early and after dressing himself proceeded to the room where Bear and his wife were sleeping. Mrs. Ripley saw that something was wrong, and following hastily urged him to come back. He turned and threatened to kill her, and then proceeding to the bed where Bear was still sleeping, plunged a knife into his neck, making a fatal wound.

Mrs. Bear sprang from the bed and seizing her child ran from the house. Mrs. Ripley grasped one of her children, and another lady who was visiting the family took the other child, and they all ran across the fields in their night clothing—for it was just daylight—to the nearest neighbor's.

The two men were thus left alone in the house, and there is no further testimony as to what was done. When the neighbor's reached the house Bear was found lying just outside the door, dead. The bed where he had been sleeping was saturated with blood, the floor was marked with blood where he had passed through the house, and where he had fallen the blood had gushed from the wound and run a distance of fifteen feet. There was only the one wound.

The greatest excitement prevails in the neighborhood of the tragedy. Ripley was arrested and brought to Cadiz by Officers Harris and Starkey, and is now in jail at this place. He is perfectly quiet, but evidently insane. He admits having committed the murder, but assigns no cause except that something said to him that he must do it. It is a most sad and pitiful affliction, both to his own and the murdered man's family.

Kansas Notes.

In attacking Harper's Ferry John Brown stationed three of his men as pickets a short distance from the armory. One of these was Richard Richardson, known then by another name. Richard is a negro, and did not stay at his post a great while after the firing began. Possibly he thought that "he who fights and runs away may liv to fight another day." At any rate, Richard is still himself, and was introduced to a number of gentlemen a few weeks ago, in Lawyer Hutchins's office. When asked why he ran away he observed with a droll expression of countenance, "Well, when dey was afiren so, I thought it was getten too hot for me and I struck ont." Some one of the company asked him why he and others went on so foolhardy an exploit as to attack so strong a place. He replied with naïveté, "You see we trusted Cap'n Brown, and what he'd say we thought we could do just as he said." "Did you carry your musket with you?" some one interposed. "I didn't carry it fur; I throwed it into the river, and my belt too." Then a broad smile played over his face as he added, "I spose deys both in the bottom of dat river now."

I suggested, "You told the people as you went along that you had just come from Harper's Ferry?" "No sah, no sah, I didn't; I didn't tell nobody; I didn't see any one for a long time; that is, I didn't want anybody to see me as long as I could keep out of sight." "Did you travel on the public roads?" I asked. "No sah, only by night." "What did John Brown wish to do with the firearms if he had captured Harper's Ferry armory?" "I s'pose he was going to giv them to the slaves in the country about there, and den all of us go into the mountains." We asked him many questions, all of which he answered with directness and simplicity. All of our party were absorbingly interested in propounding questions and listening to his replies.

Ossowattamie, the scene of John Brown's war in Kansas, is but a short distance from Paola, where I hav been stopping for several months.

John Brown has been over-estimated. He did but little toward making Kansas a free state. He never was in command of a large body of men—usually less than twelve; and had it not been for his suicidal attack upon Harper's Ferry, never would hav been known except as a free state guerilla. There is no doubt but that Brown led the men who committed the murder of five men in Ossowattomie. Many fruitless denials hav been made of this fact, but there is too much evidence to gainsay it. That his career as a whole had much to do with bringing about the life and death struggle between freedom and slavery, may be conceded; but that old John Brown did much toward making Kansas a free state is a great mistake. And moreover if it had not been for such men as Gov. Robinson, who with others kept the territory at peace with the federal government, such men as Brown and Jim Lane would hav plunged it into war with the United States, and perhaps prevented it from becoming a free state at all.

When the impartial history of the early struggle of Kansas is written, the name of Gov. Charles Robinson will be more highly honored and esteemed than the names of John Brown and Jim Lane.

The Liberal cause needs organization on a secular basis. There is no use of talking; abstract ideas of liberty and justice will meet with assent everywhere, but they do not enthuse the popular mind, and cannot be reduced to organizations, until they are secularized in some form that directly interests the people. Social organizations must hav the immediate welfare of the people as their object before they can become popular. The Liberal League will hav to broaden its base and take in the "rights of the people" in their every-day interests before the League can command attention.

Organizations here in the West mean business, as they relate to the business of society. The Patrons of Husbandry, the Knights of Labor, the Farmers' Alliance, the Confederate Labor Union, and other organizations protectiv of industry and exchange, and hostil to monopoly, are springing up all the time in this part of the country. These orgaizations on behalf of labor are highly significant. They indicate a social revolution going on, while the world is unconscious of the actual process of transformation. The change is nothing more or less than the education of the people up to the point of taking care of themselvs. That all these different orders and organizations are looking toward the rights of man, that is, the working man, as against the monopolist, is a prophecy not difficult to read. Especially is this more evident when we note the great number of organizations, and the vast membership they hav, all pointing in one direction. The people want their burdens lightened, and are thinking of taking the matter in their own hands. W. S. Bell.

That Star of Bethlehem.

In the year 1572 a bright, fiery orb was seen in the constellation of Cassiopeia by thousands of people (it was not discovered by Tycho Brahe, nor by anybody else). It gave great alarm to all the inhabitants around about, because it was feared a great world had been set on fire by some of the gods for the purpose of letting the inhabitants of this planet hav an illustration of the awful doom that would happen to them in the unknown future. Look back 300 years in the history of the world (only 300 years), and behold the world, under the guidance of the Roman Catholics, groping its way through bigotry, ignorance, and superstition. The most pious were seized with great fear, and prayers were offered up amidst the vast gatherings of the people. History does not inform us of the object of the prayers, or whom or what they were addressed to.

In time the excitement abated, and for several years thereafter much speculation was indulged in and many opinions given by the scholars of that age of the world, but they were few and far between. Perhaps the most rational of the many guesses concerning the strange object was that it was one of the great comets which took a journey around Abruchabah (the North Star), and had shot beyond its mark, and had for the first time in the past ages become frightfully visible to the inhabitants of the earth.

No divine of those exciting times ever left a record of the Pilgrim, as Tycho Brahe was pleased to call the stranger. We find not one word about the star of Bethlehem, or that the wonderful thing had ever appeared before. Remember that at that time there were thousands of astrologers, with very few astronomers. The latter searched in vain through all the annals, scripts, and records of astronomical phenomena to learn something concerning the new star. How idiotic for people 2,000 years ago to assert that the shepherds of Palestine, seeing a bright star within thirty degrees of the north pole of the heavens, should giv chase to it, expecting to find a little Jesus born under the said star! But what "euchers" the shepherds is that men here and now credit the fable.

One object of this article is to positivly deny the assertion made in the secular papers that the star of Bethlehem has made its appearance every 315 years, and to challenge proof that it was ever seen before November, 1572, or since that time.

A Local Disturbance.

We hav received the following correspondence from Mrs. Lake, which explains itself. Mrs. Lake's eminent service in the Liberal field givs her the right to be heard, even against one who has done such valiant work in defeating Comstockian machinations as has Dr. Williams.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Will you be so kind as to insert the inclosed communication in the columns of The Truth Seeker at the earliest possible date? I am constrained to ask this favor, not from any desire to parade personal or local affairs before the public, but because I feel that—inasmuch as the Liberal Age is sent to most of your patrons—this unwarranted attack upon the principles of Liberalism and the persons identified therewith ought to be answered, and I know of no other way in which it can be done. Trusting, therefore, that you will giv it space,

I am very truly yours, Mrs. H. S. Lake.

THE COMPLAINT.

The reading public is in receipt of a paper called the Liberal Age, of February date. Therein I find an article headed "A More Perfect Liberal Union," which contains such a number of absolute falsehoods that I make reply, even at the risk of bringing into unmerited prominence a very obscure personage. I refer to T. W. Williams, who publishes the Age in the interest of himself. This man, who, in the article above referred to, suggests to the pioneer men and women of the great Liberal movement that "articles, embodying the principles upon which the League was organized, be drawn up and forwarded to all Liberals throughout the country, inviting them to meet in Milwaukee next Setember, for forming and cementing a more perfect union of the Liberals of the United States;" this man, until a few months since, was entirely unknown to the Liberal world. Old residents of this city, in which he resides, hav never heard of him. While the great contest was going on in the Liberal ranks over the Comstock question, he was quietly compounding remedies for the diseased.

Suddenly, at the time of Mr. Bennett's return from his triumphal tour around the world, it enters into his brain, and that of others, that Milwaukee should do honor to the pilgrim. Accordingly a committee of arrangements was appointed, one of the most activ members of which was Dr. Juliet H. Severance, whose name needs no introduction from me to the great Liberal public, before whom she has, for twenty-five years, been engaged in the very fore front of the battle for liberty. At the last meeting held by the Reception Committee the writer was present, and witnessed one of the most bigoted attempts to belittle woman that it has ever fallen to her lot to observe. Dr. Severance was nominated to preside at the Bennett Reception, but the nomination was met by a vigorous and decided opposition on the part of Dr. Williams and his friends, "because she is a woman." In vain the writer, and others, stated that she was eminently qualified as a parliamentarian, possessed dignity and experience, and a reputation for honorable service in the cause of human rights; all of which they admitted, but insisted that a man was the proper person to preside, whereupon Dr. Severance declined the nomination, and the man was duly nominated and elected; after which Dr. Severance was chosen as vice-president, that it might be fulfilled that "man is the head of the woman, as Christ is the head of the church."

On Mr. Bennett's arrival, he was met by the Committee of Reception, and, during the drive about the city, the subject of his lecture was brought up, and Dr. Williams and his friend insisted that it should be Comstock and his career of crime and cruelty. Mr. Bennett hesitated, but was at last persuaded to giv the lecture desired.

On leaving him at the hotel these gentlemen offered to furnish him with one of his books, that he might refresh his memory, so that nothing should be omitted.

The "disturbing element," to which Dr. Williams alluded in his article, was Dr. Severance; and the disturbance arose from the fact that at the appointed hour for the reception, just as the speakers were to go upon the platform, and the audience had assembled, the duly-elected man president declared that he "could not preside, and would resign in favor of Dr. Williams." The vice-president (Dr. Severance) then stated that if the president refused to act, she should do so; and immediately stepped upon the platform and opened the meeting. Mr. Bennett filled his part of the bill to the letter. In simple and plain language he told the story of Comstock's career; but a large number of the audience were evidently unused to such straightforward dealing with the terrible ulcers which eat into the bosom of society. They began to leave, and had it not been for the tact and skill of Dr. Severance, the meeting would hav terminated most unsatisfactorily. Observing the effect of Mr. Bennett's statements, she suggested that he leave the topic and present some other; but this he seemed unable to do; and after remarking that the subject was evidently offensiv to the audience, he modestly sat down.

Thereupon Dr. Severance called upon the writer, who, thus suddenly and unexpectedly called upon to confront an audience which had already arisen to its feet to depart, came forward, and with all the energy and ability of which she was possessed, presented the question of liberty versus tyranny, and called upon the people to organize, to resist Comstockism, and to sustain the National Liberal League. The result was that forty names were obtained upon the spot, and, the second evening following, these people and others met and organized a League, which was most enthusiastically ushered into being. Money flowed into the treasury, and the greatest harmony seemed to prevail. At a subsequent meeting Dr. Williams was unfortunately elected president, since which time the League has been mainly run by him. He and his friends opposed the suggestion of the lecture committee that Mrs. Lake be invited to giv the "inaugural address" of the League, "because she is a woman;" and, besides, it was necessary that some one should be secured who could "throw a good moral influence upon the community." To this end Dr. Williams wrote, without authority from the League, to Mr. Miln, who declined to speak. Thereupon Dr. Williams invited himself to deliver a series of lectures upon "Moses and the Fall of Christianity." His audience, on the evening that I was present, numbered fourteen, which, I am told, was about the average attendance. These meetings he kept up for some two months or more, during which time he read an essay on the death of the National League, in which he made several statements which were absolute falsehoods, and which I branded as such in a reply published in the leading journal of the city, and afterward copied into Man. Still he continued to hold forth to empty benches, until the treasury, which had been well filled, was nearly exhausted. Meantime, at the solicitation of friends, I engaged to speak Sunday afternoons in the same hall which he was using in the evening. The audiences attending my lectures hav not been very large, but they hav been steadily increasing. The enterprise was begun entirely without money, but is now well supported by subscription. The League funds were used by Dr. Williams and his friends to giv "dissolving views" to empty benches, and the only harm the "disturbing element" has been desirous or able to do has been to get audiences and keep up the meetings. Seeing this could be done by the writer, Dr. Williams and his friends appointed a lecture committee to wait on me, and ascertain my terms for a course of lectures. To this overture I made reply that I would speak for the League if Dr. Williams would resign the office of president; and I called upon him to do so, because he had libeled the National Liberal League and its officers; he had insulted woman, by denying her equality; and had usurped the functions of the lecture committee. He refused to resign, and the sequel was the suspension of the Williams meetings, and the virtual dissolution of the Milwaukee Auxiliary League. This is the state of things at the present time; and now this man, who has sacrificed the welfare of the League to his own personal ambition; who has seen fit to speak of one of its vice-presidents—a lady whose reform work has been of the most telling character, and who is loved and respected by progressiv people everywhere—as an "it," a "disturbing element," etc.; who mentions R. C. Spencer—who was expelled from the National Liberal League, without a dissenting voice, for insulting the men and women who compose it—as one who withdrew from the League, and whom it is desirable to "bring back;" this man, who has "done to death" one of the most promising auxiliaries ever organized, now has the impudence to suggest that his infinit wisdom can be the means of "bringing together, and uniting the Liberal element of the country," and parades himself before the public as a lecturer, a Liberal, and a reformer.

I should not hav replied to his article were it not for the fact that he sends his Liberal Age to the people everywhere, and those who are not here, and do not know the circumstances, are likely to be misled and induced to sustain a paper whose editor deliberately falsifies, and, without cause, attacks men and women who hav sacrificed time, money, and talent for the defense of a principle which he is too obtuse to even vaguely apprehend. Mrs. H. S. Lake.

Moral and Social Science Associations.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: As you hav allowed  to hav a little space to speak in favor of my book, "The Bible of the Religion of Science," I hope you will allow me a little to express my opinion. The design of the book is to show that the sciences teach the true religion, and that a religion based on other premises is a superstition dangerous to the just rights of mankind, and inconsistent with the knowledge of the people of this age, and dangerous to republican liberty and institutions, because they are opposed to the people getting information, and without it and an intelligent people, republics cannot exist.

For more than one hundred years the Infidel people of this country hav had a fair chance to oppose this superstitious religion. The Infidel people denied that the spirits of people lived after the death of the body, or had no faith in it. The religious people had a belief in the existence of the spirits of people in a heaven or hell, the most infamous, cruel, and ridiculous that the untutored mind of man could invent. Yet this ridiculous sophistry had a foundation in fact that made it stronger than all the common sense, worldly principles of the Infidels; and these principles would hav been totally annihilated from the minds of the people by the Christians, as they were in the Dark Ages, if it had not been for the scientists.

The chemists showed that the biblical inspirations did not giv a hint of the true composition of the earth.

The astronomers showed that the earth was a ball, and rolled over every day, and went around the sun every year. Biblical inspiration gave no hint of the truth regarding the uses and movements of the heavenly bodies.

The geologists showed that the earth was millions on millions of years being made and prepared for a good habitation for mankind. Biblical inspiration does not giv a hint that it took more than six days to make it and place man upon it.

The Spiritualists prove that there is no more truth in the biblical statements about the future state of the spirits of mankind in heaven or hell than there is about the composition and making of the heavens and earth. The inspired saints and prophets knew there was a sun, moon, and stars, because they saw them; they knew there was an earth, with men and beasts upon it, because they were with them. But further than this they had no knowledge that benefits mankind now, because it is so mixed up with falsehood and crime. Yet, notwithstanding it is well known that the detailed inspired statements in the Christians' Bible are false, they read them as truth, and the creeds based upon them form the societies and fashions of the day. But it is not generally thought that the priests can maintain their position long, although they hav the purse of the nation and of the wealthy, to a great extent, to uphold them in their societies. And the powers that are working their destruction are the truths that are made known by the sciences. Those persons who say one world at a time hav not manifested any power to associate together, or raise the means that are required to make a strong opposition to spiritual errors and priestly tactics; they may show the mistakes of Moses and the other prophets and gods, but they are not training any one in their moral or social science to meet those trained by the priests in their associations, and they are not raising any money to make scientific associations, where the young can be trained and instructed even about the truths of this world. If there is a world belonging to the Infidels it certainly is not this earth, for wherever you look, there the possessions of the religious people exist—they hav a tax claim on the whole earth where people liv on it.

Some individual Infidels hav some claim on little portions of the earth, but as societies they are as poor as Ethan Allen's devil—they do not own a foot of land in all the earth. They hav surrendered heaven and hell to the Christians, and the Christians hav formed associations to take the earth and hav taken it. The political world was largely under the control of Infidels in this country one century ago, but to-day they hav little or no power. And even the most noted man in the ranks was imprisoned when he had not committed the least crime against the laws, as appears by the court records where he was condemned, and this man was D. M. Bennett. And when a proposition comes to THE TRUTH SEEKER to erect a publishing house to his memory in the city of New York, with a hall for free meetings, the editor thinks it an almost hopeless undertaking because of his experience and the trouble the people hav who attend to one world at a time in paying for Paine Hall in Boston. Now if the superstitious Christians, who attend to two worlds at a time, wanted a church dedicated to some saint, they would raise half a million of dollars in a month or two to build it. I am paying attention to two worlds, the earth we stand on and the spirit world, where I hav many friends, and I hope that the noble hero, D. M. Bennett, is one of them.

Having established my friendship with the spirits of the spirit world, and having received satisfactory evidence that the spirits approve of my works on earth, or at least that we are in agreement in our plans to benefit mankind on earth, I can now devote myself to associations that adopt the best principles and practices to benefit the people of the earth. To benefit earthly people we must hav funds belonging to our associations.

To start such a basis I will put down $1,000, to be paid over to an association that will put in practice the experiments that are required to establish the moral and social sciences. And I think it will be easy to raise $4,000 or $5,000 in Milwaukee, Wis., partly among Spiritualists, who attend to two or more worlds at a time, and partly by members of the Liberal League, who can only attend to one world at a time; the signers to form a Spiritual Liberal League Association, to hav control of the funds raised in that city and state, if thought best. The understanding will be that no funds are to be paid over to the Association unless there is at least $25,000 raised to form such an association in Wisconsin, or $50,000 for Wisconsin and Illinois, or $100,000 for all the Western states and territories, including all west of the Rocky Mountains, or $200,000 for the whole United States, or $500,000 for all the world. My thousand I intend shall be used to establish the moral and social sciences if the Infidels and Spiritualists and friends of humanity will giv of their means a sufficient amount to start such an institution in any part of the world, and we can agree upon the principles to be adopted and the place where they shall be tried, and the persons who shall manage the association.

My report will always come through the First Society of Spiritualists of Milwaukee, Wis., unless I make other arrangements, and to the First Society of Spiritualists of New York city, or to Spiritual alliance, if they undertake such practical work. And my Liberal League associates of Milwaukee will report through their League to the New York Liberal League. Our accounts must be settled by our own society, formed by the signers to the funds in the city of Milwaukee.

All reports should be dated Jan. 1, 1884 for the year 1883. This will enable the donors to determin how much humanity and financial liberality there is in the Spiritual and Liberal ranks, and we shall learn if there is sufficient in all the world to make one good, sound, financial, moral, and social science association, or if there is any place where a smaller institution can be located to advantage, or if a D. M. Bennett fund can be raised to build a useful institution in his name, in memory of his martyrdom to the cause of truth and justice. I wish it understood that when the year closes and it is decided by our Spiritual League of Milwaukee that our subscriptions are due to some moral and social science association, I intend to put up another $1,000 to make another association for like purposes in another state, and so keep on and see if a spirit of liberality in financial gifts can be aroused that will equal the Christians, and be a thousand times more useful.

It should be understood that every local society where funds are collected hav the entire charge of these funds until legally given up, and full power to appropriate them where they think best. After all reports are in about the amounts collected in the states or the world, reports from all sections should be sent to headquarters in New York city, or to any other place that the donors may designate.

People may say much of this money will be lost, fooled away, or unworthily used. This may be true, but there will be some consolation in the thought that one-fourth part of it will do more good if well appropriated in societies than the whole would be in the hands of isolated individuals.

Friends, let us begin to work together for good. Let us learn to combine our efforts to protect the innocent. Let us see if we can make institutions where the poor faithful workers can fairly take care of themselves and oblige the government to do the same to all faithful working people. It may be that societies will hav to set them an example and show them the plan to do it, and it may be that societies cannot do it until laws are made that allow them to do so. If these propositions attract any attention that requires more statements about principles and details, I shall be glad to giv all the information I hav on the subject in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I would especially refer them to chapters xxi and xxii in my book, where I speak of the moral and social sciences. "Is It Our Bennett?"—Ideas of a Spiritualist.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I do not wish to enter into any controversy regarding Elmina's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 10th, entitled, "Is It Our Bennett?" and the reputed communication from him, as a spirit, which appeared in the Banner of Light, but a few facts in that connection seem to be pertinent. As a comfirmed Spiritualist, I had the same doubts about the genuinness of the said communication that Elmina has, when I first read it in the Banner, although I do not agree with her that her first point of objection is a good one. She quotes from the communication the words, "the first spirit I met," and says "he would never hav said that." But if it was from him, and was true, it was just what he would hav said, or belied his life-long record of ever telling the truth as he saw it. I admit the force of her other "points" to hav considerable weight, yet it is undoubtedly true that the incongruity of communications are often due to imperfect control and adaptability of the "machine" to the use of those trying to use it to clearly express their views.

The law of control is but imperfectly understood by the most advanced spirit, leaving something to be learned as in this, our earth-life condition of progress, seeking after knowledge. The school-boy may hav a knowledge of mathematics enough to master the multiplication table, but has got to advance before he can solve problems in algebra and trigonometry, and become an astronomer.

That the reputed communication was not from the spirit of Mr. Bennett, and yet a spirit communication, is in perfect harmony with the teachings of Spiritualism, in fact and phenomena. Hence all well-informed Spiritualists require evidence of personality before giving full credence to communications of this character. Spiritualism teaches that the spirit world is, in one sense, a counterpart of this—a condition of progress, where men and women may grow in knowledge and reap salvation upon their own merits only; that "death" does not necessarily change us into angels of light nor demons of hades; that if the mind here is in the bonds of ignorance, superstition, and bigotry, from the teachings of priestcraft, hatred, and intolerance, it will enter spirit life with all those fetters to progress, and cherish them, until they progress out of that condition, as they might hav done here. What they considered a duty here, they will consider a duty there, until they come within the dawning rays of reason, and begin to free themselvs from earthly environments. Every-day experience proves to all enlightened Spiritualists that there are a great number of people living in the mortal body who do not hesitate, through the most dense ignorance of Spiritualism, to discredit and ridicule its facts and phenomena by the most unscrupulous falsehoods and misrepresentations at their command; and all intelligent Spiritualists understand that they will do the same things as disembodied spirits, until they hav grown out of their condition of ignorance, superstition, and predjudice which they took with them to spirit life. Hence it is not improbable that some of the bitterest enemies of Spiritualism often gain control of sensitiv media to communicate messages for the express purpose of creating a prejudice against the cause in the minds of mortals.

Admitting the phenomenon of materialization, it is not strange that malignant spirits will present themselvs in the names of renowned characters in history—even of myths that the teachings of priestcraft hav taught the world to worship and adore. This world is full of men who put on vestments and make claims of being the special agents and attorneys of an "unknown God," and succeed in making great multitudes their dupes and followers, out of which they make an easy, good living. And why should not the spirit world be full of the same pretenders? Their business here is to deride Spiritualism, to keep the people from a fair and candid investigation of its claims; and, being in the bonds of prejudice and superstition, seeking power to keep their followers, they follow their bent in the spirit sphere.

Just a word on your editorial remarks on the subject of the Banner message. You hav "thought that if Mr. Bennett still has a conscious identity he would come back to his personal and intimate friends whom he loved, and who loved him, rather than to strangers whom he had not known in this life; that he can come to New York as easily as to Philadelphia or Boston, but as yet there is no sign," etc. This is too indefinit for consideration by Spiritualists. What hav his said personal and intimate friends done on their part to afford him the opportunity? Hav they opened the door and bid him welcome? or hav they sat quietly in their arm-chairs waiting for him to open the door and walk in, pro ne nata? Hav they ignored the fact that spirit manifests through matter and in compliance with a natural law? Hav they made light of the "conditions" that spirits require in order to make their individuality and presence known to their personal and intimate friends? They may say they are willing and even anxious for him to "appear" to them at any time, if he can; but hav they manifested a genuin desire on the subject by complying with the requirements that are claimed to be essential? If not, the assertion that "there is no sign as yet," is not treating the subject quite fairly with the many Spiritualists who are and ever hav been among the stanchest friends of Mr. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER.

If the farmer wants a crop he must comply with the "conditions" that nature has made for him—he must plant the seed, and not sit idly in his parlor doing nothing on his part. The photographer requires "conditions" before a picture can be had, and he who ignores "conditions" and the laws of nature, whether he comprehends them or not, will fail of results, being wise in his own conceit.

"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,
Than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

Down in a Coal Mine.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Having spoken many times in Braidwood, Ill., a famous mining town, several of the coal miners, who had been attendants on our Liberal lectures, invited me to visit them in the dark regions below. Mr. John Conboy, Mr. Dale, and Mr. Turner, familiar with the windings of the under world, promised their invaluable aid. Mrs. Conboy and the Lape sisters; their brother, L. Lape, John Conboy and myself were "caged" and lowered away to the bottom of "I" shaft. Little lamps were provided the company, now below surface nearly one hundred feet. For three hours we explored those remains of an ancient forest; soapstone roof; fire-clay floor; three feet thick veins of coal; fern fossils fresh as daisies, but older than the human race, pressed into the soft soil of carboniferous age millions of years ago. Vein by vein did we wander, now walking upright, now almost bent double, miles of streets laid with iron rails, along which little cars, loaded with coal, were hauled by patient mules driven by boys. The small oil lamps, affixed to the front of the miners' caps, were seen flitting about from "room" to "room" in the distance. In such underground cities hundreds of men pass the chief portion of their lives, subject to more dangers than commonly fall to the lot of man, by fire damp, by explosions, by flood.

Little did I think that, in a few weeks from that ramble by the hour through the coal mine, a fearful calamity was impending over one of those same Braidwood shafts, the "Diamond No. 2." On Friday Feb. 16th, after a thaw and rain-fall, a veritable lake had formed over a weak spot of the doomed mine. The leakage grew until the lake above suddenly emptied itself into the excavations beneath; an abandoned portion of the mine was rapidly flooded, the part where the workmen were employed was choked with the rushing torrent, and seventy-three human beings were buried alive. One man with whom I talked saved himself by half a minute, standing near the shaft. A father and his three sons were all drowned together.

To form some idea of the utter loneliness of a coal mine I lagged behind the party with the lights, and remained in a cavern amid a darkness which I could almost feel and a solitude which I could almost hear.

What must hav been the feelings of those poor fellows in rooms, or recesses, only forty feet below the ground, while the roar of the waters filling the mine proclaimed their own certain death! As the cage was lowered, from time to time, "twenty feet high water," "twenty-five feet," "thirty," "forty," at last full to the mouth! As the water rose foot by foot, each victim knowing to almost an absolute certainty that a few minutes more would end his career on earth, what must hav been his feelings? Many of those men believed in the prevailing orthodox superstition, which could hav been no comfort in such an hour of horror, but rather a source of keenest misery. It is bad enough to grapple helplessly with the real horrors of this world; but to superadd the imaginary ones of the next is cruelty to human nature.

Every coal miner earns every dollar he receives twice over; and it seems to me, even at that rate, he shortens his life one-fifth at least. The monopolists get the benefit of his abbreviated existence. The many do the work of the world, the few reap the profits. W. F. JAMIESON.

The Drift of the Times.

The last three months hav been prolific of change in religious opinions and in their expression. The change has been going on gradually for years, but recently various leaders of church thought hav given voice to their doubts and convictions. The Protestant church is composed of two wings, one the retrogressiv, or the stationary; the other the progressiv. The former is headed by such men as Howard Crosby and Rev. Morgan Dix, the latter by Beecher and Newton. The recent attempt in this city to enforce a Puritanical Sunday law called public attention to the position of the different religious organizations, and it brought about the public acceptance by Beecher of evolution as the plan of creation, the apostasy of Newton from the received doctrins of the Episcopal church, and led to a series of sermons by Dr. Dix, in which the old state of man's mental degradation has been reaffirmed. Dix saw the public drifting away from the Bible and the church, and he has endeavored to bring it back. His last sermon was chiefly remarkable from the frank admission of the chaotic condition of the church and the general tendency of the people to break away from its bondage. "I suppose," he says, "that no one can be so blind as not to see one striking sign of the present age. However remarkable our progress, however brilliant our triumphs, however marvelous the changes of the face of the world, something else impresses the thoughtful more deeply than this outside pageantry of material and scientific advance. A movement may be traced everywhere—a drift bearing down men, states, and races. In general features it is one and the same, observe it where you will; in force it varies, but it tends one way. The drift of which I speak is away from religion and toward unbelief. The point toward which it tends is that which large numbers hav reached, and at which even now they are organizing and aiming for appropriate deeds—the point at which man rids himself of the last vestiges of faith in God or love or fear of God, and seeks to erase the name of God from the page of human knowledge and to banish God finally from society and from the world."

By God Mr. Dix undoubtedly means the Jehovah of the Jews, but he fails to giv any reason why men should "love and fear" him. All advance has been made directly in the face and against the wishes of the religionists who fear this vengeful deity. It is because of this brilliant advance in science and material change that the world is discarding this hypothetical creator. The more men know the less they believe. In the times Mr. Dix bewails men knew little, and consequently believed the more. The Western races, in their childhood days, were as credulous as the orientals. It is not to be regretted that they are outgrowing their early faith in the supernatural. When belief was general; when the priest was the only teacher, and fossils like Dr. Dix formed the people's thoughts, there was no material progress. The dark ages of the Western world was the age of faith in the Jewish God, and in the church as the agent of his will. Luther broke the fatal spell with his declaration of the right of private judgment concerning the book-idol, and the grand work has been carried on by heretics ever since. He loosed a mighty force, one of which he had no conception, and made possible the science of to-day. He did not intend it, but he started this growth from God.

Continuing this admission against himself, Dr. Dix said further, after specifying what he called "the portentous signs" in Germany, France, and England: "And what shall be said of our own country? To read thoughtfully the public journals of any one week givs the data for a reply. Chiefly through foreign influence, imported from Germany and France, or under the pressure of the English rationalistic schools, we move along with the general drift. Our young men fall away; our young women lose the attributes of Christian maidenhood; it is thought absurd to be behind the age, to try to hold back when such swarms are flying past us driven by the wind. Here, especially, is going on the disintegration and decay of Protestant Christianity; men look on with sorrow and fear, not knowing what is to come up among the ruins. And still, among us as elsewhere, loud and long swells the cry, 'Away with God, away with God!' The movement of the age is to banish God from the world, to bring religion, with her mysteries, her traditions, and her solemn rituals, to an end; to expel her from view as a degrading superstition. All the world through, men are in revolt against God's word and law; the skeptic, the rationalist, the Agnostic, are making prodigious efforts to direct public opinion, to control the press, and to imbue the community with their principles—honestly, no doubt, and under the impression that Christianity is a superstition, the Bible an uninspired volume, and the church a barrier to progress. They know their own mind and comprehend what they are about. And the leading advocates of women's rights, female suffrage, and similar projects are either in open league with those revolutionists or mute when in their company."

If the leading female suffragists are Infidels, it is because the same intelligence that revolts against the Bible degradation of women sees that it came about through religion, and is enforced by church ritual and practice. Whence do the woman suffragists expect aid and support? From the church and religious people? By no means. From the heretics, from the Infidels, who love liberty and right, and repudiate alike the barbarism of Moses and the tyranny of Paul. Slavery of the body has passed. Slavery of the mind is passing. As no country in which slaves were held could build a substantial material prosperity, so no mental progress can be made by mental serfs. Every science has been fought by the church, and is to-day; a horde of lilliputian churchmen are taking up arms in England against Spencer and Tyndall, and Dr. Dix is crying out that the training of "every girl should be based on the theology of the Incarnation," and "begin with a profession of the Nicene Creed." But in spite of these retrogressionists, the fact still remains that the age is rationalistic and not religious. Dr. Dix reads the signs aright, but instead of conducing to gloom they are the portents of a brighter, freer, and larger future for all civilized countries. The plaintiv cry of the pulpiteers that we are "drifting from God" will not stop the onward movement. If it is necessary to drift from God in order to advance, then God must be left behind, for the great world is bound to go on. It cannot stand still. Stagnation in thought is mental death. Morgan Dix should get on the same shelf with Talmage. These two are about the only men of note near New York who believe the Bible from lid to lid.

The Reformatory.

Concerning the recent attempt to convert the Reformatory on Blackwell's Island into a "Catholic Manufacturing Company," the Independent says:

"We hav a word to say on the principle involved in the effort making to open the House of Refuge, a chartered institution, on Randall's Island, to which the courts often commit juvenil offenders, to unlimited Roman Catholic religious instruction. In this institution a Protestant is chaplain; but Catholic religious services are also provided for those who wish them. The demand is substantially that all children of Catholic parents be put under the special religious control of Catholic priests. This involves a question of religion and the state, not always clearly considered. The state, as such, has no right to interfere at all, by instruction or otherwise, with religion. It does not teach religion, has nothing to do with religion, can only grant full religious liberty. But there are certain classes whom the state does not treat as citizens, but toward whom it must for the time assume the place of a parent. It must support and provide for its army and navy, and equally for its criminals and paupers. It has to supply their physical, mental, and religious wants. The state ordinarily has no right to say when a citizen shall eat bread and when he shall eat potatoes; but it has a right to say what those for whom it is compelled to provide food shall eat. So it has no right to say where the ordinary citizen shall go to church; but, if it thinks it is best for its prisoners and paupers to go to church, it has a right to say where they shall go. In this the state's opinion is final and is controled only by its judgment of what is best for those it supports, on the whole. Religious freedom has no rights here. The only question is, What is best? Generally it will be best to allow as much religious choice to the prisoners or paupers as is consistent with disciplin; but all that is a matter of favor, not of right. A religion, Protestant or Catholic, which cannot keep its adherents from being a charge on the state has no right to complain that they are restricted in religious or any other privileges."

A part of this is eminently fair, but when the Independent says the state must provide for "religious wants" it clearly misunderstands the objects for which the state is constituted. The state may minister to physical, mental, and moral needs, but it has no call to interfere with the religious opinions of the inmates of its prisons. It is necessary for the welfare of the state that a man or woman once convicted of crime be taught to do better, and to that end it is not transcending the province of the state to hav teachers of morals employed to labor with convicts. Especially is it necessary with children confined in "reformatories." True morality should be taught, founded on scientific bases, but sectarian "morality" is of no avail, for what the Catholic regards as wrong the Protestant deems wholly right, and vice versa. The morality laid down in the Bible is no morality at all. If the examples of that book be followed, crime would be rampant. If its teaching be taken, men would be moral only as they expected reward. Christian morality has lamentably failed to prevent crime, and should not be considered a moment in connection with reforming criminals. Natural morality only will stand the test, and that only should be taught. The test of an action is whether it will injure our neighbors or ourselvs. If it will it is wrong. Nature's laws are inexorable, and there is no shifting the burden of sin to the shoulders of another person. The state has no right to say the prisoners shall go to church, for church morality has been proved by centuries of experience to be wrong. Religion has not kept the criminals moral while out of prison and free to go where they please; it cannot make them worse if they are deprived of religion while undergoing punishment. Their offenses are against the state; unless the state can provide a preacher of every denomination of every religion, it must confine its mental care to unreligious moral teachings. It is very absurd to suppose that there is any connection between Christianity and morality, when about ninety-seven of every one hundred criminals are firm believers in its dogmas, and commit sin believing they can escape the moral penalties by throwing it on Jesus when they come to die.

The Rev. Joseph Cook.

The teachings of Paul are the basis of the Protestant church, and the example he set of lying has been closely followed by it to this day. There is something about Christianity that makes it very hard for believers to treat unbelievers fairly or even decently. It seems impossible for a Christian to tell the truth about an Infidel. At his Monday lectureship in Tremont Temple, March 5th, Cook resumed his abuse of Mr. Bennett in the following language as printed in the Christian Advocate and Independent:

"As we separate from this study of a movement which has, perhaps, 200 or 300 small societies to represent it, and scattered over both North and South India, let us notice the opponents and rivals it has had. They are chiefly of late the Theosophists of Bombay. Their creed is a singular compound of Hindoo occult science with occidental forms of Spiritism, Materialism, and Atheism. It is vehemently antichristian at every point. They are led by two American adventurers—Colonel Olcott and Madam Blavatsky. When I was in Bombay there came to that city an American Infidel, only recently imprisoned at Albany for infamous crime. He was the editor of perhaps the foremost Infidel newspaper rag of this continent—a sheet which I hope very few of you ever see, and which deserves to be handled only with the tongs. This man was on trial a few years ago for distributing infamous literature through the mails, and, under our righteous American enactments concerning the subject, was sent to the Albany penitentiary for several months. I saw him on his trial in the court-room in the post-office building in New York city; and when he came to Bombay he at once attacked your humble lecturer, asserting that I had been one of his foremost persecutors. He was received with open arms by the Theosophists, put on their platforms, and furnished with the very best opportunities to attack Christianity in all its aspects. These Theosophists are boasting that they had drawn hundreds of pupils out of the missionary schools. All their documents show that one of their foremost objects is to injure the progress of Christian missions. As the public of India was not acquainted with American vulgar Infidelity, I thought it my duty to expose the career of this jail-bird, and I did so; whereupon, of course, he and his friends came down upon me in great wrath. They sent to this country a number of lying telegraphic dispatches, by which I see the Commonwealth of this city and several other papers hav been misled. It was said, I believe, that I was driven out of Bombay, all of which is utter falsehood. The man came to one of my last lectures, carrying under his coat a horsewhip, which he did not use. [Laughter.] He obtained almost no hearing in Bombay. I was assured that he drew several hundred pupils out of missionary schools in Ceylon. For several days he was on the same ship with me; but he had a position on the front of the vessel, and our paths never crossed. I hav heard of his smiting his hand upon the table with a rage that almost caused the plates to drop upon the floor, when some one asserted that Providence would watch over the ship in a storm, and expressed the hope that God would bring us safely to port. "Why, do you believe in a personal God?" he would exclaim. "That superstition ought to be driven out of the head of every sensible man." He was everywhere in a rage when any man expressed any faith in God or in Christianity. This man obtained little hearing in Japan, if any. I heard of his great disappointments in San Francisco; but, nevertheless, in every city he went he was received with open arms by small coteries of Atheistic or Spiritistic circles, and by those uneasy classes represented by Bradlaughism in Great Britain, and Ingersollism in this country—classes like crooked sticks, so far from straight that they cannot lie still. [Laughter.] I found these people in various parts of the world reading almost the same literature and feeding themselvs with the same atrociously unfair intellectual discussions. Bishop Huntington has said, lately, we need not greatly fear any skeptical movement that we cannot intellectually respect. For that reason I do not fear that vulgar Infidelity deserves large discussion before such an assembly as this. Nevertheless, around the whole world I found this one man received as a hero, and when he challenged me to debate all I could say was that, of course, I would not suffer the platform which honorable gentlemen had given to me to be soiled by the unrepentant tracks of Infidel jail-birds. It is no sign of discretion in a defender of Christianity to rush into debate, of which the object is to advertise vulgar Infidelity. Everywhere I declined to do it, and, thereupon, most misleading dispatches were sent home concerning my position. This man, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in New York, had not been in Bombay a week before the leading newspaper there had to call attention to the circulation of printed documents, promising that infamous literature would be sold to the young, if they would call at a certain street and number. The appearance of advertisments of this atrocious moral poison at the same time with the appearance of this propagandist of Infidelity was an occurrence of great significance. The Times, of India, copied one of Scribner's articles about the man. When he left prison Scribner's published an account of him, and the title of the article was, "The Apotheosis of Dirt." India thus came to understand the Theosophists, for they knew what the career of this Infidel editor had been, and yet locked hands with him in ostentatious public attacks on Christianity."

Meanness appears to hav reached its depth in Jo Cook. Lower than he has gone slander can never descend. And it is perhaps fitting that his ravings should reach his open-mouthed public through the columns of a paper soiled with the dirt of a bogus mine, and another whose publisher's best claim to notoriety is his connection with a notorious adultery case. It would be difficult to find outside of the religious press channels foul enough to print the buffoonery of this quack, this lunatic, who should never hav been released from the asylum to which his own filthy conduct consigned him. He has indeed "become a fool" in glorifying the religion which supports him in his pestilential career. If it is necessary for the spread of Christianity that its chief missionary shall be a blackguard, that he shall return from foreign lands with a report two-thirds lies and the rest braggadocio, then let it be confined to the lands already stupefied by its poison, and to the brains of its present adherents. It can certainly find no narrower coffin. Had not Mr. Bennett been in Bombay, Cook could hav returned and given his own account, uncontradicted, of his visit. The truth was made known, and he satiates his malice with defamation of the dead. Alone he would hav converted the whole of Asia. The religions of races were but phantoms for him to dissolve; the learned Brahmans but schoolboys in his hands. We doubt if there would hav been a solitary Buddhist or Mohammedan left in all the East if Cook could hav returned and recounted his exploits as he wanted. But his Nemesis was with him—one who took care that the truth was known. The western world was apprised of his enormous failure, and the East is yet unconverted. His chance for self-glory is gone, because no one believes what he says.

But the exposer of his vainglorious boasting is now still in death. His lips are speechless, and the hand that smote so heavily lies nerveless at his side. This is Cook's opportunity, and he uses it. For him the tomb has no sanctity, if the occupant be an Infidel. Why should he cease to abuse the man he hopes his God will torment forever? His brutal hatred finds vent in epithets and denunciation. There is no danger in calumniating the dead, and he tells his audience in Boston what he would not dare say in Bombay, where the men he lies about are still living.

As to the character of the book for selling which Mr. Bennett suffered imprisonment, it is enough to say that it is purity itself compared to the Bible. Mr. Bennett was not tried for the book, but the real animus of the prosecution was seen in the district attorney's holding up THE TRUTH SEEKER and "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," to prejudice the jury. The Theosophists of Bombay were well acquainted with these facts, and felt, as did the thousands of New York's citizens who welcomed him back from prison, that in honoring Mr. Bennett they were honoring themselvs by showing their love of liberty and detestation of religious crime. They did not send any telegraphic dispatches, lying or otherwise, to this country. Jo Cook was not driven out of Bombay by force, yet public opinion was such that he felt it better for his reputation to go where no one knew him. The following card, circulated at his last meeting at Bombay, shows the estimation in which the nativ public held his labors:

"The nativ public of Bombay take this opportunity to thank Mr. Joseph Cook for the trouble he has taken to come to Bombay and preach Christianity to the English-speaking nativs and European residents of this great city. But at the same time they think it proper to inform the reverend gentleman that he should not leave them with the idea that his eloquent but flimsy, unargumentativ, and merely rhetorical lectures hav produced any impression whatsoever on their minds, with respect to the truth to Christianity. Many flocked to his lectures merely to witness the magnificent tamasha [show]. Hence the large numbers of hearers he succeeded in obtaining. Let him and his colleagues rest assured that Christianity will never succeed in India. Nothing more need be said. "NATIV PUBLIC VOICE."

When Cook says Mr. Bennett attended one of his lectures with a horsewhip under his coat, he simply lies. Mr. Bennett never thought of personally chastising the blackguard, however richly he deserved a horsewhipping. Cook says "He [Mr. Bennett] obtained almost no hearing in Bombay." This is another positiv lie, for the attendance at the meeting at which Mr. Bennett spoke in answer to Cook was limited only by the capacity of the building, which was crowded to suffocation. At the next lecture which Cook delivered he was more hissed than applauded, and a deputation of nativs was sent to the Theosophical headquarters to ask the founders to reply to his aspersions. In accordance with this wish Col. Olcott and Madam Blavatsky, in company with Captain Banon, who was visiting them at that time, proceeded on the following day to hear Mr. Cook's last lecture. "Their appearance at the Town Hall was greeted with such a thundering and prolonged applause that it must hav stirred up the lecturer's guilty conscience, as he opened his discourse with the cowardly remark to the address of the nativ audience—reminding them 'of the presence of four policemen' at the door of the hall. It was not only in bad taste, but positivly vile, since the nativs only availed themselvs of their legal right to applaud or hiss at their will and pleasure. This bad taste and utter lack of gentlemanly tact and discretion were shown by the Boston lecturer a day later at Poona, with a still greater prominence. Refused by the non-Christian nativs to listen to the Lord's prayer, which he insisted in forcing upon them, Mr. Cook wrathfully advised them to pray to their 'false gods.' Then he quarreled with two of the Christian missionaries present, and insulted the chairman, a respectable European gentleman of Poona, the remarkable lecture coming to a close, to the great delight of the 'heathen' audience, amidst a 'general Christian row,' as the heathen editor of a local paper expressed it."

That Cook left engagements unfilled on account of his exposure by the Theosophical Society is shown by this letter printed in the Philosophic Inquirer:

To the Joint-Recording Secretary of the Theosophical Society,

My Dear Brother: The pamphlets, "The Truth About the Theosophical Society," came just in time. In fact, they traveled with Mr. J. Cook. The same train which brought the pamphlets brought the Boston orator to us. As I wrote to you last night, they were widely distributed among the people here. This morning, as Mr. Cook entered the Mission School, an innocent little school-boy hastened to hand the book to him. He looked at it, exclaimed "Tush!" and seemed terrible disconcerted. Very soon he pleaded engagements in Ceylon, which he said could not be put off on any account. This very afternoon he took the train to Tuticorin without even visiting the mission stations of the district which rejoice in the biblical names of Nazareth, Galilee, Bethlehem, Christianagaram, Mennanapuram (Gospel Town), etc., etc. No Jordan-pura is to be found in the number, as all these pious places are desolate, sandy tracts, studded with scanty palmyras. His evil genius hunted him down to the railway station, where another smiling boy handed to him the same pamphlet as he was taking his seat in the carriage. He exclaimed "Tush," with still more pronounced disgust, and dropped into his box with an air of profound vexation. The missionaries who, before his arrival here, kept trumpeting on all the tones that "Mr. Cook was coming from America, and that now would Theosophy go to the dogs, and Christianity become the religion of India," etc., etc., now mournfully explain to the people that poor Mr. Cook suffers from a sore throat, and therefore goes away without lecturing as he had intended to. It is extraordinary the effect one humble pamphlet can sometimes produce.

And to think that this great American apostle was introduced to our schoolboys as "This gentleman who has come from the far, far West, moved by the purely philanthropic spirit of doing good to you, and at an enormous sacrifice and expense to himself." Yes, he goes to Ceylon, but only to be disappointed, I am afraid, as these pamphlets must hav preceded him, and our Singhalese brothers are not likely to go to sleep over them. Yours fraternally, S. R., F. T. S.

Tinnevelly, March 22, 1882.

The statement that Mr. Bennett got in a rage when anyone asserted the existence of a personal "God" is so supremely foolish that it may be passed without comment. It is only one of Cook's ways of lying.

Mr. Bennett delivered ten lectures in Ceylon, one of which was attended by three thousand people, another by two thousand, and so on, and his lectures were translated into Singhalese. We never heard that any of Cook's were. When leaving Mr. Bennett was given a vote of thanks, an ode was composed in his honor by two young priests, and the following testimonial written and sent to him at Galle:

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Permit us to take the present opportunity of expressing to you our warmest thanks for the able lecture you delivered last night at Panadure. The impressiv manner in which you expressed yourself, and the fairness with which you treated the two systems of religion which formed the basis of your lecture, hav left a deep impression of you in the minds of the many hundreds who heard you last night. Notwithstanding the bickerings of a handful of Christians, who hav always to say something behind the screen, we do assure you that you carry with you a name which will be for a long time remembered by the Ceylon Buddhists.

We regret that your stay in Ceylon is so limited, but hope to see you among us once more.

Wishing you a safe voyage, long life, and success in the laudable work in which you are engaged, we beg to subscribe for ourselvs, and in behalf of the mass of Buddhists,

Dear sir, your most obedient servants,

Mr. Bennett did not attempt to lecture in Japan. He did not understand the language, and was in the country simply as a traveler. The meanness of saying he obtained little if any hearing is thus shown.

What the "disappointment" in San Francisco was we are unable to even guess. He was received in a magnificent manner by the whole-hearted Liberals of California. His tour across the continent was a triumphal procession, ovations awaiting him at every point. The "uneasy classes" are much obliged to Cook for pointing out the difference between them and him. He can lie in any position.

If Cook thinks the literature which Infidels read is so unfair, why did he not present the Christian side of the argument? He had opportunities extended to him at every place. He was challenged in England by Charles Watts and Charles Bradlaugh; in India by Col. Olcott, a nativ gentleman, Mr. Bennett, and Captain Banon, an English Christian gentleman, who was intensely disgusted with his overbearing manner. The miserable evasion that he could not "advertise vulgar Infidelity" is the excuse of a coward. His slur about Infidel jail-birds could not apply to Watts, or Bradlaugh, or Banon, and its use referring to Mr. Bennett is the slime of the serpent.

The insinuation that there was a connection between Mr. Bennett's visit to Bombay and the appearance in a paper of a caution against obscene literature is villainous. We do not know that the caution appeared—we certainly cannot take Cook's word for it—but if it did, it might hav referred to the Bible Cook had with him. That is probably the only obscene book to be found in India to-day, and the church is responsible for its introduction.

The Theosophical Society locked hands with Mr. Bennett because it knew him for what he was, a splendid high-minded opponent of one of the most debasing superstitions that ever tried to fasten itself upon a people. The Theosophists saw the missionaries debauching the morals of the people, and they welcomed with outstretched arms one who could help them enlighten the people. They honored him for his martyrdom, and they knew that nearly every word that Cook said about him was false. Why should they not sustain him? They would hav been as false to the right as the missionaries had they not. If Cook was not one of his foremost persecutors he was at least a willing abettor. We saw him at the trial cheek by jowl with the cur who brought the persecution about, constantly aiding him with suggestions. That he was glad that another Infidel was put behind prison bars no one who knows his cruel nature can doubt. He is a shallow pretender, who talks loud that people may not hav time to reason on what he says. He is a quack in theology, a blunderer in science, and a most unmitigated liar when talking to an audience.

Infidel Philosophy.

Gutenberg, Columbus, and Galileo were the great scientific trinity of modern times. No other three men were ever born to whom we owe a greater debt of gratitude. The first, by the invention of the art of printing, furnished the means by which we were enabled successfully to combat the errors of the church. Without the art of printing, the solid writers and brilliant wits of the last and present centuries could never hav wielded their powerful weapons against the superstition and corruption of the church, nor against its influence.

The second, by the discovery of America, set the world agape and added a cubit to the intellectual stature of man. It made the world look greater and grander, and brought out a new class of thinkers. It expanded the mind of man and put a broad expanse of waters between the church executioner and his victim. It filled a sluggish world with a spirit of enterprise, and aroused it from the nightmare of superstition. As the mind expanded, the influence of the church was narrowed. Men became of too much importance to be burnt, and from that day the decline of the church has been marked and steady. As men ceased to build for the church they began to build for humanity.

The third broke the backbone of the church by showing that the Christian's God did not understand the machinery of the worlds he created. By promulgating the true theory of the solar system he gave the lie to the teaching of an infallible church. His theory taught the people the foolishness of attempting to drive comets from the skies by bulls, excommunications, holy protests, fasting, and prayer. It made the Mosaic account of creation appear like the gibberish of a lunatic. It caused the dogma of the infallibility of the pope to burst like a bombshell in his own camp. It produced a new era in scientific investigation. It brought to man's view so many revolving worlds, and on so grand a scale, that it was evident that God must hav been overworked to turn them all out and get them ready for exhibition in six days. It sounded the milky way, and revealed to man the star-dust of which it is composed. It so increased man's vision that he sent his piercing glance beyond our own cluster of stars millions of trillions of miles into the blue ether, and descried bright and beautiful orbs in clusters and configurations of every conceivable shape and variety. Schools of science began to multiply—the mind of man grew bold, vigorous, and independent; in its zeal for knowledge it forgot or bid defiance to the prison and the fagot, and to-day the church trembles as the halls of science multiply.

What treatment did these mighty men receive at the hand of the church? Gutenberg was persecuted and robbed of all he possessed. Columbus was imprisoned, and Galileo barely escaped the stake in his old age to pine in a prison. Gutenberg, Columbus, and Galileo: all hail the mighty trinity of science! Hosanna in the highest! On earth peace and good will to men.

Every blessing comes from the earth; none are rained down from heaven. All the prayers ever offered never brought a poor widow a peck of potatoes. If the wants of the poor are ever to be alleviated, men must turn their gaze from heaven to earth. Heaven yields no fruit for the hungry, while the earth abounds with it. Industry and foresight are worth more than prayers and blind faith. If people would perform safe sea voyages, they must trust to stanch vessels and able seamen, instead of trusting to an imaginary power to still the tempest. If our children are reared according to the laws of health, "God in his inscrutable providence" will not be likely to "nip the tender buds and take them to himself." It is curious what a passion God shows for little, neglected, exposed, ragged, and half-starved children. We want to strive less to please God, and study more to find out what the welfare of man requires. The kingdom of heaven is too far distant to demand our immediate attention, while the kingdom of man is at hand. Let us build school-houses, and railroads, and telegraph lines, and fill the country with books and papers, and improve the condition of man, and turn our attention to heaven when we get there. Good clothes, healthy food, comfortable houses, love, charity, the fragrance of good deeds, are worth a thousand times more than the dim prospect of sitting upon a thin cloud sometime in the distant future and blowing a penny whistle.

The whole Christian world shed tears over the death of the czar of Russia—at once the most zealous Christian and the greatest despot on the footstool. But there is but little sympathy for the brave thinkers whose souls were fired with the love of liberty whom this Christian despot has doomed to slavery and death in his mining prisons, each one of whom is worth more to the world than all the Christian despots who ever lashed poor human mortals into obedience.

In the village in which I liv there hav recently been built a church and a parsonage, two of the finest buildings in the town. Not one who contributed to build these edifices, to my knowledge, has as fine a residence. Some owe debts contracted for the necessaries of life which they are unable to pay, and liv in houses which indicate squalor and want. This is the result of trying to do more for God, whom we cannot help, than for man, whom we can help. It is rewarding those who do not work with the fruits of the labors of the patient toilers, showing that the aristocracy of heaven is as much opposed to human progress as the aristocracy of earth. If I am to be a slave, let me toil for an earthly rather than a heavenly master. He who toils for a master on earth will hav the consolation of knowing that his labor will confer a favor upon somebody.

Years ago pains and penalties were visited upon those who did not regularly attend church. Here is a bit of information showing the mental slavery of a hundred and fifty years ago: "Whereas, The grand inquest for the body of the county of Suffolk hav upon their oaths presented that Gamaliel Rogers, of Boston, Benjamin Loverage, and Hannah, the wife of Edward Saddler, hav wilfully absented themselvs from the public worship of God, contrary to law," etc.; "these are therefore in his majesty's name to will and require you to attach the bodies of the individuals aforesaid, if they may be found in your precinct, and them convey before one or more of his majesty's justices of the peace in said county of Suffolk, in order to their being secured to make answer to said presentment at the adjournment of the court of general sessions to be holden at Boston, in said county of Suffolk, on Monday, the 28th day of January next, at 9 of the clock of the forenoon of that day."

This is the way men and women were induced to attend church a hundred and fifty years ago. To-day the preacher politely invites, and even entreats, you to attend church. The organ, the fine singing, the handshaking, and the gossip (not the mental spawn of the minister) are the main attractions. This great change for the better has been effected by the sturdy blows of the Infidels. They hav beaten back the foes of freedom, while the enemy has contested the ground inch by inch. This leads me to administer a merited rebuke to a certain class who claim to be Liberals, who are constantly tortured with anxiety for fear somebody will strike a blow that will hurt. These refined philosophers would hav you put on gloves and white slippers, and clothe yourself in purple, and sprinkle yourself with perfume whenever you discuss the dogmas of the church, or allude to superstition, or attempt to show that the tyranny of heaven is the main source of all the tyranny on earth. What would a regiment of such reformers amount to—touching the enemy only with velvet, and furnishing them with beds to lie on? Giv me the clang of battle, or run up the white flag at once and forever consent to be slaves. Legree had no respect for George Shelby until with one well-directed blow young George laid him sprawling in the dust. These delicate Liberals hav yet to learn that crawling on the belly never won a victory. The more determined the fight the sooner the contest will be over. It was not the petitions to King George, but the battles by land and by sea which secured our independence.

JOHN PECK.

More Abolitionists.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of the 4th of November, 1882, is an interesting article written by Mr. George Lynn, of Lockport, Ill., in which he givs a list of leading Abolitionists, Infidels, and others who were in activ life a generation or so since—men who were not afraid to battle for individual rights and help break the chains of all who were fettered in mind or body, no matter whether imposed by church or state, through reverend priest or misnamed legislator.

There are some omissions, and I hav waited hoping that he or some other one would extend the list. No other names being added, I beg leave to place those of Joshua R. Giddings and Samuel J. May. Conspicuous and never to be omitted should be that of Mr. Giddings, of Ohio. The time, the place, and the part that he acted could hardly hav been filled by any other man. He was always ready, could meet any assault, could ward off the blow, and hurl back solid shot, red-hot, aimed at the vitals, and never missed the mark. When questioned by Mr. Mason, of Virginia, in relation to the so-called higher law, Fugitiv Slave act, etc., he replied that no enactment invading the natural law is of any validity whatever; and that any enactment which seeks to take from an innocent human being life or liberty imposes no obligation and confers no authority upon those who would deprive him of either.

Such enactments possess no elements of law, but are gross usurpations of despotic power not delegated to man, are criminal in themselvs, and render those who enact, who sustain, and who execute them accessory to crimes committed under them.

Grander truths were never spoken. On more than one occasion Giddings imperiled his life in advocating what he knew to be right, and he believed the right would yet triumph. From the flourish of knife unsheathed or the muzzle of the pistol he never quailed.

Samuel J. May was a lifelong Abolitionist, Humanitarian, and Radical. In name Unitarian, with the prefix "Rev.," which I think he would hav sold, it being valueless to him, for a consideration as small as that which would hav satisfied Theodore Tilton when he offered his for sale. But, on the other hand, had it been of great value and he could hav realized from its sale, the whole would hav been used in educating, feeding, and clothing, not God's (no irreverence), but man's poor. As compared with Garrison, Giddings, Parker, or Phillips, his way of fighting was the opposit. He was not always fighting wrongs, but always, in his mild and persuasiv way, advocating and defending individual rights and the rights of humanity. Like Paine, he believed in one God and no more, and, like him also, in the "Rights of Man." And I used to think that he did not believe any more than myself that God ever died, or that the devil took him on a high mountain and other dangerous places, and literally made a fool of him; and I still think so. I fancy he would hav agreed with me in this—that a good devil anyway is better than a bad god. And, like Ingersoll, he hated the orthodox hell, and would hav rejoiced with him to hav seen the time "when every poor woman that rocks the cradle and sings a lullaby to her dimpled darling would not be compelled to believe that, ninety-nine chances in a hundred, she was raising kindling-wood for hell."

I write from memory, having no biographical sketch, but think he came to this city more than forty years ago, and died less than ten. For a time it was common for the orthodox clergy to call him Infidel May. When he died the whole city was in mourning.

Notes from the Field.—The Linesville Celebration.

Saturday evening, Jan. 27th, after a journey of over a thousand miles, I reached Linesville, Pa. Here on the following day began a four days' convention and celebration of Thomas Paine's birthday. The opening session was held in League Hall and speeches were made by Judge McCormick, of Franklin, Pa., Prof. Peck, of Chicago, and O. P. Kellogg, of Ohio. In the evening J. E. Remsburg spoke in Opera Hall, where the remaining sessions of the Convention were held.

The regular address of Monday was by Dr. McCormick on evolution. Dr. McCormick is a son of Judge McCormick, and his address was a most scholarly production. Monday being the 146th anniversary of Paine's birth, the evening exercises were consecrated to this patriot's memory. J. E. Remsburg delivered an oration on Paine, which was followed by brief but eloquent tributes from Judge McCormick, O. P. Kellogg, G. W. Baldwin, and others.

Tuesday morning Prof. Peck gav a lecture on evolution. This lecture, together with that of Dr. McCormick of the previous day, constituted a most interesting and exhaustiv exposition of the evolution theory—Prof. Peck dealing principally with its physical, and Dr. McCormick with its sociological aspects. Prof. Peck was followed by Judge McCormick with an entertaining talk on Constructiv Liberalism. Mrs. H. S. Lake, having arrived from Pittsburgh, addressed the meeting at night.

On Wednesday O. P. Kellogg and J. E. Remsburg spoke. In the evening Mrs. Lake read a very able address in support of the Spiritualistic philosophy. At the end of Mrs. Lake's discourse the hall was cleared of chairs and a grand ball, in which nearly one hundred couples participated, closed the celebration.

The Convention was in the estimation of its friends a most decided success. Opening with a good attendance, it grew in size and interest to the close. With the exception of those made by the writer, the addresses were all unexceptionably fine. Prof. Peck dealt orthodoxy many a hard blow; Mrs. Lake was the same eloquent, earnest woman that she ever is; Judge McCormick and his son both pleaded nobly for a higher and a better life; while Kellogg, bright and genial as in years gone by, flashed forth his wit and eloquence with a skill that captivated all.

In addition to the regular addresses of the meeting, a conference was held each day at which many entertaining little speeches were made. As being especially meritorious, I recall those made by President Brooks, Mr. Miller, C. S. Darron, Esq., and G. W. Baldwin, who voiced one of the most brilliant oratorical gems that I hav ever heard.

The music, too, was excellent. For Peck was there and sang as only Peck can sing. Assisting him was Miss Butler, of Linesville, who deftly fingered the organ keys.

Mr. C. B. Brooks, president of the Linesville League, presided. G. W. Baldwin, secretary of the League, was to a large extent the moving spirit of the Convention. Mr. Davis, Mr. Butler, Wm. Min-nely, and other members of the League were untiring in their efforts, while the ladies contributed largely to its success. The banquet spread by them on Wednesday night merited and won the praise of every guest.

A pleasing little episode occurred on the third day of the Convention when Miss Brockway, of Jamestown, Pa., placed on exhibition a large crayon portrait of Ingersoll, the product of her artistic genius. The work is one of rare merit, in some respects the best portrait of the great orator that I hav yet seen. It was purchased by the League and now adorns their hall.

Linesville is a quiet old octogenarian town, nestled amid the hills and pines of northwestern Pennsylvania. It enjoys the reputation of being the chief center of the most thoroughly Liberal section of the state. The immediate cause is not far to seek. This section lies contiguous to and constitutes a part, as it were, of the old hot-bed of abolitionism. Just across the line lived Wade and Giddings. Year after year these hills and valleys reverberated with the notes of freedom. Here Parker Pillsbury, Abby Kelley, Stephen Foster, and other champions of human liberty thundered forth their fiercest denunciations of slavery, and proved the church a "Brotherhood of Thieves." At these old abolition fires the torch of mental liberty was lighted and is still burning. For many a year the Liberals of Linesville hav celebrated the birthday of Thomas Paine, and they hav announced their determination to continue to hold these celebrations so long as Pennsylvania contains a single bigot who refuses to do him justice.

While rendering honor to Paine, the author-hero of the eighteenth century, the Convention did not forget to place a flower upon the new-made grave of the nineteenth century's author-hero, Bennett.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

Theism or Materialism.—Which Supplies the Proof?

[Prof. Swing, of Chicago, recently discoursed against evolution, and the Tribune of that city editorially indorsed the sermon. This communication was written to that paper in reply, but was returned to the writer unused. We take pleasure in giving it to the public.]

"The right of private judgment must no more be surrendered to the scientist than to the theologian. What they ask us to believe they must prove like anybody else."

This eminently fit and pertinent admonition from your editorial, entitled "Swing on Evolution," in last Friday's Tribune, should well be observed by all candid minds, but not even excepting editors and preachers. If it is eminently fair that the scientist should establish and prove beyond doubt the new hypothesis of evolution (as the church still persists in calling it), then, of course, equity and logic impose by inference like duties upon all those demanding this proof, or that the proof for their own dogmas be forthcoming as well.

Has the church complied with this rule of justice? Has it ever held sacred the right of private judgment or presented anything even to prove the hypothesis of a God? If not, why these arbitrary demands that evolution must be absolutety demonstrated; established without a shadow of a doubt; that the "missing links" must all be supplied, and the chain of evidence produced complete, etc., or it will never be worthy of our confidence and support? And all this in face of the fact that the first particle of proof, either direct or indirect, objectiv or subjectiv, for the being of a God, has, as yet, never been forthcoming, and never will be!

The church for centuries has found the only proof for its doctrins in the Bible, and naught outside of it; but now comes Beecher, Swing, Thomas, Savage, and Newton—leading a host of other thoughtful minds—and complacently "relegate to dreamland" this sole proof of a God and the doctrin of special creation, and urge a world of thinking men and women not to repudiate Theism and become Naturalists, but to accept the hypothesis of a new god (though an entirely different conception and absolutely antithetical in outline and attributes to the original, personal God of the Bible) entirely without proof! Evolution, though based on the immutable laws and order of infinit nature, upon myriads of facts not otherwise explainable, upon what we can see and know, all this goes for naught, as the god invented by Beecher, Swing & Co., based only upon bald assumptions, is alone worthy our adoration. And all this opposition to evolution is not so much on account of its insufficiency to prove all its claims, or on account of its unreasonableness, but simply and solely in the interest of this God, and whom, as Swing says, "it threatens to conceal," and whose mission and usefulness, if evolution were established, would indeed be a sad irony and a farce.

If the lesson, then, is always more emphatic when consistant with our practice, it would seem that your reference to the grave and common error of accepting theories without sufficient proof should first be taken home by yourself, the church, and all other believers in that hypothesis which, above all others, is the most improbable, inconceivable, and mysterious, and therefore most emphatically necessitates proof first. But instead of this you persist in violating this most imperativ requirement of philosophic debate, surrender entirely your private judgment, and accept without a shadow of evidence or possibility of a proof, this unwarranted, illogical, mystic hypothesis of a god.

The truth of this assertion may be startling to many, but it can readily be understood by comparing the proofs (if any), the basis and premises, the logic and consistency of the theories respectivly advocated by these new-school theologians and evolutionists.

On the one hand we see men of science like Humboldt, Darwin, Tyndall, Huxley, Spencer, and Haeckel enthusiastically searching within the realms of nature to discover the subtle and potent causes for all cosmic existence and life. They diligently labor among rocks and plants, in seas and bogs, in valleys and caves, at home and in the wilds of an African desert, among the mineral and vegetable products of the present and the fossils of the past, everywhere seeking and tracing, within the realms of the knowable, the true causes producing all these manifold phenomena surrounding us. In and on the earth and beyond it in infinitude, they find the real and true basis for all the physical order and forces of nature. In the laboratory they discover and develop the science of chemistry, demonstrating the absence of inertia, and that each atom represents an atom of vitality and force, which when aggregated and variously combined are capacitated to produce all modes of motion, forms, growth, vegetation, and animal and human life. In the observatory the aided vision soars through space, and they then discover that this little world is but a tiny dot among the infinit number of other and larger worlds, suns, and sun-systems—all but parts of one stupendous infinit universe, itself so vast, so grand, as absolutely to exclude and make impossible anything exterior or superior to it; and all connected by the various forces, permeating and pervading the more subtle material, filling this vast expanse of space between them.

All this they see, know, and to a great extent can comprehend and analyze; and upon this grand system of nature, upon this vast aggregation of reality and of fact, they base their belief, and upon this knowledge, their theories; and, conscious of the absolute invincibility of their premises, they proceed enthusiastically and fearlessly to formulate this new great doctrin of evolution, knowing that if not at first clearly established, it at least comes far nearer a rational probability and a reasonable explanation of all the various phenomena of nature than any other hypothesis yet advanced.

On the other hand, we behold the Theist scornfully denying the claims of the scientist and the possibility of nature existing independent or producing unaided any result whatever. He denies the eternity of matter and force, and repudiates the idea that these contain within themselvs "the promis and potency of all life." Simply because science in comparativly a very short time—and continually aggravated and opposed by ecclesiasticism—has not yet absolutely established the vast chain of evolution from nebulæ to the present conditions of harmony and beauty, and from the homogeneous to the primary germ; and from thence up to man, he audaciously rejects all, and behold! with a bold, desperate effort ignores the tangible and knowable, and leaps with one incredible bound from the realms of nature into the fathomless vortex of nothingness, and there—beyond the material universe, outside of all matter and force, outside of earth, sun, and star, in absolute dark and incomprehensible vacuity—he seeks and finds (in his imagination) an agent or all-potent factor, which he childishly clothes in personality, or at any rate invests with all the personal attributes necessitating a personal organism, and which then, in his simplicity, he calls God, and believes, and asks a world of scientists to believe, that this creature of fancy possesses all-sufficient attributes (1) to exist himself uncreated and all alone during the eternity of beginningless time preceding the supposed beginning or creativ act. (2) That he is possessed of all-sufficient "omnipotence" to create from nothing all the infinit number of worlds, moons, suns, and stars in boundless space. (3) That he can, did, and does create every individual thing—as each blade of grass, flower, tree, crystal, animalcule, whale, bug, bird, worm, snake, cow, horse, elephant, ape, and man—not alone upon our globe (which one would suppose alone would keep him terribly busy), but upon countless millions of other worlds also; and (4) who now manipulates all planets throughout the realms of space and controls the terrible flight within their orbits, even as an engineer rules and governs his engin or a human father his offspring. All this he believes and assumes without proof!

To the Theist all our knowledge of the sciences, clearly demonstrating how the various phenomena are produced without the agency of a God, all this goes for naught, and he believes this matter is but inertia—dead, impotent dirt—incapable, without divine aid, of producing a single effect or phenomenon, but insists that this God, by personal efforts, local application, and mysterious jugglery, creates and causes all things, as a watchmaker makes a watch, only omitting to explain how one person, or one pair of hands, can do the work, apparently necessitating countless millions.

The Theist believes powder explodes, oranges grow, fire burns, medicin cures, and poison kills, not as a necessary result of certain physical causes inherent in matter, but solely by suffrage of "his will," and without "him" instantaneous and universal stand-still would reign supreme. He believes the great all he can see and feel with his senses, all he can dissect and analyze with the scalpel and crucible, all he can infer and comprehend, is impotent to produce any effect whatever and goes for naught in the great economy of nature; but that an imaginary being outside of all, but which all sciences alike ignore and fail to define, a being absolutely without any tangibility to the loftiest human conception—that this something can do all the great all of nature cannot do.

Everything in the universe—the grand sum-total of all existence—the Evolutionist claims as the basis for his belief. All which is left when everything is taken away—nothing! This alone is and ever can be the basis of the Theist's faith. All that is and exists is not God, but matter and force. All outside of all—nothing—this is God!

And introducing a God positivly accomplishes nothing toward a final solution of existing problems and all objections urged against the self-existence of the universe; manifestation of order and harmony, adaptations of means to ends resembling design, etc., etc., may with infinitly greater force be hurled back against this God, who—to be a God and all it implies—of course in turn must embody within himself all the attributes, conditions, and capabilities we now behold in nature, only in a far more exalted degree; and behold by parity of reasoning, and according to the logic of Theists, all these, of course, could also not "come by chance" or exist without a "creator or designer," but would again necessitate another God, and he another, and so on ad infinitum, again and again involving us in a logical anomaly so absurd that all extrication is impossible. It will then be apparent that the Theist assumes, but the Materialist proves all.

The "burden of proof" for a God falls upon the Theist. To disprove the doctrin the Atheist but denies, and God, or tangible evidences of such a being, not being forthcoming, the latter most emphatically "wins the case."

The burden of proof for the eternity and self-existence of the universe, and that matter contains within itself the "promis of all life," falls upon the Materialist, and he challenges the church to deny! His God is nature, magnificent, grand, and supreme; the world, and sun, and placid moon and all the countless stars. To this he points, and behold! the proof is absolute and final.

The simple fact of material existence at the present time supplies the logical and infallible postulate that this existence is eternal, and never was caused or created. The contrary implies non-existence, an eternity of time previous to the supposed creativ act, when all was infinit vacuum, nothing, possessing no attributes or potencies whatever, could never become the cause of something, of everything; therefore, if at any time in the beginningless past nothing—infinit vacuum—had been the actual condition of infinit space, nothing, of course, would be the eternal statu quo or condition of the universe forever and ever.

And again, at the remotest period imaginable, the universe having even then an infinit eternity preceding it, amply sufficient to produce any or all results accomplished at any subsequent period—even those of the present day—it becomes self-evident that it has always presented the same grand general aspect as now; and consequently a first sun, world, or system not thinkable and possible, as this would again imply a starting point—not possible—as such a beginning again implies an eternity preceding it when it did not accomplish anything, as what it did or could not accomplish in an eternity, it of course could never accomplish at any subsequent period, and consequently, in such a case, not exist now. Therefore, while all finite things, forms, beings, and conditions hav a beginning, and severally exist but for a comparativly short period and then again go back to their primary elements, ever ready to mingle with other matter and produce new phenomena, the general aspect of the infinit great whole is and ever must be the same, and the universe—matter and force—therefore the only true great and first cause of all cosmic phenomena and life.

In the very presence, then, of all but absolute proof for the eternity of nature and its capacity to evolve all existing forms from its own inherent potencies, and this indeed sadly "concealing" God forever out of sight and making him a superfluous agent—like a fifth wheel on a vehicle—all cavil must cease, and the Theist must confess that with the Bible overthrown, and with it a blind faith in its teachings, all proof for a God vanishes and the idea must be relegated to realms of fable and fiction.

"What they ask us to believe they must prove like anybody else." The scientist has done his utmost, considering the time and chance he has had and the pious obstacles continually in his way, and he is struggling nobly to complete the vast chain of evidence. Can the Theist say as much? Once universally indorsed, except by an isolated few, the best minds are now fast becoming apostate to this belief. A miracle now alone can save it, and unless, indeed, God himself descend from the skies and present himself to us, when none so blind or obstinate as not to recognize or worship him. If he wants "his children" to know and worship him, let the "omnipotent one" himself furnish the proof. "To him all things are possible." Will he do it? Who expects or believes it? Not even the blatant Talmage or Cook will giv him credit for so much wisdom or power as to commit this single inconvenience, to be universally recognized as the only true God of all. No! they will concede that millions more will hav to go to eternal lakes of fire for their unbelief; for this their God cannot do!

But not one in a thousand has faith in miracles today, and all this but proves that faith in a God is lacking and is giving way to reason and to good sense. The eyes of the people are being opened; they see they hav worshiped idols carved out for us by brutish ancestors thousands of years ago, and are now slowly but surely being "evolved" to a far grander, nobler, and more beautiful religion of nature and humanity. OTTO WETTSTEIN.

Letters from Friends.

CEDAR RAPIDS, Feb. 28, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5—$2.50 to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $2.50 to a Bennett Memorial Hall and home for THE TRUTH SEEKER; and after the work shall hav been commenced on the grand edifice, I will send you $5 more. R. BEDNAR.

LEMARS, March 18, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I send inclosed $2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year; $1.50 for the fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and $1 for the Monument Fund. Allow me here to express my approbation of your management of THE TRUTH SEEKER, especially of your editorial in the issue of Feb. 10th.

Yours for the broadest Liberalism and the least superstition, L. W. SIBLEY.

WILLIAMSBURG, COLORADO, March 9, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.50—$2 50 for my paper this year; the other dollar for the Monument Fund. I would not grudge the old price. I am getting more pleasure in reading THE TRUTH SEEKER than any other paper I read. I hav no words to express my sorrow of the sudden death of Mr. Bennett, the father of this good paper.

L. W. WILLIAMS.

LEETONIA, March, 5, 283.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Please allow me, as an old subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, from the first number in Illinois to the present, to express my heartfelt sympathy for your great loss. I never met Mr. Bennett but once; that was at the Watkins Convention last August, I shall long remember him. I am cheered by the able manner in which you and friend Macdonald conduct our noble TRUTH SEEKER. Consider me a life subscriber.

In this letter find inclosed $13 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year and for your books. I hav $5 for a Bennett Hall.

Sincerely yours, D. STRATTON.

ZANESVILLE, March 3, 1883.

TO MY FRIENDS, MRS. M. W. BENNETT AND EUGENE MACDONALD: I herewith inclose my mite to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the last volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World." My paper is now lying before me ready for to-morrow's (Sunday) reading, and is a very welcome friend, I assure you. I hav perused most of all our late friend's writings ever since his paper was published in Illinois. My library contains and is made up mostly of his writings and books purchased of you, which hav all been read. I feel that you hav nothing to fear in regard to the stability of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It has many friends, and many in the future will fall into the ranks. Your friend, J. BURGESS.

BUTTE CITY, Feb. 25, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Inclosed please find $15, to be applied to new subscribers, and 75 cents please place to my credit until further advised. f

I having left my home in Idaho on the 13th o September last, and in all my rambles through Montana not being able to obtain a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and being constantly on the move, I could not hav any of my TRUTH SEEKERS sent me, I did not hear of the sad news of the death of our noble hero for some five weeks after that sorrow had befallen our Liberal ranks, in which he was the brightest star of them all.

Accept my heartfelt sympathies in the hours of your deep and sad bereavement.

I trust and hope that all good and faithful Liberals will remember the importance of remaining steadfast at the helm of that noble paper which is constantly battling for our cause. Put my name down for $5 for the Bennett Monument (or hall) fund. I am only sorry that I am not able to make it $25.

As soon as I return from Idaho I will try to send you some more subscribers. A. G. PHILLIPS.

ALDRICH, March 2, 282.

MRS. M. W. BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $4—$2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, 50 cents for the "Ghosts," by R. G. Ingersoll, and the "Book of Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh," by our immortal D. M. Bennett. You will hear from me again soon. Thanks to you for sending the paper since my subscription expired. I do not know how I could get along without it, at least in this remote part, where there is no Liberal League and no good lectures to be heard—nothing but the same old stuff about Jesus and his ever-loving kindness, which from my youth I could not swallow. I want you to count me as a Liberal all over. Hoping for success to your valuable paper, and long and happy life to its supporters, I remain Yours till death,

J. W. PARKER.

WHEATLAND, Feb. 28, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me "Answers to Christian Questions and Arguments." I want it to answer the "sky-pilots." I listened to one last night, and he gave THE TRUTH SEEKER readers fits; said that they were not fit to associate with godly men and women, and I thought then that I would as lief be in that warm place with TRUTH SEEKER readers as in that glorious place they talk so much about. He gave Thomas Paine fits also, and all other men that did not believe as he did. I believe his name is McFarlin, of the Southern Methodist church. He said that no decent man or woman would read THE TRUTH SEEKER or the Boston Investigator. But being in God's house, we had to keep our mouth shut or pay a fine for disturbing God's children. Yours truly, C. S. WILLIAMSON.

JORDAN, March 1, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1 for Monument Fund. I hav erected one for our glorious old hero, D. M. Bennett, and Col. Ingersoll, too—as fine pictures as ever hung in any room—side by side. They hang overhead, and the whole family is proud of them. I am proud of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER Long may it liv!

Let the tidal wave of common sense and justice move onward till every cloud of wrong teaching is gone and we hav a clear sky to work under. Come, you old-style Liberals, that hope for a life beyond the grave; that is my hope. But should this prove not to be true, then we hav this consolation: we won't hav to sit up and grieve over it. Come, all! Call yourselvs what you please, let us unite and hav one grand army for one common cause—Liberty.

F. D. MYERS.

LONGMONT, March, 7, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to say a few words in favor of the "Liberal Colony" scheme advertised in your columns:

I indorse it as an honest enterprise. It is planned to render a just equivalent for the small sum exacted from those joining it.

I know its managers, and hav no doubt they will faithfully fulfil their part of all agreements made to settlers. They are good men. I hav seen the land and country in question, and from the standpoint of a farming experience of twenty years in Colorado, can say I believe it to be all claimed for it in the colony circulars.

Inclosed please find $2.50, to pay for my trip with you for 1883 in THE TRUTH SEEKER ship. I purpose remaining by you yet for many years.

Yours truly, M. H. COFFIN.

BRONSON, March 7, 1883.

MRS. BENNETT: I inclose my mite toward building a monument to the memory of the Horace Greeley of American Liberalism. Being away from home, I did not learn of Mr. Bennett's death until several days subsequent to its occurrence. I think that every person is entitled to the possession of at least one superstition. Mine is in regard to dreams. While in dreamland one night I had a vivid vision of Mr. Bennett, and, awaking in the morning, marveled what its significance might be. Only a few days thereafter came the sad news of his decease.

Our hero's leading characteristic was his inimitable, whole-souled faculty of causing his patrons to feel that they were each and all taken into his confidence as equal partners and integers, with each a voice and vote, and entitled to be consulted in the management of the great Freethought movement of modern times. With a lavish hand did he scatter, thick as sands of the ocean, the propagandist evangels of rationalism, which hav taken deep root in the liberty-loving soil of the New World; and though individuals may perish in the conflict, ideas cannot be crucified, but are destined to multiply and make joyful the hearts of the present and future generations.

Though our brave commanding general is gone, his gallant field marshall still holds the fort, and I am pleased to note the fact that the trenchant old TRUTH SEEKER is not retrograding, but really being improved in several respects. Its brilliant and chivalric editor is certainly a host, and destined to make his mark in the expanding field of radical journalism.

Yours, J. FRANCIS RUGGLES.

HELEX, Jan. 15, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed money order for $9, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year and the fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and apply balance as directed.

Allow me to express my grief at the death of Mr. D. M. Bennett, the most influential Liberal in the world, and the grandest and noblest worker that Freethought ever had. Thousands of friends never saw him, but feel his loss as though they had been life-long friends.

May THE TRUTH SEEKER liv and its influence never cease to do good. It is finding its way all over the land, and doing good wherever it goes; and may it still continue to roam in the cause of liberty and justice. It has become a household necessity in my family, and also to thousands of others.

Very respectfully yours, BEN STANTON.

FAIRFIELD, March, 11, 1883.

MRS. MARY W. BENNETT: Inclosed please find $12. Mr. Steven Nasau sends you the following contributions to Mr. Bennett's monument: S. Nasau, $1; B. W. Conant, $1; Joseph Pearce, $1; R. T. Baker, $1; F. C. Tremholm, 50 cts.

Mr. Nasau is one of our strongest and most energetic workers in the cause of Liberalism. He is today, as he has been in the past, a great admirer of D. M. Bennett, and a stanch supporter of THE TRUTH SEEKER. No Liberal in this vicinity felt the loss that Liberalism had met in the death of D. M. Bennett more keenly than Mr. Nasau.

Mr. Nasau sends you his assurance that he deeply sympathizes with you in your affliction, and pledges himself to render all the support in his power to sustain the grand old TRUTH SEEKER so long as it continues to battle so openly and fearlessly and ably in defense of the great cause of mental liberty.

Yours truly, R. F. BAKER.

NEW YORK, March 14, 1883.

MR EDITOR: "Let up" on Talmage—he's God's, so's his Tabernacle. Winding his legs around his neck—using his hands for feet—running his mouth back to his ears, all please the Lord.

Didn't this being, or spirit (don't know which) "call" him? has not this mystery prospered him? Doesn't the Lord dump a thousand dollars a month from the pockets of those who hav been "born again," "washed white," etc., into Talmage's hands? Hasn't this same Lord promised him a musical instrument, and a white robe, as soon as he gets through knocking twelve thousand yearly—or it knocks him?

Isn't Talmage in daily communication with Jehovah and his son? Then isn't it fair to presume that he "works" his holy "rackets" as they bid? When Talmage "worked" the "dives," in the interest of the Lord, didn't he come out without a hair of his head being harmed, while many another man got a black eye, or had his nose spread all over his face? Didn't Talmage know his God (Jehovah) would be there first, and his son with him, and they would protect him? When heaven-bound pilgrims called him a "liar," and tackled him in a church court, didn't he "bounce" the lot?

Enough, Mr. Editor; the Lord backs Talmage; you had better "let up." WILLIAM W. FOSTER.

GRAND LEDGE, March 12, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I want to tell you what I think about matter and things:

I am matter—material—and therefore why should I not be a Materialist? I hav what are called six senses—thinking, seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling, and feeling. I was taught that we had only five senses. The most essential one left out, that is, thinking. I perceive that most people hav the same number of senses that I hav. I think these are the result of the organization of the body, which is matter. I think that all we know anything about is matter, material, and by the different conditions we get all of the forces that are. Now, there is some force in me. I observe it in others. There is force in the animals, there is force in the fowls, and all animal kind. There is force in the vegetables and in the minerals. In the different conditions of matter we discover the different forces. A bar of iron will expand when it is hot, and contract when it is cold. Water when it freezes will expand. So we perceive the kinds of matter and the conditions makes all of the forces that are.

Now there is a certain class of persons trying to teach us about God. They assert that he created matter out of nothing. I discover that matter is here. God is nowhere be to found. They say he is a spirit. I do not know any more about a spirit than a God. I think that there are many words used that cannot be defined. They tell us about the devil made from a fallen angel. Now, I don't know anything about either of them. I hav seen the description of an angel that was a female with wings, but I never got acquainted with that kind of bird. Then they tell us about souls and ghosts, and especially the Holy Ghost, which is said to be the father of Christ.

I think these words and many others cannot be defined. They are myths and words without any meaning. They are words that are calculated to deceive and mislead the people. I think if we would use words that we can define and understand our civilization would improve much faster, and we would be a more happy people.

Yours, HARRISON HALBERT.

BANGOR, Feb. 27, 283.

EDITOR OF THE ABLEST AND BEST LIBERAL PAPER PUBLISHED: Please excuse so long delay of payment. Inclosed find $5, for which giv me credit. I am away from home most of the time, seeing my paper but seldom, and yet I am not isolated from communion in thought with THE TRUTH SEEKER, with its numerous and able writers.

The news of the death of our mourned editor, D. M. Bennett, came to me from one of your readers in northern Maine. How much I felt the blow! Men and minds will miss him—how greatly miss him! However much he may be missed he will never be forgotten. The grandest of freedom's monuments is erected by the immortal Bennett!

Bro. F. F. Follett speaks of Liberals who dare not speak their belief for fear of social ostracism. The more ostracism I get, the more Liberal I am. I am a Liberal from principle; it is taking the body out of priestcraft and bondage, and the masses into present enjoyment, higher culture, and ennobling manhood.

Christian prayers hav in several cases (in this section) been returned unanswered, and yet they say prayers are all answered. I like "sticktuitivness," but I am at times forced to say, with Puck, "What fools these mortals be!" F. F. PHILLIPS.

EASTMANVILLE, March 6, 1882.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: I hav thought every week since your noble husband's death that I would write a short letter, letting you know there is at least one family—consisting of myself and wife and the good wife's good sister—who often, yes, daily, and I might say at almost every meal time, hav some words of sympathy for you, and expression of sadness—deep sadness—for the loss of our dear Brother Bennett. When I read the many kind and sympathetic letters to you, I sometimes think it is no use for me to try to say one word; my feelings hav all been expressed in kinder and in better language than I can possibly use. But one thing I must say, I cannot, even to this evening, read the funeral obsequies of our brother without my whole frame quivering, my throat choking full, and my eyes pressed to overflowing with hot tears; and this reminds me of the letter from Brother Syphers. That I tried to read to a Liberal friend who is stopping with us to-night. I thought I could read that letter through to my friend and not show any perceptible emotion. I read very well through the sentence, "Sleep, my brother, in Greenwood, sleep," although I felt the pressure coming; but when I got to the sentence, "Farewell, my brother, a long, a long farewell," I was obliged to succumb.

Don't think for a moment that ours is the only family that sympathizes with you in the loss of the husband and brother. There are scores of persons, and the more intelligent ones they are, who feel deeply the departure of that noble one.

We hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for nearly four years, and we intend to continue on as long as we can pay for it, and we hope we can get some others to take it also. We think the paper is in good hands. I like Eugene very much. I remember he is willing to "fight for another's right to differ with him." Still, again, we feel glad to think we can spare a small amount to help erect a fitting monument to the memory of one who has done so much to scatter Freethought and to expose that greatest of earth's frauds—Christianity. Please accept $5 for the Monument Fund from Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Amigh. And now, may the kindest of earth's best blessings ever be your lot. GEO. W. AMIGH.

OSCEOLA, March 7, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I thank the editor of the Blade for the notoriety given to my rebuke for his slanderous pen attempting to defame the name of the dead. To taint the moral atmosphere surrounding the life of one of the best men that ever inhaled the only principle of conscious thought, can only be pepetrated by an inhuman monster.

Several friends of the Blade, and others, hav written me letters of congratulation for the manner I dealt with the editor and his paper. The following are a few extracts, verbatim:

"I cannot forbear the offer of my hand upon your prompt and manly rebuke to the editor of the Blade for his incomprehensible, wholly unexcusable, and indecent assault upon the dead, D. M. Bennett."

"The editor of the Blade, though well enough in some respects, has made an ass of himself by attempting to defame the name of the dead."

"I should think any one who can reason must know, if they are capable of knowing anything, that the charge of filthiness against D. M. Bennett is wholly false. One of the books in question, for the sale of which some hav attempted to blacken his name, is a standard and most valuable work, written by a universally respected physician, who bore an established character while, I presume, the editor of the Blade was in his frocks and aprons."

"Now, friend Hastings, supposing the charge was true, and D. M. Bennett had brought reproach upon Freethought by 'filthiness,' would any decent man go wholly out of his way to despoil the body of the vilest malefactor—a general cry of abhorrence and disgust would greet such an act."

"When D. M. Bennett died," says the Toledo Blade, "we gave him a 'cordial send-off' to his place of future abode. This seemed to excite the minds of sundry gentlemen who 'describe' themselvs as 'Freethinkers,' but who are unpleasantly free from capacity to think logically on any subject."

Hold on a moment, Mr. Editor. I desire to inform you that I perceive that you are unpleasantly free, also, from capacity of mental discrimination, though you seem to hav capacity of mind sufficiently developed to be able to comprehend the logical reasoning of my mind and the correctness of its deductions, although the framing of my sentence was far from being logical. Now, then, a capacity to think logically, and a capacity to express logical thoughts in fine, logical sentences, are two distinct capacities; the former is in brain organization—inherent; the latter is acquired.

Am I right, Mr. Editor. If so, please award to me the great honor of being a reasonable (logical) Freethinker, though I make many editorial blunders in the construction of sentences.

Now, in conclusion, let me urge upon the editor of the Blade the importance of producing good and sufficient evidence to sustain his inhuman charge of filthiness against D. M. Bennett. Should he fail in his attempt, I shall let loose my "bloodhound" upon his track, and run him to hole.

Respectfully, L. M. HASTINGS.

HOUTZDALE SENSATION.—THE DEVIL AMONG THE SAINTS.

OSCEOLA MILLS.

MR. EDITOR: Last Sunday (4th inst.) the devil, or that old serpent called Satan, was let loose for a season, and started a lively rampage in the Houtzdale, Pa., M. E. church during the session of Sunday-school.

A Mr. Rhoads, follower of the meek and lowly Jesus, was elected superintendent of the school at a previous meeting, but perhaps for the reason that he is an M.D. the supreme court, or conference of the church, refused to indorse his election, and ordered a new ballot to be taken, which resulted as before. The good pastor, however, refused to count the doctor's votes, or, in other words, counted the Esculapian out of the ring.

During the week the Lord inspired the good pastor of the flock to call a meeting of the "board," before which he ardently and earnestly protested against the confirmation of the aforesaid Dr. Rhoads. The board of trustees was "packed," and after due deliberation a Christian police force, to be commanded by a constable, was appointed to look after the aforesaid doctor should he attempt to dish out catechism to the young sinners of Houtzdale.

Sunday came, with wind and snow—fit omens of the godly storm brewing in the halls and galleries of the great Wesleyan God-house. Wicked worldlings, having heard of the expected battle of the saints, crowded the sanctuary to overflowing. Pastor Wilson called the assembly to order, offered a short, off-hand prayer as a fit introductory to the coming storm, and seated himself behind the pulpit. Dr. Rhoads then rang his little bell, and was about to commence the exercises when Shepherd Wilson arose and declared in the name of the Lord that Rhoads had no business there and must retire.

At this juncture the doctor curtly intimated to the beloved parson that he had better sit down and sheet his jib, whereupon Mr. Harpster, the Lord's musician, boldly struck his organ keys to the tune of "Hold the Fort," in which he was vocally joined by the youthful sinners of the town. Then arose Shepherd Wilson, of the Lord's fold, calling on the police to do their duty in the name of Jehovah and the American Congress, but the godly guardians of law and order couldn't see the point. Just then, Mr. Lindsey, a humble follower of Christ, attempted to lock the organ, but with a gentle punch of his fist, Mr. Harpster told the intruder to "get down and git." Hereupon the former gentleman appealed to the police, who came forward in a body to suppress the raging tumult, when Dr. Rhoads again rang the bell and dismissed the school. Most of the little saints and sinners retired from the Lord's house weeping and howling in a piteous manner, Satan retiring also with the crowd. But the end is not yet. Next morning some of the brethren went to Clearfield to consult brother lawyer Murray with a view of settling the disturbance before a legal tribunal.

Worldly sinners behold the scene, believing that Satan, the boss of demons, has been untied for a little season, and Infidels point to the godly menagerie as proof more strong than holy writ, that God moves in a mysterious way,

His blunders to perform,
He gets up many an ugly breeze,
And many a howling storm.

Yours truly, J. W. SCOTT.

A MISSIONARY'S EXPERIENCE.

BELVIDERE, March 4, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I am very much obliged to you for your very able and convincing reply to the Christian argument that "belief is the safest." Your reply is what I call a clincher. As I hav lately been very much beset by Christians in religious discussions, I think it would be very handy for me to hav "Answers to Christian Questions," by D. M. Bennett, so please send it to me; inclosed you will find 25 cents for it.

Yesterday I spent two or three hours in discussion with some Christians. As I was alone, you may depend I had a pretty tough time of it. Among them was a conceited and hot-headed young man, who was quite confident that he knew all about it. "Evolution versus Creation" was our theme. I was trying to show that the theory of creation was a mathematical absurdity—thus: "twice two are four" is a mathematical truth, while "twice two are five" is an untruth; yet it harmonizes with the argument of creation, for it is making something out of nothing. Reason, science, and mathematics demonstrate to us that twice nothing always will be nothing, but the theory of creation asserts that twice nothing is one, and "a great dale more," as an Irishman said. Now, this assertion is nothing more nor less than a mathematical absurdity. I had great difficulty in stating these truths, for my young friend kept constantly interrupting me by demanding that I should prove every sentence that I uttered. "Prove it! prove it!" was his cry. Now, proof is a thing that I do admire, but when he wanted me to prove that Paine or Washington ever existed, or that anything existed, I thought his demand rather uncalled for, for they were self-evident truths, and truths that no one questioned or denied. He wanted to know, "If man was not created, then where did he come from?" I talked evolution to him, but he would not let me proceed with a sentence but he must hav proof. "What was man made of?" he asked. "Dirt, I replied. "Prove it!" he demanded. When I tried to comply with his demands he would interrupt me by exclaiming, "Now I hav caught you—ha, ha! now I hav caught you." I soon perceived that it was useless to proceed any further with our discussion, unless I adopted his own style of tactics. "My young friend," I said, "if your object in discussing with me is simply a desire to trip me up in my words—to play a sort of catch game—that is, to 'catch' me, as you say; if your object is not a sincere desire to discover the truth and nothing but the truth, then I must say your object is a most contemptible one. Now, to show you the difficulty and embarrassment you will experience in proving or disproving unquestioned facts in the way that you demand of me, just proceed to prove that you are a man and not a horse." He hemmed and hawed, and looked very much embarrassed. "Go ahead," I said; "why do you hesitate?" "Why," said he, "I know that I am not a horse, and everybody knows it." "Hold on!" I said; "no dodging. I want you to prove it." As he was trapped in his own trap, he declined to prove himself a man. Then I tried to show him the silliness of wasting our time in quibbling about self-evident facts, or proving truths that no one denies. After this he was not quite so rampant; still he ventured to ask me where my style of views would lead me to, or what benefit they would confer to the world. I told him that I had faith and confidence that reason, science, and truth ever hav and ever will confer to the world the greatest possible benefit, and that they hav proved tenfold greater blessings to mankind than Christianity; and that our glorious liberties, which we brag so much about, we hav to thank rationalism for; and that I was not afraid to follow the light of reason and science, or the star of truth, even though they seemed to lead to the very gates of hell itself. "Oh, yes," it is all very well to talk, but what good did it do for Thomas Paine? Just see how the poor wretch died!" "Well, how did he die?" I asked. "Why, he died a most horrible death. He kept crying, 'O God, hav mercy on me! O God, save my poor soul!' Then he would murmur, 'But there is no God; I hav no soul.'" I asked him where he got his information. He said his authority was good and could not be disputed. "Then," said I, "from what you say we would judge that Paine did not believe in a God." "Certainly he did not," my friend said. I asked him what he thought Paine's religious views were. "Why," said he, "Paine was an Infidel. He did not believe in a God, or a future life, or anything." I then inquired if he had ever read Paine's "Age of Reason." "No, indeed," he said. "Well, then, my friend," I said, "in order to find out how much your mind has been abused by lying priestcraft, just read Paine's 'Age of Reason,' and then you will discover that Paine believed in a God, and also a future life." I then gave him a history of Paine and his belief, and also of the infernal slanders that priests hav been constantly telling about him. I told him about the reward that Ingersoll had offered to any man that could substantiate any of those slanders, and how Dr. Prime, of the New York Observer, had undertaken to do so, and how ingloriously he had failed. In short, I talked to my young friend like a father, and when I had got through with him I found that my other Christian opponents had retired. Then I parted with my young friend in a very friendly manner—indeed much more so than I thought we would at one stage of our discussion.

I hav found out by experience that it pays well to get hold of these young men and just talk to them—not in a way that will excite their combativness and a vain desire to come out ahead in a discussion, but rather in a friendly and fatherly way, that will hav a tendency to excite in them an earnest desire after truth. Yours truly, ROBERT SWAIL.

Poetry.

Two Women.

A grandma sits in her great arm-chair,
Balmy sweet is the soft spring air.

Through the latticed, lilac-shadowed pane
She looks to the orchard beyond the lane;

And she catches the gleam of a woman's dress,
As it flutters about in the wind's caress.

"That child is glad as the day is long—
Her lover's coming, her life's a song!"

Up from the orchard's flowery bloom
Floats fragrance faint to the darkening room,

Where grandma dreams till a tender grace
And a softer light steal into her face;

For once again she is young and fair,
And twining roses in her hair.

Once again, blithe as the lark above,
She is only a girl—and a girl in love!

The years drop from their weary pain;
She is clasped in her lover's arms again!

The last faint glimmers of daylight die;
Stars tremble out of the purple sky,

Ere Dora flits up the garden path,
Sadly afraid of grandma's wrath.

With rose-red cheeks and flying hair,
She nestles down by the old arm-chair.

"Grandma, Dick says, may we—may—I—"
The faltering voice grows strangely shy.

But grandma presses the little hand;
"Yes, my dearie, I understand!

"He may hav you, darling!" Not all in vain
Did grandma dream she was young again.

She gently twists a shining curl;
"Ah, me! the philosophy of a girl!

"Take the world's treasures—its noblest, best—
And love will outweigh all the rest."

And through the casement the moonlight cold
Streams on two heads—one gray, one gold.

The Two Glasses.

There sat two glasses, filled to the brim,
On a rich man's table, rim to rim;
One was ruddy and red as blood,
And one as clear as the crystal flood.

Said the glass of wine to the paler brother,
"Let us tell the tales of the past to each other.
I can tell of banquet and revel and mirth,
And the proudest and grandest souls on earth
Fell under my touch as though struck by blight,
Where I was a king, for I ruled in might.
From the heads of kings I hav torn the crown,
From the hights of fame I hav hurled men down;
I hav blasted many an honored name;
I hav taken virtue and given shame;
I hav tempted the youth with a sip, a taste,
That has made his future a barren waste.
Far greater than any king am I,
Or than any army beneath the sky.
I hav made the arm of the driver fail,
And sent the train from the iron rail.
I hav made good ships go down at sea,
And the shrieks of the lost were sweet to me;
For they said, 'Behold, how great you be!
Fame, strength, wealth, genius, before you fall,
For your might and power are over all!'
Ho! ho! pale brother," laughed the wine,
"Can you boast of deeds as great as mine?"

Said the water glass, "I cannot boast
Of a king dethroned or a murdered host;
But I can tell of a heart, once sad,
By my crystal drops made light and glad—
Of thirsts I've quenched, of brows I've laved,
Of hands I hav cooled, and souls I hav saved.
I hav leaped through the valley, dashed down the mountain,
Flowed in the river and played in the fountain,
Slept in the sunshine and dropped from the sky,
And everywhere gladdened the landscape and eye.
I hav eased the hot forehead of fever and pain;
I hav made the parched meadows grow fertil with grain;
I can tell of the powerful wheel of the mill
That ground out flour and turned at my will;
I can tell of manhood debased by you
That I lifted up and crowned anew.
I cheer, I help, I strengthen, and aid;
I gladden the heart of man and maid;
I set the chain-wine captiv free,
And all are better for knowing me."

These are the tales they told each other—
The glass of wine and its paler brother—
As they sat together, filled to the brim,
On the rich man's table, rim to rim.

The Bad Boy and His Parrot.

From Peck's Sun.

"You don't want to buy a good parrot, do you?" said the bad boy to the grocery man, as he put his wet mittens on the top of the stove to dry, and kept his back to the stove so he could watch the grocery man and be prepared for a kick, if the man should remember the rotten egg sign that the boy put up in front of the grocery last week.

"Naw, I don't want no parrot. I had rather hav a fool boy around than a parrot. But what's the matter with your ma's parrot? I thought she wouldn't part with it for anything."

"Well, she wouldn't, until Wednesday night, but now she says she will not hav him around, and I may hav half I can get for it. Ma has been away from home for a week, having a high old time in Chicago, going to theaters and things, and while she was gone I guess the hired girl or somebody learned the parrot some new things to say. A parrot that can only say 'Polly wants a cracker' don't amount to anything. What we need now is new style parrots that can converse on the topics of the day, and say things original. Well, when ma got back I guess her conscience hurt her for the way she had been carrying on in Chicago, and so when she heard the basement of the church was being frescoed she invited the committee to hold the Wednesday evening prayer meeting at our house. First, there were four people came, and ma asked pa to stay to make up a quorum, and pa said seeing he had two pair, he guessed he would stay in, and if ma would deal him a queen he would hav a full hand. I don't know what pa meant, but he plays draw poker sometimes. Anyway, there was eleven people came, including the minister, and after they had talked about neighbors a spell, and ma had shown the women a new tidy she had worked for the heathen, with a motto on it which pa had taught her, 'A contrite heart beats a bob-tailed flush,' and pa had talked to the men about a religious silver mine he was selling stock in, which he advised them as a friend to buy for the glory of the church, they all went in the back parlor and the minister led in prayer. He got down on his knees right under the parrot's cage, and you'd a dide to see Polly hang on to the wires of the cage with one foot and drop an apple core on the minister's head. Ma shook her handkerchief at Polly, and looked sassy, and Polly got up on the perch and as the minister got warned up, and began to raise the roof, Polly said, 'Oh, dry up.' The minister had his eyes shut, but he opened one of them a little and looked at pa. Pa was tickled at the parrot, but when the minister looked at pa, as though it was him that was making irreverent remarks, pa was mad. The minister got to the 'Amen' and Polly shook hisself and said, 'What you giving us?' and the minister got up and brushed the bird seed off his knees, and he looked mad. I thought ma would sink with mortification, and I was sitting on a piano stool, looking as pious as a Sunday-school superintendent the Sunday before he skips out with the bank funds, and ma looked at me as though she thought it was me that had been tampering with the parrot. Gosh, I never said a word to that parrot, and I can prove it by my chum. Well, the minister asked one of the sisters if she wouldn't pray, and she wasn't engaged, so she said with pleasure, and she kneeled down, but she corked herself, cause she got one knee on a cast iron dumb bell that I had been practicing with. She said 'O my,' in a disgusted sort of way, and then she began to pray for the reformation of the youth of the land, and asked for the spirit to descend on the household, and particularly on the boy that was such a care and anxiety to his parents, and just then Polly said, 'Oh, pull down your vest.' Well, you'd a dide to see that woman look at me. The parrot cage was partly behind the window curtain, and they couldn't see it, and she thought it was me. She looked at me as though she was wondering why she didn't hit me with a poker, but she went on, and Polly said, 'Wipe off your chin,' and then the lady got through and got up, and told ma it must be a great trial to hav an idiotic child, and then ma she was mad and said it wasn't half so bad as it was to be a kleptomaniac, and then the woman got up and said she wouldn't stay any longer, and pa said to me to take that parrot out doors, and that seemed to make them all good-natured again. Ma said to take the parrot and giv it to the poor. I took the cage and pointed my finger at the parrot and it looked at the woman and said, 'Old catamaran,' and the woman tried to look pious and resigned, but she couldn't. As I was going out the door the parrot ruffed up his feathers and said, 'Dammit set 'em up,' and I hurried out with the cage for fear he would say something bad, and the folks all held up their hands and said it was scandalous. Say, I wonder if a parrot can go to hell with the rest of the community. Well, I put the parrot in the wood-shed, and after they had their innings, except pa, who acted as umpire, the meeting broke up, and ma says it's the last time she will hav that gang at her house."

The New Litany.

Dr. D—x: Wives, obey your husbands, drunk or sober.

Dr. C—y: Let solemnity pervade our theaters; exterminate the sinful dancing women, and may every line of the play convey to the perishing souls present a great moral or some useful scientific fact.

Dr. D—x: And put women back in the kitchen and nursery, the place I hav ordered for her.

Dr. C—y: Let the performance commence with prayer and end with the doxology.

Dr. D—x: Restore the holy days of cobwebs, and let us lie down and repose in the blessed dust of ages.

Dr. C—y: Put all the theaters under the management of broken-down preachers who hav failed to draw and hav also been unable to account for trust funds committed to their charge.

Dr. D—x: Restore in good time the Inquisition and let all would-be Joans of Arc be burnt.

Dr. C—y: Hasten the time when no play shall be played till it receives the sanction of the Synod and the General Conference.

Dr. D—x: Teach all our women to be Marthas "cumbered with much serving" of skillets and wash-tubs.

Dr. C—y: Let the people take their amusements as they do their medicins—soberly, sadly, seriously, solemnly, and sedately, and with wry faces, thinking intently on their latter ends. And let me write all the people's plays and secure royalty therefor.

Dr. D—x: Hasten the time when the amount of knowledge taught to our women shall be limited by law.

Dr. C—y: Sanction no clown or any stage, save Dr. Talmage and others like unto him.

Dr. D—x: And teach the women that it is their place to be inferior to man.

Dr. C—y: Shut the mouths and padlock fast the jaws of these men of sin, Bartley Campbell, Bronson Howard, and Fred. Marsden, who lead the people astray with their plays.

Dr. D—x: And may both of us venerable and curious fossils of the Dark Ages be blessed in our work of sweeping the Atlantic ocean out of our respectiv houses.

Dr. C—y: Abolish the opera.

Dr. D—x: And the female colleges.

Dr. C—y: Put steeples on the play-houses and lock the audiences within, that a Kimball shall go through them until not a cent of unholy cash be left in their pockets.

Dr. D—x: And let me write the plays for the people.

Dr. C—y: And hire audiences at a dollar a head to come and see them.

Book Notices.

From the Milan, O., Review.

"Answers to Christian Questions and Arguments," by D. M. Bennett—a work of 150 pages—consists of answers to questions propounded to Mr. Bennett after his return from around the world, and shortly before his death. It is brimful of solid facts. He shows very conclusivly that Christianity is not a religion given from God, but that it is merely copied from paganism. He makes it very clear that there never existed any such personage as Jesus, as shown us by theologians, though he does not deny that there may hav been a man by that name. He thinks, however, that the story is borrowed from the Egyptian and Indian mythologies, and produces facts to sustain his position. He also makes plain that the New Testament—in fact, the whole Bible—cannot be relied on, because of its erroneous statements. The manner in which it was compiled makes it still more untrustworthy, and it is doubtful to the intelligent mind whether the books, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, are any more genuin than those rejected by the compilers. It seems queer that so many human beings should base their hope of a future existence upon so flimsy a structure as Christianity, borrowed as it is from former superstitions—a religion that is so contrary to science and natural law, and so full of childish ideas and notions. We wonder how long before Christians will realize it. But still, if they are taught not to reason (for, according to their religion, it is an unpardonable sin), and do not allow themselvs to study into the origin of their cherished belief, it cannot be otherwise. We think this work should be in the hand of every lover of truth.

From the San Francisco Universe.

"The Golden Throne," a romance by Samuel P. Putnam, is a literary work in which fact and fiction are admirably blended, and the philosophy of Freethought is sought to be inculcated in alliance with romantic events. The situations are startling enough to gratify the most inveterate novel reader, while the philosophy is sure to please the mental desires of the most radical. The fate of little "Pete," thrilling in some of its episodes, is well told, and the chase of the gallant ship "Albatross" in the wake of the "Betsy Jane"—with the marvelous rescue of "Pete," now a wealthy and beautiful young lady abducted by an orthodox villain named Gooch—are, to a certain degree, worthy of Jules Verne. The pen-portraits of Blanche, the heroin, and of Charles Morton, who falls in love with her, are well drawn. In the characters of "Burnham" and "Lorena," the imagination has full scope; and "Captain Furgeson," "Dr. Mackenna," and other personages will interest the reader. The real personages in the work, such as Ingersoll, George Eliot, and the modern scientists, are cleverly brought into requisition and serve an admirable purpose. We hav in "Golden Throne" several assumed characters who were ministers of the Christian religion, but who are now Freethinkers, and it is probable that the models in real life are now conspicuous names in the Freethought ranks. Their manly and noble struggles to free themselvs from the servitude and environments of orthodoxy and come out into the full light is told in a heartfelt way. The author of the romance tells us in the preface that "Golden Throne" is written with a purpose, and its pages well define that purpose in inculcating the triumph of science and reason over the supernatural. The religious hypocrits outlined in the work are marked characters. The scene of the romance is laid in California, and this city shines in all the garb of poetic splendor. The literary style is in many passages lofty, and fine specimens of prose-poetry are often read, while—we regret to say—there are many, very many, dialect expressions which are exceedingly offensiv to the refined. The author deals with pioneer characters, and no doubt wishes to be true to nature—that is, human nature; but in a romance, and what we will in this instance term the romance literature of Freethought, such unsightly expressions are not permissible by any rule of literary taste, excepting in such vernacular writers as Bret Harte, Mark Twain, and Josh Billings. The intellectual outrages, and we may well term them such, which mar and disfigure "The Golden Throne" are the only unhealthy features in this otherwise admirable romance. MANHOOD!

KNOW THYSELF.

A Book for Every Man!

Young, Middle-aged, and Old.

The untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase and read the new medical work published by the Peabody Medical Institute, Boston, entitled the Science of Life: or, Self Preservation. It is not only a complete and perfect treatise on Manhood, Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in man, Errors of Youth, etc, but it contains one hundred and twenty-five prescriptions for acute and chronic diseases, each one of which is invaluable, so proved by the author, whose experience for 21 years is such as probably never before fell to the lot of any physician. It contains 300 pages, bound in beautiful embossed covers, full gilt, embellished with the very finest steel engravings, guaranteed to be a finer work in every sense—mechanical, literary, or professional—than any other work retailed in this country for $2.50, or the money will be refunded in every instance. Price only $1.25. Gold Medal awarded the author by the National Medical Association. Illustrated sample sent on receipt of six cents. Send now.

Address PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, or Dr W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience. 1y38

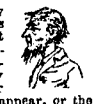
DR. FELLOWS



A REGULARLY educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove,

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES,

Spermatorrhœa and Impotency,

As the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions, (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an EXTERNAL APPLICATION in from 30 to 60 days. No medicine taken. It has never been known to fail!

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in cut. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

"PRIVATE COUNSELOR"

Sent to any address, securely sealed, for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhœa or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember a radical cure is certain. Address, plainly, DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey, and say in what paper you saw this advertisement.

Gems of Thought.

IT is now fully demonstrated that the human race came from a low origin, on a level with the animal plane, and has, with obstructions and drawbacks, gradually progressed, until it has arrived where it is to-day; and that it did not start high up, at a point of perfection, and since been constantly deteriorating and getting worse and worse.—D. M. Bennett.

CONSCIENCE may be fanatical and needs the guiding light of rational thought and knowledge—W. J. Potter.

"ON my side," said the Rev. Mr. Lassells, "I affirm a personal God, the inspiration of the Bible and the truth of revealed religion; the separate and distinct acts of creation; the miracle of the sacrifice and the atonement; an immortal soul, to be judged at the last day according to the deeds done in the body; and a future life of bliss or woe." "On my part," responded Mr. Richard Fullerton, "I deny all these articles but one—and that I neither deny nor affirm. It belongs to the domain of the unknowable; and neither you nor I knows what comes after the death of the body—if anything, or nothing but the disintegration of the forces which made what we call life. Scientific analogy is against you—universal belief is with you; but in this, as in many other things, the confession of ignorance is the greater wisdom and the truer modesty."—Mrs. Linton's Under Which Lord?

MY days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle, and are spent without hope. Oh, remember that my life is wind; mine eye shall no more see good. The eye of him that hath seen me shall see me no more; thine eyes are upon me and I am not. As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more. He shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more.—Job vii, 6-10.

THE child should learn and repeat, every day, a passage, as moral as may be; but, with all, really poetical—that is, in Milton's definition, "simple, sensuous, and impassioned;" "sensuous," in modern English (for the comfort of pious mothers be it observed), meaning only, replete with sensible imagery, and "impassioned" meaning, full of pathos. This will make a new creature of him if his clay be only fine enough to take the fire kindly.—Self-Formation.

OUR concern is not to save our souls, but to do our duty as life goes on. We can consequently train ourselves, cultivate our faculties, use our opportunities, enjoy our privileges, and make the most of society and existence, without any awful misgivings of the future, such as torment the Christian. We can lie down to rest; we can sit under the shade of the trees; we can laugh and sing; we can employ our time to the fullest extent; we can use our gifts; we can drink in the strength of nature from the gladness of the morning, from the peace of the evening, from conversation with a friend; in a thousand ways we can draw in the refreshing water of life to cool our thirst. Is not that a consolation? It is one of the greatest; for, in hours of fatigue and loneliness and sorrow, at any rate, I can say to misgivings, Sit still. I am not bound to explain, I am not bound to feel that there is something I ought to hav done. Let my soul be taken care of in the natural way, or let it not be taken care of at all.—Frothingham's Radical Pulpit.

HOW happy is he born or taught
Who serveth not another's will;
Whose armor is his honest thought,
And simple truth his highest skill;
Whose passions not his master's are;
Whose soul is still prepared for death;
Not tied unto the world with care
Of public fame or private breath;

Who God doth late and early pray
More of his grace than goods to lend,
And walks with man, from day to day,
As with a brother and a friend!
This man is freed from servil bands
Of hope to rise or fear to fall;
Lord of himself, though not of lands,
And having nothing, yet hath all.
—Sir Henry Wotton.

IT is not an easy matter to obtain definit convictions in religion at the present day. So many opinions that were once deemed certain hav been exploded; so many seeming sanctities hav turned out to be mere deceit; so many eternal verities, as they were named, hav passed away like the morning mist.—Adler's Radical Pulpit.

MANY good thoughts, resolutions, and proper views of things, pass through the mind in the course of the day, and are lost for the want of committing them to paper. Seize them as they pass, these birds of paradise, that show themselvs a moment and are gone—and make a grateful present of the precious fugitivs to your friends. Shall the good housewife take such care in pickling and preserving her worthless fruits, her walnuts, apricots, and quinces—and is there not much spiritual housewifery in treasuring up our mind's best fruits—our heart's meditations in its most favored moments?—Anon.

WHAT do we know—what can we predicate—of the sinfulness of any fellow creature? Can we say, "This man is more guilty than that;" or even, "This man is very wicked?" We may, indeed, be able to say, "This man has lied, has pilfered, has forged; and that man has apparently gone through life with clean hands." But can we say that the first has not struggled long, though unsuccessfully, against temptations under which the second would hav succumbed without an effort? We can say which has the cleanest hands before man; can we say which has the cleanest soul before God? We may be able to say, "This man has committed adultery, and that man has never been guilty of unchastity;" but can we tell that the innocence of the one may not hav been due to the coldness of his heart—to the absence of a motiv—to the presence of a fear? And that the fall of the other may hav been preceded by the most vehement self-contest—caused by the most over-mastering frenzy—and atoned for by the most hallowing repentance?—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

Odds and Ends.

HE delicately broached the subject as follows: "If I were to speak to you of marriage after having only made your acquaintance three days ago, what would you say to it?" "Well, I should say never put off till to-morrow that which you should hav done before yesterday."

A STOCKTON, Cal., Chiaman thought to make himself "solid" with his Christian mistress, who had tried to bring him into the fold, by telling her: "Me heap likee God. Me heap likee Jesus." "So you love Christ, do you?" asked the interested lady. "No," cried the heathen, emphatically; "Heap love God; heap love Jesus; no care fo Christ!"

"DIS preachin' business is all a fraud," exclaimed old Isom the other day, when he met the secretary of state on the street.

"Why do you think so?" asked the official.

"Wall, yer see, while I was a sinner my wife was al'ers hankerin' arter de 'ciety ob de preachers. Dis fac' struck me, an' I jined de church an' 'gun ter preach."

"What effect did it hav?"

"Had dis effeck, sah. My wife run away with a nigger what had jis' come out'en de penitentiary."—Arkansaw Traveler.

"I HAS de wust luck of any man I eber seed," said old Isom.

"What's the matter now?" asked the governor.

"Why, sah, my wife run away an' sprained my shoulder."

"I don't understand how your wife's running away could sprain your shoulder."

"It was dis way: Some time ago my hoss died, an' since den I has been workin' my wife ter de wagon. She's a powerful stout 'oman, an' could pull twice as much as de po' ole hoss. Wall, de udder day while I was drivin' along we met a preacher in de road, my wife shied, turned de wagon ober, an' sprained my shoulder."—Arkansaw Traveler.

IT is a curioue fact that the legs of the women "born and raised" down on the Truckee Meadows, and about Reno, are so short that they cannot step from the railroad platform to the cars to board the trains. Owing to this short-leggedness and lack of stride, it has been found necessary at the Reno depot to rig up and uso a plank such as is used at steamboat landings. Over this plank the little duck-legged creatures are able to waddle aboard the trains. A scientist of Reno says that owing to the fact that the country is all a dead level and perfectly smooth, there are no obstructions over which it is necessary for the women to lift their feet. He calculates that in about three generations more they will hav no legs at all, and that in about five generations their feet (now forming such a noticeable part of them) will also hav entirely disappeared.—Virginia City Enterprise.

ENTERTAINING A VISITOR.

"Ma's up stairs changing her dress," said the freckled-faced little girl, tying her doll's bonnet-strings and casting her eye about for a tidy large enough to serve as a shawl for that double-jointed young person.

"Oh, your mother needn't dress up for me," replied the female agent of the missionary society, taking a self-satisfied view of herself in the mirror. "Run up and tell her to come down just as she is in her every-day clothes, and not stand on ceremony."

"Oh, but she hasn't got on her every-day clothes. Ma was all dressed up in her new brown silk, 'cause she expected Miss Dimond to-day. Miss Dimond always comes over here to show off her nice things, and ma don't mean to get left. When ma saw you coming she said: 'The Dickens,' and I guess she was mad about something. Ma said if you saw her new dress she would hav to hear all about the poor heathen, who don't hav silk, and you'd ask her for more money to buy hymn-books to send to 'em. Say, do the nigger ladies use hymn-book leaves to do their hair up in and make it frizzy? Ma says she guesses that's all the good the books do 'em, if they ever get any books. I wish my doll was a heathen."

"Why, you wicked little girl! What do you want of a heathen doll?" inquired the missionary lady, taking a mental inventory of the new things in the parlor to get material for a homily on worldly extravagance.

"So folks would send her lots of nice things to wear and feel sorry to hav her going about naked. Then she'd hav her hair to frizz, and I want a doll with truly hair, and eyes that roll up like Deacon Sliderback's when he says amen on Sunday. I ain't a wicked girl, either, 'cause Uncle Dick—you know Uncle Dick, he's been out West and swears awful and smokes in the house—he says I'm a holy terror and he hopes I'll be an angel pretty soon. Ma'll be down in a minute, so you needn't take your cloak off. She said she'd box my ears if I asked you to. Ma's putting on that old dress she had last year, 'cause she said she didn't want you to think she was able to giv much this time, and she needed a new muff worse than the queen of the cannon-ball islands needed religion. Uncle Dick says you oughter go to the islands, 'cause you'd be safe there, and the natifs'd be sorry they wae such sinners if anybody would send you to 'em. He says he never seen a heathen hungry enough to eat you, 'less 'twas a blind one, and you'd set a blind pagan's teeth on edge so he'd never hanker after any more missionary. Uncle Dick's awful funny, and makes pa and ma die laughing sometimes."

"Your Uncle Richard is a bad, depraved wretch, and ought to hav remained out West, where his style is appreciated. He sets a horrible example for little girls like you."

"Oh, I think he's nice. He showed me how to slide down the bannisters, and he's teaching me to whistle when ma ain't around. That's a pretty cloak you've got, ain't it? Do you buy all your good clothes with missionary money? Ma says you do."

Just then the freckled-faced little girl's ma came into the parlor and kissed the missionary lady on the cheek, and said she was delighted to see her, and they proceeded to hav a real sociable chat. The little girl's ma can't understand why a person who professes to be so charitable as the missionary agent does should go over to Miss Dimond's and say such ill-natured things ae she did, and she thinks the missionary is a double-faced gossip.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last word penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

Notes and Clippings.

In Kentucky no clergyman or preacher of any denomination can become a member of the legislature.

An old lady near Reading, Pa., will not allow her bibulous husband to visit that city, because she has read in the Bible that "reading maketh a full man."

The colonization of Palestine movement is still agitated among the orthodox Jews, who consider it the only solution of several problems in which the race is interested.

The Mohammedans are to hav a religious Publication Society of their own. Constantinople is to be its headquarters. A cheap edition of the Koran will be the first issue from its press. Every Turk will then be able to buy the Koran at a trifling price.

A Chicago journal says that a printer has been cured by prayer, which leads a Texas paper to say that "if he was cured of extracting the word in a paragraph on which a joke hinges and substituting a word of his own 'to make sense,' as he puts it, we will indorse the prayer cure and giv it a five-inch electro ad. free one year, top column, next to reading matter."

The Sun one day last week reports the cure by prayer of Annie Feeney, of Hudson, Mass., who has been confined to her bed with paralysis since October. A few inches below, in the same column, the Sun describes the burning to death of Ann Boland, of Bridgeport, Conn., while kneeling in prayer. If prayer had any effect in either case, it goes to show that what is meat for one woman is a good deal worse than poison for another.

An "option" given in the time of Daniel, probably the oldest on record, has been found in a Babylonian brick, and givs the buyer, Bel-ahe-iddin, the privilege of taking possession of the home of Bel-rimmain at any time within four years on payment of "11 manas 18 drachmas" of silver, and, with a prudence worthy of Wall street, says a Chicago paper, Bel-ahe-iddin gets a guarantee that Bel-rimmain will contest no legal proceedings brought on the option.

The spring poet is in full song, as the following sample from a New Orleans paper shows: "Come, O song bird of the bleak and barren North, turn tail upon the base, ungrateful weather of your icy home and hie thee fondly to the balmy South. In these bland airs an everlasting verdure waits for you. On tropic woodshed summits you may moult your wing and giv it to the sweet south wind by day; at nightful you may serenade the languorous moon without your mittens or your overcoat."

"Oh," said Daisy to her mamma, "I was in the parlor last night, behind the sofa, when the preacher came in to see sister Kate, and they did set up too close for anything; an' the preacher said, 'Katie, dear, I luv you,' an' Katie said, 'Oo, oo;' an' the preacher kissed her right smack in the mouth, an' said, 'Dear Katie, how good the Lord is to us poor sinners;' an' Katie said, 'Oo, oo;' an' then—an' then—" "Well," said her mamma, "you wicked child, you wicked child, what did you do?" "W'y, mamma, I felt so good, I blurted right out, 'Let us pray,' an' you ought to hav seen 'em jump."

Much discussion prevails at Trenton concerning the prayers offered at the opening of the sessions of the New Jersey legislature. Some of the ministers say that the custom has become so greatly desecrated that it ought to be abolished. Others criticise the legislators for having so little manners as not even to bow their heads during the prayer, but to talk flippantly and to speak of the market value of the prayers offered. One minister says that unless the character of the legislators shall be changed for the better he will never again address his maker in the presence of the Senate or House of Assembly of the state of New Jersey. The sum of $10 for four prayers is allowed to each of the clergymen whose services are secured for this devotional exercise.

It seems that a man can secure a standing in religious society and the occupation of Baptist pulpits even when he has fled from half a dozen places in as many states on account of financial irregularities and departures from the truth. Such a state of affairs is reported in the case of one Bowen, who is said to hav statedly preached for two churches in this state, one in New Jersey, one in Ohio, one in Michigan, and one or two in Wisconsin. His career might hav gone on until he had preached as pastor or stated supply in every state and territory in the Union, but for the fact that he recently went to Randolph, N. Y., and assaulted a member of the church at that place.

In a neighboring city, says the Boston Globe, where the inhabitants are so very, very temperate that many of them Neal Dow-n to say their prayers, a good old deacon of a colored church lately called upon the city agent for the sale of that article which, if advisedly used, "cheers, but not inebriates." "Mr. L.," says the deacon, bending low and almost whispering into the ear of the obliging and affable agent, "Mr. L., I'se cum to get a quart of spirits for purely sacramental purposes." "Yes, deacon, I suppose you want some light wine, perhaps claret, tarrigonia, or something of that sort." "Well, boss, if it dusen't make no sorter difference toards you, de ladies dey hav canvassed dis matter, and dey has cum to the 'nanimous 'clusion dat dey would pufer gin." The deacon got it.

The Examiner (Baptist organ) has looked carefully into the history of the Isabella mining business, and concludes that "it was a case of extreme verdancy on the part of the Methodist officials, and the lesson they must hav learned by heart will lead them to be a good deal more incredulous next time, and never again to tolerate stock speculation as a means of building up universities, or anything else connected with the kingdom of God." And yet there stands on record the felicitous history of a curious little gamble in St. Paul preferred, by which a couple of years ago one of the largest Baptist churches of this city found relief from financial embarrassments amounting to $40,000. In that case the stock went up. In the other case the Isabella went down and dropped through the place where the bottom was out.

There is said to be much anxiety of mind among the Episcopal clergymen of Rochester, N. Y., because vain and ungodly persons who care little for religion and not much for preaching hav been coming to the churches to hear the fine music. These persons hav been attracted by the publication of programs setting forth what music would be performed. The clergymen think that this publication has been unwise, and therefore they hav come to the conclusion to stop it, rather than tempt their fellow-beings to commit the sin of attending church from unworthy motivs. This is a new departure in church business. The ministers of Rochester should reflect that it is as well to hav a few people in the church who remain awake during the performances of the choir as to hav only those present who sleep during the whole service.

A Louisville woman, who is the mother of twin babies, has become a fanatical lunatic in consequence of her devotion to the teachings of the "mountain evangelist," Barnes. She began to develop considerable eccentricity when Barnes was in Kentucky, but since he went away she has been carried away by her theological vagaries, and is now uncontrolable. She has named one of her babes Jesus Christ, and the other George O. Barnes. She says that Barnes taught her how to make "faith oil," with which to anoint and heal professing believers. She holds that the work of converting all the unconverted people in Louisville is committed to her, and that when she has finished it she and the children are to be taken to heaven in a chariot of fire. A few days ago she called a passing newspaper reporter into her house and told him that she could save his soul as easily as a dentist could pull a decayed tooth. She produced a bottle of oil, a hymn-book, and a wand, and then proceeded with some religious services of her own devising. Before these services had gone far enough to do the reporter any good, one of the babies fell to the floor, which interrupted the proceedings to such an extent that the woman told the reporter he had better go away and come again another day.

John Bright, late a member in the Gladstone cabinet, has been expressing himself pretty distinctly on the oaths question. In a letter to a parliamentary debating society at Hebden Bridge he writes: "On the question of oaths probably there is nothing in the New Testament more especially condemned and forbidden than oaths. To those who do not care about the New Testament this fact will be of no weight. The practice of swearing to the truth of anything makes two kinds of truth and truthfulness. If oaths are of any avail, by so much as they make truth more certain, by so much they lessen the value of any ordinary statement and diminish the probability of its truth. If ignorant persons are not sworn they think they may tell lies with impunity, and their lying is made to a large extent blameless in their eyes. I think oaths and oath-taking hav done more than any other thing to impair and destroy a regard for the truth."

Last week the pestiferous Sunday Closing League were at work meddling with the rights and freedom of citizens of New York. Eight persons were dragged before a police justice to answer charges of having violated the "Sabbath" by doing business on the first day of the week, which is no Sabbath at all, even by ecclesiastical interpretation. Only one of the eight was held to hav violated the "blue laws," and the magistrate was so indignant that he warned the Sunday Closing League fanatic who did the dirty work of fanaticism that hereafter he would issue no warrant of arrest unless a policeman testified that an accused violator was caught in the act. The batch of eight were taken from their business on the succeeding day to answer the complaint of a wretched busy-body, and was composed of both sexes. The scene was shameful, and the seven innocent persons should at once hav turned upon the prosecutor and pursued him for false imprisonment. Similar outrages are likely to occur any Sunday hereafter. With such facts before the Senate and assembly, prompt wholesale action on the "blue laws" ought to hav been taken. But the only modification which took place was in the Senate, in which the bill to amend the Field Penal Code so as to allow the sale of prepared tobacco on Sunday, and granting permission to the owners of blast furnaces, creameries, and cheese factories to operate on that day, was passed. Yet at the same time an amendment to further modify the odious laws was rejected. This rejectory action of the Senate would seem to indicate the hopelessness of further modification, while it places total repeal out of the question. If the sense of the people could be taken all over the state, an overwhelming majority would be found to favor repeal. In this metropolis it is more than overwhelming. If the legislature adjourns without such action upon the "blue laws" as will make them harmless, the fanatics will immediately recommence their persecutions, this time on a far more extended scale. The police courts will be full of victims of bigotry and intolerance. The hands of the Sunday Closing League are only stayed now for fear that their vile persecutions might compel the legislature to repeal altogether these laws. Should the legislature so disregard the popular will, it requires no prophet to predict that the people will seek a remedy at the polls next November. They will repudiate the derelict representativs, and send to Albany men bold and true enough to carry out the expressed will of constituents who hate—yea, despise—laws which disgrace the progress of the age.—Mercury.

Suit has been brought against the Most Reverend James Gibbons, archbishop of Baltimore, to recover the property of Sarah J. Simpson, deceased. It is charged that Gibbons exerted undue influence in persuading Mrs. Simpson to leave all her property to the church.

The remains of John Howard Payne, the author of "Home, Sweet Home," hav reached Washington from Tunis, where the poet died, and hav been placed in a vault. The funeral ceremonies will take place on June 9th, when the remains will be interred in a commanding spot, adjacent to the tombs of many other noted men.

Alexander Jefferson, the Brooklyn negro who committed a double murder on Crow Hill, and is now under sentence to be hanged on May 11th, says he was able to keep so cool during the trial because of his prayers to God to make him strong. Before he dies he wants to see Celestial Jefferson, his brother, whom he shot and wounded, and Annie Jackson, his paramour, whom he stabbed, to warn them to settle down and do something for the welfare of their souls.

Scientific.

The Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels.

BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

VI.—THE DISCOVERY OF THE HUMAN RACE AS A WHOLE IN SOLIDARITY AND CONTINUITY, I. E., OF HUMANITY, WAS NECESSARY TO EXPLAIN THE EXISTENCE OF THE INDIVIDUAL MAN, AND TO DETERMINE HIS SCIENCE, PHILOSOPHY, AND RELATIONS. HUMANITY THEREFORE INEVITABLY BECOMES THE BASIS OF A NEW ERA OF SCIENCE AND OF HUMAN LIFE, RESTING UPON THE COPERNICAN COSMOGONY.

The pathway of science hitherto has been marked by the slaughter of the gods. The deified trees, streams, mountains, and stars of our ancestors have been disenchanted of the supernatural, and finally the Infinite itself can no longer remain as a personal deity. In each case the death of the god has seemed to the worshiper the death of the world, and he has refused to be comforted. It is true that science has not destroyed the Infinite, or the cosmos or, Fetich objects of worship. But it has, in explaining them, destroyed the old delusions and conceptions upon which man had based his whole explanation of the world, and had been able to conduct a tolerable life. The loss of his basis of life is the greatest loss possible if it is not supplied out of the newer conceptions of the world which science has made possible. The truth may be even more astonishing than the fiction, but it will not be as valuable unless it can sustain human life and progress more effectively. It is vain to suppose that much that has been sustained by the old WILL conception of the world will not be lost to the heart, the head, and finally to the hand of man. The fair humanities of old religions, and even civilization itself, may droop and die unless science becomes the solid ground upon which they are to henceforth rest. Where is the basis of the new life and morals upon which the new earth and new heaven are to rest? We have shown that the old conception of God, like every other thing and conception, has undergone differentiation because of a higher integration. We should therefore expect to find the answer to the great religious questions of our age if we inquire and follow whither the component parts of the old divine conceptions have gone and become reinvested; to wit:

THE INFINITE as a conception remains as the infinite fulness, the foundation and background of all conceivable existence, and it ever calls forth the emotions of unspeakable wonder and awe; but the god of theology is no longer there. The material and organic Cosmos also remains with its earth-planet and its variety, and its endless illustrations of law, ever calling forth the sense of utility, of grace and beauty, and their counterparts; but the gods of the Fetichists and of the sun and star-worshipers are no longer realities.

The individual man asks in vain of the Infinite or of the Cosmos for righteousness, for direction in an object of human life, of which the external order is only the base. He may be told to be true to himself, and he cannot be false to any man, but how can he be true to himself? What is he? Whence did he come? What is he to do, and why? These are the great religious because the great inevitable fundamental questions of existence. The personified Cosmos answered them to the savage animist, and the personified Infinite answered them to the theologian; but those answers are vain when science has exorcised the Man-God alike from the blue of the sky, and the blue and green of the earth.

These sphynx-like questions, which must be answered under penalty of death to Man and his civilization, might indeed appear insoluble under science but for its last greatest discovery: the discovery of HUMANITY encircling the planet in its solidarity, and ever growing through countless ages in its continuity. This fact of the solidarity and continuity of the human race as a mighty social organism obeying the laws of evolution and interdependence, is beyond all question the most important fact that science has disclosed, because the most far-reaching and practical. What the Copernican astronomy is in the Cosmic world, what the law of evolution is in the world of living things, this fact of the historical human organism is in the social, religious, political, and moral worlds. It is the revelation of science without which not one of these worlds could be explained or co-ordained, but with which it seems as though the sun had just risen to illuminate them all; for instance:

Does man ask what he is and whence he came? The answer is that he is one of the children and parts of this great organism which produced and upholds him as family, state, nation, race; without which he could not have been and could not exist for a day. To explain himself he has to explain the race which has produced every fiber of his body, every thought of his mind, every emotion of his soul. It is only within this race that he lives and moves and has a being at all. "Between man and the world there lies, and there is need of, Humanity." This is the greatest of facts and of truths. But was not man originally created or produced as an individual, and is not the race made up of individuals originally and actually independent?

In the ordinary sense of the word science answers, No! Even the anthropoid apes were and are all gregarious, and the evidence shows that mankind were not only gregarious in origin but that our anthropoid ancestors by virtue of their social life and by social selection survived. In this wise the more highly organized tribes were preserved from the fatalities which overpowered the missing links, who had not this tribal or social progress.

The individual, in the sense of being independent of, or distinct from society, is a modern achievement, rendered possible only by the differentiation or individualization under the higher social integration of modern Republicanism. In all former ages and stages of social evolution the single man had his life, condition, and fate determined by status, not by his volition or individuality. The social contract dream of Rousseau was the reverse of the facts which history has disclosed. In individuals are seen the last products of social evolution and not its beginning. Man has been the slave of society and status for ages; even now he cannot escape that slavery except by death or by becoming its co-partner and willing benefactor. Freedom can only exist by a voluntary living of social conditions and laws. But if we go below the social or human worlds—if man asks, What is the physical world? he can get no answer, philosophy, or explanation except through and by the means of this organism, Humanity, which lies between him and it. Science is simply the organic Man's reading of the world in which the individual shares only as he inherits or learns the treasured-up experiences of his race. The world is knowable only as a mode of human sensation. Because all men are nearly alike they see nearly the same world. The experience-philosophy of Locke and Mill, and the intuition and innate-idea philosophy of Kant and Cousin, receive their solution and reconciliation, as Mr. Spencer has happily shown, in this heirship which each man has in the stored-up acquisitions and conceptions of the race.

Thus what man is and what is his world, MAN the race is the only Being which can answer to man, and through science this answer has been and is being recorded.

It is a singular coincidence that this all-important fact of the organic unity of the human race in time and space was discovered at the same time that the new or Copernican Astronomy opened up the new Heavens and new Earth to mankind. These two greatest events in human history have become the basis of the new life and history of man on earth and the proper beginning of a new era. This was pointed out in our lecture preceding this on the objective order of the world, and receives final confirmation by this grand fact objective and subjective that Humanity became known at the same time, A.D. 1600, when the Martyrdom of Bruno furnished the proper individual incident to give to these sublime discoveries a personal and a living interest. How true all of this is appears abundantly from the fact that this new era since its first proposal in our former Lecture (printed in October, 1881), has been adopted by a large number of Liberals, and has been put into actual use more extensively than any other modern Calendar as yet proposed. How this discovery of the great Humanity was made and its history, have I not detailed at length in "The Epitome of Positive Philosophy and Religion," my address on "The Religion of Humanity," and "The Correspondence as to the Grounds of the New Era, The Era of Science and Man* (E.M., 283)?" Certainly I need only to submit these little works without repetition and to ask a general familiarity with them.

With this preparation we must follow the last of the great religious questions to which we have recently referred as unanswerable except for the fact of the discovery of the GRAND MAN, and ask their solution.

What ought we to do, and why?

What are and should be man's relation to the world and to his fellow-men, and theirs to him?

What is the motive, rule, and sanction of life and its conduct under the new era?

Or, in a word, What is the meaning of man's life and his destiny?

To the surprise of many, we believe, it will be found that these questions have received answers under the New Era (since A.D. 1600) from the Evangelists of Science and Humanity, and that their gospels are in all essentials concurrent, conclusive, and satisfactory. Let us see if the facts do not warrant this conclusion.

UNDER the title of "Prohibition and Self-Government," E. C. Walker, of Valley Falls, Kan., has published in pamphlet form three of the series of articles from his pen which originally appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER on the above subject. To these he has added an editorial from the Kansas Liberal. This collection forms a very clear and concise statement of Mr. Walker's side of the Prohibition question.

Christian Apologist Town Again.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As Brother Peck has bid us good-bye, I suppose you will permit me space enough in your columns to return the salute. If the "game is not worth the ammunition," considerable has been wasted. The effort made by Mr. Peck to close my mouth from speaking my sentiments leads me to think him a pope in disguise. The advice he givs me to hie out of his company leads me to think him a close-communion Baptist. The accusation he makes against me, charging me with writing in the "interest of the church," "too tender-footed for a Freethinker," leads me to think that Rome, with its padlocks on the lips of its adherents, has been transferred to the Freethinkers for their use. How consistent for men of advanced thought, who giv to every man and woman the right to think for themselvs, to berate as "spies" those who wish to speak, as their surroundings hav shown them, facts that giv rise to the thoughts. Were I living in a community where the influence and teachings of the churches made criminals and paupers, I perhaps could see the force of much that Mr. Peck has left unsaid. I am a man freer in thought than any man who seeks to muzzle me. I hav something of a knowledge of the church in its past history. I think I can distinguish a difference between religion and Christianity. I am free to say and challenge Mr. Peck or any other man to show when the church has ever gone outside of itself to destroy Freethought. What it has done to hold its membership to certain dogmas from which they wished to flee was not against Freethought outside of the church. Are you, Mr. Peck, acquainted with the history of France when Freethought took control of the government? Did the church retaliate when its power was restored? I hav no excuse for the atrocities the church has done to its own. I claim it has not sought, only as representativs in connection with all good citizens, to put restrictions on Freethought, or that class of free thought inimical to good government. Our Mr. Lincoln had to stop two Freethought papers during our war.

As to the claim Mr. Peck makes as to our representativ men, Mr. Phillips, called to addres a convention of Freethinkers in Boston, said: "I am proud to be your speaker, but I say to you frankly, your religion won't work." Mr. Lincoln asked the prayers of Christian people for himself. Read Longfellow's "Divine Comedia" for his position. Bronson Alcott tells the world that Mr. Emerson died a Christian Theist. Has Darwin's guess been of benefit to us?

Thomas Jefferson, speaking of the Bible, said, "I hav always said, and always will say that the studious perusal of the sacred volume will make better citizens, better fathers, and better husbands." Your claim of Mr. Jefferson as a Freethinker is a good one.

I still assert that the church, surrounded by such a rabble as it has had to meet, has done well to even exist. How can we overcome its influence? Let us be honest as well as practical. Suppose we start a fund to build a college in St. Louis, Mo., to cost $1,000,000, in shares of $100 each, to train men to speak our creed. Let us meet their effort as men duly enlisted, and not as bushwhackers.

The charge against the church opposing science and reforms cannot be sustained. Galileo was the church, and discovered the pendulum after prayers. Bruno was burnt as a heretic. His mantle fell on Spinoza, who continued to teach the lesson of astronomy learned from him. Bruno was a Pantheist, hence not a Freethinker. Gutenberg was a Catholic, and was under their power. Lafayette's visit to this country gave him an opportunity to speak against human slavery. A division in one of our churches had taken place on account of slavery thirty-five years previous. Temperance has had its strongest support from professedly Christian people.

I want to be on the side that will do the best for me when in need of that help. If Freethought offers to the race something that will be of the greatest benefit to man, that is my creed. If the race can find the most good in restricted thought, I am with them. If the church shall demonstrate its power more fully to aid men than other schemes, I am with the church. I won't retaliate with charges demeaning Mr. Peck's motivs as he did mine; I am too "tender-footed." I will merely say, in seeking to hold your adherents and converts, don't play the worn-out plan of the church—the muzzle. It's a weak institution that cannot stand on its merits. It's a false problem that won't prove itself. Good-bye, Brother Peck.

Breckenridge, Mich. L. H. TOWN, JR.

MR. PECK'S REPLY.

MR. L. H. TOWN, My Dear Sir: When I bid you good-bye, I did not expect to be compelled to lay you across my knee a second time. A man met another who was drunk, and asked him if he was a Democrat. "No," said the drunken man; "I am no Democrat, although I am free to acknowledge that I show all the symptoms." Now, if you are not a Christian, you certainly show all the symptoms.

You accuse me of making an "effort to close your mouth." I hav made no such effort, and I defy you to prove it from anything I hav said. On the contrary, I would stand up and defend you in the exercise of the right of free speech to the last drop of my blood. Although the church and the priesthood hav bathed the fairest portions of earth in human blood, think not that I would put them down by force. I would destroy their power by elevating the masses. Truth and reason are the only legitimate weapons of the true Liberal. Don't think because I tell you plain truths that I hav any desire to close your mouth. No, no; rattle on to your heart's content; the lions do not chafe where the kittens mew. I hav a right to find fault when you misstate and misrepresent. But you are so much tinctured with Christianity that I will try partially to forgiv you even for that. It is one of the ear-marks of the church which you uphold.

You seem to feel hurt because I refer to you as a spy. Perhaps I ought to recall that much, for I am inclined to think you do not know what you are yourself. Now, I pray you, let us hav a little system, and find out, if possible, where you do stand.

1. Do you believe the Bible to be the inspired word of God?

2. Do you believe in the fall of man?

3. Do you believe that Christ was the son of God—i. e., the very God—born of a virgin; that through belief in him all may be saved, and without such belief all will be damned?

If you believe each and every one of these propositions to be true, you may pass for a Christian. If you dissent from either you cannot join any orthodox church, but must be turned off on the left among the goats, Infidels, heretics, or what-not. Study these points until you know what you do believe, and can see the impropriety of throwing so many self-wounding boomerangs.

You boast of your freedom of thought, and in the same sentence accuse me of trying to muzzle you because I prefer pure bloods and don't like a mongrel.

You seem to pride yourself on your knowledge of church history, and challenge me to prove that the church has ever gone outside of itself to destroy Freethought. I guess you hav never read the decree of one of the early emperors, "that all the writings of Porphyry, or any one else against the Christian religion, wherever found, should be burnt."

Again you say that "the church has only sought to place restrictions on that class of Freethought inimical to good government."

What did Galileo do repugnant to good government? Was Michael Servetus roasted in a slow fire because he had disturbed the equilibrium of good government? Did Bennett lie in a loathsome prison because he had said or done something inimical to good government? And yet, with these facts before the world, you boast of your knowledge of church history, and deny that the "church has ever placed any restrictions on Freethought." Your assertions are meant to deceive, or they are made without knowledge.

You say you "hav no excuse for the atrocities the church has done to its own." Oh, you only excuse the atrocities to Infidels and heretics. You are like the king of Portugal, who said, during the Crusades, that it was only pastime to cut the throats of Infidels.

You seem to make no distinction between Theism or Deism and Christianity. Neither Lincoln nor Jefferson nor a single name which I gave in opposition to your "average college professors" and "Christians," in reply to your article, can be claimed as a Christian with any degree of consistency. It is quite common to claim all as Christians who believe in a God. And it is an old trick of the church to claim all great and good men as Christians. The whole nation was on its knees for Garfield, because it was thought that he was a Christian, while all Christians called for vengeance on Guiteau. And yet I hav good reason to believe that Garfield was not a Christian, while I know that Guiteau was. It is the belief and not the acts of men which determins whether they are Christian or not. Guiteau believed in the inspiration of the scriptures, the fall of man, the divinity of Christ, the plan of salvation, etc., and that made him a Christian. Lincoln, Jefferson, Phillips, and all the rest whose names I gave, and many more, denied either one or all of the above propositions, and consequently could not consistently hav joined any orthodox church, and were not Christians.

So long as men love to be successful in their undertakings, and so long as the influence of the church can be hurled against any man at the bidding of the priesthood, so long will it be difficult to find out man's true religious belief. When Jefferson was a candidate for the presidency, it was used as an argument against him that he was an Infidel, and if elected would burn all the Bibles and tear down all the churches, and yet you claim him as a Christian. If Lincoln had declared his religious belief openly, it is not likely that he would hav been elected president. The love of popularity often makes men very discreet.

You virtually deny that the church or its teaching makes criminals. You forgot that Freeman, in the rôle of old Abraham, plunged a knife to the heart of his little girl. More recently another bloodthirsty saint, in imitation of the same old patriarch, made his boy kneel down and plunged a long knife to his heart. Hav you not read of the Christian mother who murdered her three children? All of these murders are clearly traceable to Christian teaching. The murder of Garfield can justly be attributed to the same cause. Every paper, almost, brings intelligence of poor, ruined, helpless maniacs, rendered so by Christian teaching.

You first attempt to prove that we are indebted to the church for all our institutions of learning—that it produces all the great and good men, that its teaching has a salutary influence, etc., and then turn around and ask, "How shall we overcome its influence?" Can't you see the force of your own logic? If the church is a good institution, its teachings salutary, don't you see you show yourself to be a bad man when you attempt to overcome its influence? You propose a million-dollar college "to train men to speak our creed," and all the time telling what a bad creed it is, and trying to convey the idea "that our religion won't work," comparing our speakers and instructors to dogs in the manger, and at the same time extolling the church and the Christian religion and its ministers. In your next please let me know how you succeed in riding two horses going in opposit directions. I think you will get no hundred-dollar shares of my money. I regard it as a scheme to get the Liberals to build a college and then hav the Christians steal it from us as they did Girard College.

You say Bruno was burnt as a heretic, and that his mantle fell on Spinoza. And is this all you hav to offer in extenuation of that foul murder? Let us put this in practical form. The church imprisoned Bennett as a heretic, and his mantle fell on Macdonald; therefore the church is excusable for imprisoning Bennett.

"Bruno was a Pantheist, hence not a Freethinker," and "hence" I infer that none are Freethinkers except those who believe the dogmas of the church.

You say, "The charges against the church opposing science and reformers cannot be sustained." Then to prove that these charges cannot be sustained you state that "Galileo discovered the pendulum in the church after prayers." Of course that proves that the church did not persecute Galileo. "Gutenberg was a Catholic, and under their power." And who do you think will take this as evidence that what I said in regard to him was untrue?

"Temperance has received its strongest support from the church." Yes, and its bitterest opposition, too. Do you know that in the earliest days of the temperance movement Christians refused to giv employment to men who had signed the pledge, and even daubed their houses with filth? You cannot be as old as I am or you could remember when a minister was not well used if the bottle was not set out to him when he called.

The Washingtonian movement did more to arouse the public mind to the evils of intemperance than any other movement before or since, and they were not Christians, and would not allow their meetings to be opened by prayer. The church never inaugurates any reforms, but invariably fights them. It mobbed and murdered the early antislavery agitators (most of whom were Infidels), and now claims all the glory of the achievement.

Mr. Town, you are strangely mixed; you seem to think that all the good comes from the church, and all that is evil is engendered outside of it. You claim that ministers and Christians are all good men, while Infidels are "dogs in the manger," and yet you use the words "we" and "us" as naturally as if you had been born among us.

Now, Mr. Town, I hope you will not think that I am opposed to either your speaking or writing. I would not close your mouth. No muzzles or padlocks from me. If you try to be consistent you may yet become a full-fledged musketo. You are only a wiggler now; write on.

I must now relate the fable of the skunk and the 'coon, and then bid you good-bye.

After a long winter of undisturbed repose, a certain 'coon on a fair day thought he would walk out and enjoy the sunshine. On his return home he found his apartment occupied by a skunk. "What do you want here?" said the 'coon. "Oh, I am around visiting my near relativs," replied the skunk. "You are no relativ of mine," said his 'coonship. "Yes I am. My father was a 'coon, and my mother was a 'coon." "Well," said the 'coon, "you are either mistaken or I am deceived. Your spots do not indicate the 'coon family; you do not look like a 'coon, nor smell like a 'coon, and you shall no longer impose upon respectable 'coons." Whereupon a convention of 'coons was called, and the sentence of death was passed upon the skunk—not for being a skunk, but for pretending to be a 'coon.

BY an error of somebody the lecture of W. F. Jamieson at Linesville, Pa., was reported in THE TRUTH SEEKER to hav been on "Spiritualism in accord with Science." It should hav been, "Materialism in accord with Science."

CHAPTER XXX.

CONCERNING THE QUARRELS OF CHRISTIANS BEFORE CONSTANTINE AND UNDER HIS REIGN.

Before, during, and after the reign of Constantine, the Christians were always divided into several sects, many factions, and in various schisms. It was impossible for people who had no coherent system, who had not even that little "credo"* which has been falsely imputed to the apostles, who differed among themselves in nation, language, and manners, should be united in the same belief.

Saturnine, Basil, Carpocratus, Euphratus, Valentine, Cerdon, Marcion, Hermogenus, Hermas, Justin, Tertullian, Origen, all held contrary opinions; and while Roman magistrates endeavored, at times, to repress the Christians, they were occupied in excommunicating and anathematizing each other, and even fighting one another while in the depths of prisons. This was truly the most perceptible and deplorable effect of fanaticism.

The eager desire to rule opened up another source of discord; there were disputes about what was called the dignity of the bishop, followed by the same transports of anger, the same frauds, which have since signalized the schisms of the forty antipopes. They were as desirous of ruling over a small and obscure populace as the Urbans and Johns were to give orders to kings.

Novatus contended for the first Christian place in Carthage with Cyprian, who was elected. Novatus contended for the bishopric of Rome with Cornelius; each having received the laying on of hands from the bishops of his own party. They already dared to disturb Rome, and yet theological compilers venture to-day to wonder that Decius should have punished a few of these disturbers of the peace. Decius, however, punished neither Novatian nor Cornelius, though Cyprian was put to the torture during his reign. Such obscure rivals were allowed to declare war against each other as dogs are allowed to fight in a court-yard, provided they do not bite their masters.

In the time of Constantine there was a similar schism at Carthage. Two African anti-popes, or anti-bishops, Cecilian and Majorin, disputed about the Episcopal see, which began to be an object worthy of their ambition. There were women in each party. Donat succeeded Majorin and formed the first of the bloody schisms which were to defile Christianity. Eusebius relates that they fought with clubs, because Jesus, as they said, had ordered Peter to return his sword to the scabbard. Afterward they were less scrupulous. The Donatists and Cyprianites fought with iron. Then commenced the three hundred years of carnage, caused by the quarrels of Alexander and Arius, Athanasius and Eusebius, as to whether Jesus was of precisely the same substance with God or of a substance like God.

* This Credo, called the Apostle's creed, is no more from the apostles than from the bishop of London. It was composed in the fifth century by the priest Rufinus. The whole Christian religion has been made of pieces and scraps. It is there that it is said that Jesus after his death descended into hell. There was a great discussion in the time of Edward VI. as to whether he descended in body or in spirit, and it was decided that the soul alone preached in hell while his body remained in the sepulcher, as if, forsooth, the body of an executed criminal was ever placed in a sepulcher—as if it were not the custom to throw such bodies into the sewers. I would like to know what his soul was doing in hell. We English were great simpletons in the time of Edward VI. It was only about the time of the fourth century that the apostle's creed appeared for the first time entire [1771].

Cheap Postage at Last, and Postal Notes in Addition.

The late Congress passed a law which will be hailed with general satisfaction by the people, namely, the reduction of the rate of postage on letters to two cents. The United States may now be considered as standing at the head of the nations in the matter of cheap postal facilities. We are indebted to Mother England for teaching us the A B C of popular postal transmission; for a score of years her rate has been two cents. But no such costs, difficulties, and distances hav had to be overcome in carrying the mails in Great Britain as in this country. Her postal routes are short, her total area being only about one hundred and twenty-two thousand square miles, while ours is not far from three and a half millions of square miles.

Many of our important towns are from one to four thousand miles apart by the postal routes, over which we hav been long carrying letters for three cents. Under the new rates of two cents, the quantity of letters to be carried will doubtless be greatly augmented.

The new two-cent rate goes into operation October 1st. The post-office authorities are engaged in preparing a brand new two-cent stamp, with which to inaugurate the happy event.

Another accommodation for the public will also soon come into vogue, namely, the issue of postal notes for small sums. By payment at any post-office a postal note for the amount is to be given, which will be payable on presentation at any other post-office.

The post-office authorities are making preparations as rapidly as possible for the issue of the new postal note. It is to be engraved with great care, the work upon it to be equal to that on the national banknotes, in order to protect the holder. It is expected that this note will prove of great benefit to all who desire to use the mails to purchase books, newspapers, and merchandise. The authorities admit that it is an experiment, and do not expect that the system will any more than pay expenses.

Kinsman, Ohio.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Emery Thompson, Esq., sent me word, while I was in Chicago, to come to Kinsman and deliver five lectures. They were the first Freethought lectures ever given in Kinsman. The Methodist and Presbyterian churches are the "powers that be." They frown down anything like progressiv thought, and, in consequence, there were very few of the elect who came within the sound of our voice. Kinsman is so pious that even the young folks don't dance, but they want to "awful bad." So, in place of the sinful dance, they engage semi-occasionally in galloping "snap-an'-ketch 'em." It is said to be far more boisterous than the graceful waltz, but it is more pious.

The churches are fine-looking edifices, but the school-house, situated between them is an old tumble-down, barn-like affair, which looks as if it had remained in that identical spot since 1798, when the first settler came there. Probably it is not more than fifty years old, although it looks like a century building. It said to me as plainly as a barn could talk: "The people here believe in serving God firstly and education secondly. Souls must be saved whether they know anything or not."

The parson's house is a beautiful residence "set on a hill." The good man is comfortable whether the children are or not. His master, while on earth, "enjoyed" poverty, which the Kinsman clergyman considerately donates to the children. The minister endures the good things of this life, while the children shiver in the barn school-house. Consequently the Christians of Kinsman gave us a wide berth.

Kinsman is about as isolated, secluded, sectarian as it is scattered. It would hav been more so if it had not been for the railroad and telegraph.

Still, there are excellent, intelligent people among the Christians of Kinsman. We do not wish anyone to form an erroneous impression about them. The railroad, telegraph, and newspaper hav done much for this very religious town. While their religion has been employed in saving their souls, the civilizing agencies referred to hav been benefiting their brains and bodies.

Our lectures were attended mostly by Liberals living several miles away. Only a few citizens of Kinsman were disposed to come and giv us a hospitable hearing, notwithstanding we were very kind to Kinsman.

Our Liberal friends expressed themselves as highly pleased with the first Freethought lectures in the history of the town, and hav given me a cordial invitation to come again next fall.

The expense, sixty dollars paid to the lecturer, for five lectures, was willingly borne by a few. Liberals are not assessed, as church-members are, to constantly pay money to support religion. The general plan is to subscribe and make the lectures free to the public. Once in a while a collection is taken up by the Liberals, to giv those who hav not subscribed an opportunity to assist, as they desire to do, after listening to a speaker's sentiments. At Kinsman there was only one collection, which amounted to between fourteen and fifteen dollars. That beats the church.

I had the pleasure of enjoying the hospitality of Emery Thompson, Sr., and his Liberal family, sons, daughters, sons-in-law—all Liberal, kind, courteous, agreeable. Also of Mr. Daniel Burns and L. W. Roberts.

W. F. Jamieson.

Obituary.

Died.—In Hudson, Mich., Jan. 27th, of paralysis, George Williams, aged 79 years. The Hudson Post says of him:

"Mr. Williams was a man of very emphatic likes and dislikes, and pronounced convictions; a man of straightforward honesty and abiding integrity, and deprecated and denounced all machinations and crookedness, and whose promis was current coin. A great reader and thinker, he shaped his daily walk and conversation to his own conviction of right and wrong, asking no one to do his thinking, and was the keeper of his own conscience; and the most faithful eulogy that can be pronounced on any one, the verdict of his immediate neighbors, says he was a just man, a good citizen, a faithful friend, and a kind neighbor."

He was until his misfortune a reader of The Truth Seeker, and always remained a stanch Infidel. He closes his life work mourned by many.

Guiteau Once More.

"The Rev. Dr. Hicks, who was spiritual adviser to Guiteau, announces that the assassin is not in hell, because there is no such place. According to this doctrin, then, the slayer and his victim are both enjoying the advantages of celestial residence, regardless of the merits of either. There is very little room for consolation in the thought."

The foregoing occurred among the "Notes and Clippings" in The Truth Seeker a few weeks ago. The Evening Democrat, of Sherman, Texas, quotes it, credits it to its proper source, and then proceeds to expose its fallaciousness:

"The Truth Seeker shows either a lack of candor or else a very narrow, contracted mind. There was a time when Mr. Garfield and Mr. Guiteau both lived in this poor little world of ours. Did the low, unhappy, and desperate condition of Guiteau's mind and body affect the happiness, affluence, and power of Mr. Garfield?

"Says St. Paul, 'There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; and one star differeth from another star in glory.' The lower and baser nature finds its level and proper atmosphere by a law of nature, which seems so self-evident a fact that The Truth Seeker must stumble over it, if it is not wholly blinded by conceit or deceit.

"Is the life of the most pure and innocent person of this planet rendered base and unhappy because God allows some evil inflamed person to exist upon the same sphere?

"Would the righteous man send the evil one out of existence if he could, or into hell if it were given him to choose?

"Is Garfield compelled to stand upon the 'level' with his murderer because both are compelled (for the want of a lake of fire) to inhabit God's universe? Does living on the same planet equalize the conditions of people?

"Oh, The Truth Seeker should count the stars of heaven, scan the glowing baldrick of night, and wander in mind through inter-stellar space, and then reflect that the universe, wherever God is and sin and death are not, is heaven.

"It is not likely that Guiteau would, if permitted, care to tag after Garfield after his earthly experience."

The Evening Democrat, it will be seen, inquires if the unhappy and desperate condition of Guiteau's mind and body affected the happiness, affluence, and power of Mr. Garfield. It is popularly believed that it did. The desperate condition of his mind drove a bullet into Garfield's body, kept half a dozen physicians probing among his vitals for weeks looking for the ball, and finally caused his death. Such attentions as these are eminently calculated to interfere with a person's happiness, affluence, and power.

St. Paul's remark that "there is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; and one star differeth from another in glory," is one that will apply most anywhere, and we shall hav it canned for future use. The one star that differeth from another doubtless refers to the "Lone Star" of Texas. The way it differs from another is in producing the Sherman Evening Democrat, and the editor of that paper is beyond question the particular glory that distinguishes it from other orbs.

"The lower and baser nature finds its level and proper atmosphere by a law of nature." This is profound. If the low and base nature of Guiteau takes him to heaven, by what law does the eminent Mr. Garfield gravitate to the same level? The editor of the Democrat will observe that this theory is not the one which was intended to be brought forward on this occasion. The correct one got mislaid, probably, and the base-nature-finds-its-own-level idea was put in by a mistake of the printer.

About the pure and innocent person, the righteous man, and other popular myths of that variety, we are unable to answer any questions of the kind propounded; but we will count the stars when we hav more time, and take a stroll through interstellar space as soon as the weather gets warm enough for excursions. The baldric has gone out of style with Night in New York. She now affects the ruffled robe à nuit, and our sense of propriety forbids our carrying out the Democrat's suggestion. We like to cultivate editorial fraternity, and it is our nature to accommodate if convenient; but when Modesty, as in this case, interposes her maiden form, we feel called upon to halt.

We did not claim that Guiteau and Garfield must necessarily be associates at tag in another world, for they will be members of the same choir, and members of choirs do not play tag. They generally bat one another around with hymn-books. Guiteau could hav no object in following Garfield about. Along the banks of the river of life the petulant pop of the pistol is not heard. But if Garfield should some day discover Guiteau sitting alongside him, it would be the most natural thing in this world, and probably the next, for him to smash a large and expensiv harp over that individual's head.

A Challenge.

The author of the following challenge asserts that he sent his defiance to Mr. Ingersoll, Mr. Bennett, and other representativ Liberals, but that all were afraid to meet him. It would be extremely unlikely that Col. Ingersoll would journey to Oregon to meet an obscure expounder of the Christadelphian phase of Christianity, even though he should be given $500 to pay expenses, as this reverend says he offered. If the many Christian sects will combine and unite on some representativ man, and stand or fall with him, probably Col. Ingersoll will meet him, but it is absurd to suppose that he will go to Oregon to meet a man he never heard of.

We think also that Mr. Nichols is drawing on his imagination when he asserts that Mr. Bennett declined, for we are not aware he ever heard of Mr. Nichols. He was always willing to point out the errors of Christianity to its believers, and although he would not hav gone to Oregon to meet an opponent, he would hav offered him the use of his columns and therein answered him, as we are willing to do if no one else responds, and if Mr. Nichols wishes a written debate wherein high-sounding words are of no avail, and plain statements must be made and proved in a logical manner. But as there would be considerable inconvenience in such a debate, with one contestant living away out in Oregon, we advise Mr. Nichols to offer J. L. York, of San Jose, Cal., the $500 to pay expenses, or W. F. Jamieson, of Indianapolis, or W. S. Bell, of Paola, Kan., or E. C. Walker, or Norway, Iowa, or J. E. Remsburg, of Atchison, Kan. All of these gentlemen are in the lecture field and open for engagements. If the reverend gentleman is in earnest he can be accommodated, no doubt.

THE CHALLENGE.

McMinnville, Oregon, March 6, 1883.

By the request of many (and might be multiplied by hundreds), we challenge Mr. R. Ingersoll, or any representiv Infidel, to publicly discuss the following proposition:

Resolved, That the Bible is true; that it is the reliable word of God, given through and written by man. And as such it contains no contradictions or absurdities. But it is harmonious and reasonable throughout.

L. T. Nichols.

Two Journeys.

"I go on a journey far away,"
He said—and he stooped and kissed me then;
"Over the ocean for many a day—
Good-bye," and he kissed me once again.
But only a few short months had fled
When again I answered my husband's kiss;
"I could not tarry away," he said;
"There is never a land so fair as this."

Again I stood by my husband's side;
"I go on a journey, sweet, to-day;
Over the river the boatmen glide—
Good-bye; I shall linger long away."
Ah, he will come back soon, I know,
I said, as I stooped for the parting kiss.
He cannot tarry, he told me so,
There is never a land so fair as this.

But many a month and many a year,
Hav flown since my darling went away.
Will he never come back to meet me here,
Has he found the region of perfect day?
Over the ocean he went and came;
Over the river and lingers there!
O pallid boatman! call my name!
Show me the region so wondrous fair.

A Righteous Judge.

Attorney-General Hahn, of St. Paul, Minn., on the 14th, rendered a decision in a novel case, but one involving a great principle. The teacher of a school at Spring Valley ordered a pupil to prepare an oration. He presented a selection from one of Ingersoll's papers. She refused to allow him to use the selection, and he, saying that he would use that or nothing, was expelled. The attorney-general decides that the teacher's prejudice against Ingersoll's ideas is not sufficient cause for expulsion, and that the boy must be reinstated.

A Letter from Ceylon.

We hav received the following letter from the secretary of the Buddhist branch of the Theosophical Society of Ceylon. Mr. Bennett was very warmly received and hospitably entertained in Ceylon by these followers of the great Gautama Buddha, and frequently referred to his stay there as among the most pleasant and gratifying experiences attending his trip around the world. These Buddhists, he stated, were distinguished for their intelligence and progressiv ideas, and their enterprise must finally prove the salvation of their island from the evil effects of the inroads which Christian proselytism is making upon the less enlightened nativs.

The Buddhist Branch of the Theosophical Society, or
The Paramawignartha Bauddha Samagama.
Colombo, Ceylon, Feb. 20, 1883.

Dear Mrs. Bennett: Permit me to address this note of deepest sympathy with your affliction, embodying the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted and voted to be sent to you at a general meeting of the above society:

WHEREAS, We, the members of the Paramawignanartha Bauddha Samagama of Colombo, learn, with feelings of deep regret, that D. M. Bennett, the founder and editor of that valuable paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York, and a member of the Theosophical Society, has departed this life; be it

Resolved, That in the death of this successful advocate of Freethought and an inveterate foe of superstition and bigotry, we hav lost a worthy member who was an honor to our parent society and its cause, and that on his visit to our island in last February, he rendered a great service in delivering an able lecture contrasting Buddhism with Christianity under the auspices of our society, which endeared him to the Sinhalese Buddhists—a Sinhalese translation of which is now being circulated among them; therefore be it also

Resolved, That we tender our deepest sympathy to Mrs. Bennett, the afflicted widow, and her business associates our cordial regret. Yours with sympathy,

C. P. GOONEWARDENE.

Notes.

OVER 1,460 new members hav joined the National Secular Society of England since its last conference at Edinburgh.

MR. GREEN'S "Freethought Directory" for March is received, and contains besides the list of names a number of very interesting articles.

WE learn of the marriage, at Council Bluffs, on the 16th, by Justice of the Peace Edwin Abbott, of Mrs. George Baggs, formerly of Wyoming, to Michael Sweet, of Hersey, Mich.

THE Catholic administrators of the estate of the Duchess of Gaeliera, Italy, hav stolen twelve million francs of her fortune, and she has been obliged to suspend work upon a hospital she was erecting.

THE London Freethinker will be conducted during the imprisonment of its editor by his friend, Edward B. Aveling. A public indignation meeting to protest against Mr. Foote's incarceration will be held in London soon.

THE secular papers consider it worth noting that the last New Jersey defaulter was not a church communicant. He was a regular attendant, however, and had a practical knowledge of the doctrins. He got away with $80,000.

WITH its last number the Banner of Light entered upon its twenty-seventh year. It stands at the head of the distinctivly Spiritual papers in circulation and influence, although some of its younger rivals claim to be approaching it.

MR. REMSBURG'S "Decline of Faith" and two others of his "Image Breaker" series of pamphlets hav been translated into the Bengalee language, and an aggregate of 15,000 copies circulated. Mr. Kedarnath Basu, the translator, is the leader of the Freethought movement in Bengal, India.

THE pope lately received a Mexican delegation freighted with Peter's pence. He expressed his sympathy with a nation so firmly Catholic, and regretted the suspension of diplomatic relations between the church and the government of that republic. His "holiness" need hav no regrets. There is a bond between ignorance and Catholicism that no diplomat could cement closer.

THE Lessing Association of Freethinkers at Leipzig, having offered a prize of five hundred marks for the best essay upon the "moral laws based solely upon unquestionable facts in the natural experiences of man, which are fitted to furnish a guide for human action in the various relations of life," has now awarded the prize to an instructor in philosophy at the University of Berlin. The judges in this contest were Dr. Hermann Grimm, Dr. Lasker, and Prof. Scherer.

THE Westchester Protectory receives nearly $300,000 per annum from this state, and the Roman Catholic Foundling Asylum receives annually about $250,000 more. When this latter institution was started it received a donation of nearly half a million in lands and money from the state. The Westchester Protectory is established "to maintain Roman Catholic juvenil criminals." In return for these favors the Catholics throw their vote solid for the political scamps who grant the money.

LAST session in the House of Commons, Sir Henry Whatley Tyler, M.P., attacked Mr. Bradlaugh's daughters as science teachers solely on the ground that they bore their father's name. He ventured on no kind of personal allegation against them. Now the committee of the Somerville Club, which club these young ladies had been invited to join, hav refused to admit either on the ground that the name is enough objection. Miss Orme, the lady who first suggested the objection to the Misses Bradlaugh, recently lectured for the Sunday Society on "Religious Equality," which title is a very fine sarcasm upon her practice.

THE friends of Mrs. Amy Post, of Rochester, celebrated her eightieth birthday on the 8th inst., at her residence. Mrs. Post has passed a life of great usefulness to the world. She early espoused the cause of the enslaved negro, and her house was for years the rendezvous of the persecuted. She was also the champion of the Fox girls when the first public exhibition of Spiritualistic phenomena was made by them in 1848. She was in early years a Calvinist, but later became an Atheist and Spiritualist. On the occasion of this birthday Dr. Farlin, on behalf of the friends assembled, presented her with an engrossed and framed copy of the following testimonial, numerously signed:

"The undersigned, your Spiritual Liberal friends in Rochester and vicinity, take pleasure in congratulating you upon the attainment of your eightieth year and in presenting to you this testimonial and the gifts accompanying it, as slight tokens of our appreciation of your life-long devotion to the principles of human justice and universal mental liberty."

The above was accompanied with a beautiful sandal-wood photograph album, an easy-chair, and a gold pen. Mrs. Post, who was entirely taken by surprise, returned her thanks to the donors in a few appropriate remarks. A letter from Laura M. Delano, of Milwaukee, was then read, addresses made by Mrs. Gardner and Mr. R. D. Jones, and at an early hour the assemblage dispersed, after extending their personal congratulations and good wishes to Mrs. Post.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Sun states that Heber Newton will not be tried for heresy, as the bishop of the diocese cannot consistently drag him to trial while the Rev. Mr. Cowley, convicted of starving little orphans and serving out a righteous sentence in the penitentiary, remains in full fellowship in the Episcopal church. There would appear to an onlooker considerable sense in this if the church were run on principles of justice, but we hav just seen in England a Christian judge sentence a murderer to three months' imprisonment and a heretic to twelve, and are filled with doubt as to the exact difference in degrees of guilt the church holds there is between heresy and a penitentiary offense.

THE Missouri Liberal says churches in New Hampshire are no longer exempt from taxation. This is incorrect. It is true that a recent legislature passed a law taxing all churches on their value in excess of $10,000, but with the usual cunning and duplicity of Christian financiers this clause is practically inoperativ by reason of the officers of towns and cities always rebating the taxes when appealed to by the members. Every spring the churches are assessed, but the taxes are not collected. It is a dishonest evasion, but strictly in keeping with the vicarious atonement theory that an innocent man suffers for the guilty. Christians are prone to force others to pay their debts, both moral and pecuniary.

WE are obliged to friend Seaver for copying the note relating to Mr. Bennett's travels. The Investigator enters upon its fifty-third volume in a few weeks, which is a remarkably good age for a Liberal paper to attain. It givs us great pleasure to note that the debt on its home is being rapidly paid, some $4,600 having been received by Mr. Mendum since last October. On the 15th inst. the semi-annual interest ($875) was due on the mortgage upon the building. The directors were not only able to pay this amount, but also to apply $7,000 toward the liquidation of this mortgage, which reduces it from $35,000 to $28,000, which with payments previously made, makes a total reduction of $10,000 in one year.

CALIFORNIA has repealed its Sunday law, but still pays a preacher five dollars a day to open each session of its legislature with prayer. Recently while the repeal of the law was under discussion the subsidized parson, Rev. Mr. Ware, of Sacramento, in his daily instructions to the Almighty, embraced the opportunity to put in an argument in favor of the law. Many of the members were angry at this and remarked that the reverend was "entirely too fresh." It is reported by the Sacramento correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle that after the parson's offense several shorthand reporters were employed to take down his next petition, and that a number of legislators stood ready to interrupt him should he again venture to make a stump speech under pretense of praying, and to move that the office of chaplain be declared vacant. "His invocation," says the correspondent, "was mild as the notes of the turtle dove." The fear of losing the five dollars a day tied the preacher's tongue as no sense of fitness and decency could.

SOME of Mr. Harman's friends having asked him why he did not devote more space in his Kansas Liberal to showing up the railway monopolies and other kindred evils, he makes this reply: "To these good friends and advisers we would say, most respectfully and deferentially, that we regard the church as the most grasping, most constant, most unrelenting, most insidious, most ubiquitous, as well as the most iniquitous, of all the monopolies that are now combining to enslave the sons and daughters of honest toil. The church is not only itself a monopoly, but it is the prolific parent, the foster mother, of most other monopolies. When the poor wage-slave complains of the hardships of his lot, the church consoles him by telling him to be content with what providence sends him; that God ordains some to be poor and others to be rich—some to serve and others to be served. If he complains of the exactions of government, the church tells him to be 'subject to the higher powers, for the powers that be are ordained of God.'"

Mind and Matter wishes to know who James Gruet, one of Calvin's victims, was, as it prints a message from his spirit. If Brother Roberts will turn to page 594 of his "Champions of the Church," he will find this account of Gruet's death, taken from Spalding's "History of the Reformation:"

"This unfortunate man was accused of having affixed a placard on Calvin's pulpit at St. Peter's church, in which the reformer was severely handled. He was apprehended and his papers were seized. Among these, consisting of nothing but loose sheets, were found some scraps of poetry and other fugitiv pieces, which were tortured into heresy and treason. He was plied with the torture by Calvin's creature, Colladon, every day for a whole month. They wished him to implicate Favre or Perrin; but, though he cried out in agony of torture, 'Finish me, I beseech you—I am dying,' he remained firm, and would not accuse them. The council pronounced sentence of death on him. Among the charges against him, the principal were: 'That he had endeavored to ruin the authority of the consistory; that he had menaced the ministers and spoken ill of Calvin, and that he had conspired with the king of France against the safety of Calvin and of the state.' Gruet died on the scaffold, but Calvin was not yet satisfied. He wished that his writings should be condemned, and he himself drew up a long form of condemnation of them, which was approved by the council. Calvin alone is responsible for the blood of Gruet."

IT is proposed to erect a statue to Martin Luther at Washington and hav it complete by the anniversary of his 400th birthday, which occurs Nov. 10th of this year. It should be placed on a pedestal large enough to contain on one side these words from a decree of the Lutheran synod convened at Hamburg August 7, 1536, to deal with the Anabaptists:

"Whoever rejects infant baptism; whoever transgresses the orders of the magistrates; whoever preaches against taxes; whoever teaches the community of goods; whoever usurps the priesthood; whoever holds unlawful assemblies; whoever sins against faith, shall be punished with death. . . . As for the simple people, who hav not preached or administered baptism, but who were seduced to permit themselvs to frequent the assemblies of the heretics, if they do not wish to renounce Anabaptism, they shall be scourged, punished with perpetual exile, and even with death if they return three times to the place whence they hav been expelled."

And on the reverse side this extract from his letter to Philip, the landgrave of Hesse, dated the Monday after Pentecost of the same year:

"Whoever denies the doctrins of our faith—aye, even one article which rests on the scripture, on the authority of the universal teaching of the church, must be treated not only as a heretic, but also as a blasphemer of the holy name of God. It is not necessary to lose time in disputes with such people; they are to be condemned as impious blasphemers."

On the third side this extract from the same letter would go far to show future generations how tolerant of others' opinions this great man was. These words were written of a man who denied the "doctrin of our [Luther's] faith:"

"Drive him away as an apostle of hell; and if he does not flee, deliver him up as a seditious man to the executioner."

And on the fourth side perhaps these kind words he once wrote to Melancthon would serve to settle some theological point concerning the Anabaptists:

"That all was decided—the doctrin of Zuingli and of Rothmanu was diabolical, and that these sowers of discord, these ravenous wolves, who devastated the fold of Christ, should be banished."

By all means let us hav a statue to Martin Luther!

"Injudicious Investments."

From Texas Siftings.

The Catholics in Massachusetts who were so confiding as to lend money to the Augustinian Society, without exacting any security, can now adjust their mouths to whistle. They may as well begin to pucker up their lips at once, for it is their privilege to whistle for the missing money. They can relieve the numerous creditors of Archbishop Purcell, many of whom are much in need of relief of some kind, not having received anything thus far from the church with a big C, and they must be tired whistling. Great as these defalcations are, they are but a drop in the bucket compared with the loss occasioned by the Union General of a French Catholic Society, the funds of which evaporated completely, leaving nothing behind except a well-defined smell, suggestiv of something being in an advanced state of decomposition in France.

As soon as religious societies or corporations hav the handling of large sums of money, scandal, an investigation, and a vacuum in the exchequer, are sure to follow sooner or latter.

During the palmy days of the papacy, a certain cardinal, noted for his cynical wit, happened to pass through the treasury when a large sum of money was being counted in the presence of the pope, who remarked to the cardinal, as he took a handful of gold and poured it from one hand to the other: "The church can no longer say with St. Peter, 'Silver and gold hav I none."

"That's so," responded the cardinal, "but neither can the church any more say to the lame man, 'Take up thy bed and walk.'" This was the cardinal's way of saying that as the church's temporal power had increased its spiritual power had decreased.

Modern preachers, who claim the true apostolic succession, or who at least profess to walk in the apostle's footsteps, do some very queer things. We find it difficult to imagin the twelve apostles organizing a joint stock company, calling on all true believers to subscribe for shares, and then taking the subscribers' money and sinking it out of sight in "injudicious investments."

The transactions of Archbishop Purcell, and of the managers of the Augustinian Society, cause many worldly people to say that the pastors occasionally think more of the wool than they do of the welfare of the sheep in their charge, and to hint that the flock has been pretty thoroughly fleeced, and that many of the sheep will be lost during cold weather, owing to their poor condition.

These priests and preachers who engage in the investment business do not think that they are dishonest, and in one sense, probably they are not dishonest. They would not go out and rob a stage coach, and they could not be induced to aid in blowing open a bank safe in the dead of night, but to do so would not be more criminal or dishonest than for these men—who hav no knowledge of finances or financial affairs, and who, by their training and experience, are totally ignorant of the rules and routine of business—to induce poor and ignorant people to entrust their money to them for investment. There's the pity of it. It is the money of the comparativly poor that these clerical humbugs get control of. If business men or capitalists were caught in these wildcat schemes, we would not be sorry for them, but business men hav sense enough to know that clergymen and religious societies hav neither the facilities nor the ability to make profitable investments.

"GOD is good to the Irish," said the Rev. S. Mahone, of Williamsburgh, in a recent sermon. If God is good to the Irish, it would be interesting to know what must be the condition of a people to whom he is not good.

The Bible Account of Creation.

SIMPLE TRUTHS, SIMPLY PRESENTED, BY A SIMPLETON.

It is wondrous pityful how many persons accept as sacred truth religious theories and creeds, which they defend zealously, and manifest fierce and bitter hate of any who venture to doubt what they hav never themselvs taken the trouble to investigate.

Given one thousand devout church-members, and how many indorse the tenets of their denomination because after patient, thorough, unprejudiced examination they were convinced those tenets were founded on truth?

Let us candidly, as truth seekers, examin the record of creation, and honestly endeavor to learn just what the Bible does teach on this subject, "nothing extenuate, nor aught set down in malice," but quote very carefully, and in every instance giv chapter and verse.

We need to very carefully examin every statement in the Mosaic account of creation, because on its entire truth depends not alone Sabbath observance, about which Christians are just now so much excited, but the whole plan of salvation.

We turn to the first chapter of the Bible, the first book of Moses, called Genesis; in Hebrew, Bereshith —in the beginning.

There is no evidence that Moses wrote the book of Genesis, or even knew of its existence. If he was its author, he wrote of events that occurred over two thousand years before he was born. Let us examin the statements offered us as the holy words of God, for we are assured the internal evidence of the Bible is the best assurance of its divine authority:

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.

"And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.

"And God said, Let there be light; and there was light.

"And God saw the light, that it was good; and God divided the light from the darkness.

"And God called the light day, and the darkness he called night. And the evening and the morning were the first day" (Gen. i, 1–5).

We are mystified by the declaration, Light was called into existence three days before the sun. Christian ministers—learned D.D.'s, doctors of divinity (and such a poor, puny divinity certainly has need of doctors to strengthen and patch it up, for it is dreadfully weak and sickly)—tell us that this light was not a very good light; the good light came with the sun. But this is to deny the inspired word—to contradict God and the Bible. By the Bible they are condemned—"To the law and to the testimony: If they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them" (Isaiah viii, 20). When God saw the light it was good. Afterward, looking at it again, God declared "It was very good" (Gen. i, 31).

It is not really satisfactory, even to a simpleton, to be told by the most profound D.D. that it was good —for nothing. It is perhaps safe to believe that; but belief or disbelief can never alter a fact. If the Bible is true, God made good light the first day. God saw it, and declared it was good. This was before the sun existed. We are not told what became of that light, or where it was kept during the darkness of night. The question to be decided is, Would a total eclipse of the sun produce darkness? The Bible positivly declares it would not; there would still be a very good light, even if the sun ceased to exist. A simpleton doubts it.

Close the door and shutters, drop the heavy curtains over the windows, exclude every ray of sunlight. You find the darkness intense; but you must not believe it. It is not dark; there is good light that God made on the first day of creation there; you must hav faith to believe it, although you cannot possibly see it, for it is awfully wicked to question, or allow yourself to doubt, the Bible.

"And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters.

"And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament; and it was so.

"And God called the firmament heaven. And the evening and the morning were the second day" (Gen. i, 6–8).

So the Holy Ghost, archangels, and all the host of heaven were not created until after earth and light.

D. D.'s declare heaven always existed. But God with his own lips declares all were created within six days—"And God spake all these words, saying: For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is" (Exodus xx, 1 and 11).

All in heaven, just as much as all in earth, were created in six days. "Thus the heaven and the earth were finished and all the host of them" (Gen. ii, 1).

The questions are often asked: Where is heaven? What sort of a place is it? Now we know, beyond all question, heaven is the firmament, located in the midst of the waters—the space between the sea and the rain-clouds. Heaven was originally designed merely to divide the waters. The Bible says so.

If we are good Christians we shall go to the firmament when we die. But the learned D.D.'s say heaven is beyond the realms of time and space; and when the righteous die, their immortal souls go to heaven, where God is. Perhaps that is true. It is very simple to accept or reject any theory without fair examination. What is the immortal soul of man? Ministers describe it thus: It is indestructible, indivisible, without form or parts; cannot be seen, felt, smelt, heard, or tasted. (Is it possible to giv a better definition of nothing?) And this goes beyond the realms of time and space. Beyond time! Beyond space! That's nowhere. So the learned D.D.'s declaration simply means: When a good Christian dies, nothing goes nowhere; and let all the people say, Amen!

Again, the D.D.'s tell us God is everywhere, and that when we die our immortal soul takes its flight to heaven—goes to God. But if God is everywhere, if there was anything to go when we die it would hav no need of going. No matter where we die, God is right there. This must be so if God is everywhere. The only flight is simply a flight of the imagination.

For the benefit of those whose faith is founded on Bible, and Bible only, we would call attention to the fact that the words, immortal soul, immortal spirit, never-dying soul, never-dying spirit, or words conveying any such an idea, cannot be found within the lids of the Bible. The word Soul, or rather the Hebrew and Greek words from which it is translated, occurs in the Bible 873 times—768 times in the Old Testament, and 105 in the New Testament.

The word Spirit, or rather the word rendered spirit, occurs in the Bible 827 times—442 times in the Old Testament, and 385 times in the New Testament.

Their aggregate use, seventeen hundred times; yet never once qualified by such words as immortal, deathless, never dying, or any other words that can be construed to convey any such an idea. The word immortal occurs but once—"Now unto the king, eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honor and glory, forever and ever, amen" (1 Tim., i, 17).

The doctrin of immortal soulism is not found in the Bible. The idea was born of paganism, fostered by the Roman Catholic church, and it has now become the especial pet and protégé of Protestants.

"And God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear. And it was so.

"And God called the dry land earth; and the gathering together of the waters called he seas. And God saw that it was good.

"And God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth. And it was so.

"And the earth brought forth grass, and the herb yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind. And God saw that it was good.

"And the evening and the morning were the third day" (Gen. i, 9–13).

It was quick work for the earth to bring forth grass, herbs, seed, trees, and fruits, all in one day. Notice, God did not create vegetation from nothing; he let the earth bring forth. This was before the existence of the sun. We know it is impossible for vegetation to exist, much less trees to bear fruit, without the light, heat, and life-imparting power of the sun. But then it did, for the Bible says so.

D. D.'s tell us God, by the exercise of his omnipotence, caused the earth to thus miraculously bring forth. But if God is omnipotent, is he not also omniscient? Then, having all wisdom, why waste his miraculous power? There was none to be interested or benefited by the miracle. Why not hav created the sun first, that the earth might hav been kept in its orbit, instead of being miraculously held in space? Why not let the sun's heat and light aid the earth to bring forth vegetation? If we read this same record in some pagan book, should we not at once decide its lack of common sense and consistency proved the whole story simply a silly fable?

"And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs and for seasons and for days and years.

"And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to giv light upon the earth. And it was so.

"And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night. He made the stars also.

"And God set them in the firmament of the heaven to giv light upon the earth.

"And to rule over the day and the night, and to divide the light from the darkness. And God saw that it was good.

"And the evening and the morning were the fourth day" (Gen. i, 14–19).

It is here admitted the good light God made the first day, to divide day and night, did not satisfactorily accomplish its work. We read, verse 31, "God saw it was very good." But it is evident it worked very bad; and so the sun and moon were created to divide day from night, and for signs and for seasons and for days and years.

The sun is ninety-five millions of miles from the earth; some of the stars so far from the earth that it takes hundreds of years for their light to reach the earth. Herschell, with his immense telescope, discovered nebulæ whose light he calculated must hav traveled two million years before it reached our planet. Sirius, or the Dog-star, dazzles the eye of the astronomer like ten thousand stars combined, and is possibly a thousand times as large as our sun. Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, Neptune, form a family of giant worlds, each many hundred times larger than our earth.

The Bible plainly and positivly asserts that the sun, moon, and stars were all placed in the firmament—that is, heaven—the space between the rain-clouds and the sea. So the waters above the firmament—rain—must all pass through heaven in order to reach the earth—

"And God called the firmament heaven" (verse 8).

"And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters" (verse 6).

"Thus the heavens and the earth were finished and all the host of them" (Gen. ii, 1).

Eloquent and learned D.D.'s declare the saints shall follow their earthly occupations in heaven. If this Bible account of the creation is true, certainly umbrella-makers should be kept constantly at work, or what becomes of the cherished idea that heaven is a place of unalloyed happiness? Walking the streets of gold amidst drenching rain must dampen the celestial bliss of the most ecstatic saint. Fancy saints and angels with rain-soaked wings, bedrabbled, wretched, and miserable, as so many wet hens; how they must wish the water could be turned into a brimstone factory and be utilized in quenching the fires of hades.

The Bible tells us the sun and moon were placed in the firmament to divide day from night, and for signs and for seasons and for days and years. But no educated orthodox Christian, priest or layman, now teaches that the six days of creation were literal days—the logic of fact, demonstrated by science, has compelled a change of theory. We are now informed that the six days does not mean days, but six periods of a thousand or more years. If we demur to this because it contradicts the Bible, we are referred to 2 Peter, iii, 8—"One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." A glance at the context will show the utter irrelevance of this quotation, and expose their miserable sophism.

Does the sunlight make days a thousand years long? Do we hav one thousand years of night? Does not every school-boy learn that the earth is a sphere or globe, revolving in space once in every twenty-four hours upon its own axis, and around its center and parent, the sun, in 365 days, thus causing day and night, giving us years and seasons, summer and winter?

"And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven.

"And God created great whales and every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly, after their kind, and winged fowl after his kind. And God saw that it was good.

"And God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas, and let fowl multiply in the earth.

"And the evening and the morning were the fifth day" (Gen. i, 20–23).

Bible says fowls came forth out of the waters, just as grass, trees, and cattle came forth out of the earth.

If we must believe this, it were better not to mention it; for even in a select company of intelligent Christians if we should assert that all fowls came from the water, were created in the water, or made of water, instead of believing our assertion, we would be regarded as an ignoramus or an idiot. Yet the Bible distinctly says so.

There is no alternativ; either become a wicked Infidel, or believe the waters brought forth abundance of winged fowl. Other scriptures confirm this. When the children of Israel took their journey from Elim, into the wilderness between Elim and Sinai, they feared lest they should die for lack of food. God then solemnly promised them abundance of flesh and bread. We read: "At even ye shall eat flesh, and in the morning ye shall be filled with bread; and ye shall know that I am the Lord your God" (Exodus xvi, 12).

In the evening the quails came up, and in the morning, in lieu of the promised bread, they found the manna. It appears the promised quails soon failed; for about a year after, we learn this manna, that looked like coriander-seed and that tasted like fresh oil, had long been their only food. They cried for a little flesh to vary the sameness of their diet. Then we read: "And there went forth a wind from the Lord, and brought quails from the sea." "And while the flesh was yet between their teeth, ere it was chewed the wrath of the Lord was kindled against the people, and the Lord smote the people with a very great plague" (Num. ii, 31, 33).

So the work of creation was not ended in six days, but more than two thousand five hundred years after, God created and brought forth from the sea an immense flock of quails. But why the wrath of God should be kindled upon the children of Israel and he should smite them with a terrible plague for simply asking for change of diet, when God himself promised to giv them flesh every evening as well as bread every morning, there is no explanation. But, then, this scripture confirms the Mosaic account of creation; it proves fowls all came from the sea. And although that is against every fact of natural history, and contradicted by our own observation, we must believe it. What are we, that we should dare to doubt or question the Holy Bible?

"And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind; and it was so.

"And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and everything that creepeth upon the earth after his kind; and God saw that it was good.

"And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them hav dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.

"So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.

"And God blessed them and God said unto them, Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it; and hav dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.

"And God said, Behold I hav given you every herb bearing seed which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree in which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; and to you it shall be for meat.

"And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to everything that creepeth upon the earth wherein there is life [margin—a living soul], I hav given every green herb for meat; and it was so.

"And God saw everything that he had made, and behold it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day" (Gen. i, 24–31).

There has always been a mooted question among Christians as to the personality of God, and there is great diversity of opinion and teaching as to what God is like. But the Bible describes God plain and unmistakable—as a person, a colossal man (read verses 26 and 27). What is the meaning of the words "image" and "likeness?" We read in this same book of Genesis, v, 3: "And Adam lived a hundred and thirty years, and begat a son in his own likeness, after his image; and called his name Seth."

The words in both texts are alike in English and Hebrew. Image (Hebrew tzeh-lem) occurs thirty-four times in the Old Testament. Likeness (Hebrew d'mooth) occurs twenty-five times in the Old Testament.

The Bible declares man is the likeness and image of God, just as Seth was in the likeness and image of Adam; hence God is a colossal man.

Strange that so many devout Christians will so fiercely deny many of the very plainest statements of the Bible, and then denounce people for declining to accept its every word as sacred truth.

According to the Bible (verse 28) the commandment to love God and our neighbor is not the first or greatest commandment. Doctors of divinity hav always told us so. But the Bible shows this to be a mistake. We affirm this with great diffidence, but the Bible says: "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them" (Isa. viii, 20). There the Bible condemns them; but we shall not, because we find them convicted of error, apply to them all sorts of hard names. We simply produce the evidence.

The very first and most important commandment given to man and woman in their innocence was, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth." This command to ever diligently exercise their generativ functions preceded love to God—love to each other. It is claimed the Ten Commandments were given to Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden; but there is no such a record. At best this is only inferred, while the command to be fruitful and multiply is emphatically stated.

There is no statement within the lids of the Bible more plain, unmistakable, and emphatic—no truth more self-evident—than that this command is of primary import in the mind of God. The Bible reiterates it again and again, to the exclusion of all others. Why, unless to show it is of far greater consequence in God's opinion than all others? We read that when Noah and his family—the eight souls saved from the flood—landed at Mount Ararat, God spake to them. He gave them no admonition to love him, to love one another, to practice virtue, shun idolatry, vice, and sensuality, no word of doing to others as they would be done by; but repeated to them this his first great commandment, as delivered to Adam and Eve at their creation—that they should ever diligently exercise their generativ functions. He repeated this commandment in precisely the same words: "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Gen, ix, 1).

The oft-repeated question, Why was the account of the daughters of Lot recorded so fully in Genesis, ix, 30–38? is satisfactorily answered. They were fulfilling this sacred Bible commandment. [We refer the reader to the Bible; THE TRUTH SEEKER cannot permit its columns to be fouled by quoting obscenity.]

Lot's daughter had been educated to reverence and obey this first great commandment, given by God himself to Adam and Eve, and repeated with his own lips to Noah and his family.

The Bible account of creation is ample and complete justification of Lot's daughters. According to the Bible they did no wrong; they were simply obeying God's first great commandment the only way possible under their circumstances. The success of their endeavor must be recorded for an example and encouragement, for we are told those children each became the founder of a mighty race or nation. We read, "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrin, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness. That the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (2 Tim. iii, 16, 17).

This scripture, then (Gen. xix, 30–38), recording the doings of Lot's daughters, is given by inspiration of God, and is for our instruction, that men and women may become perfect in good works.

Infidels and Freethinkers condemn alike Lot's daughters, and the publication of the facts in a book claimed to be especially for the young and pure to read. But that's the trouble; they presume to disregard the Bible and all such teachings.

The Bible condemns them, for that contains no word or intimation of censure of Lot's daughters. How could it? If it did, it would be Bible contradicting itself. On the contrary, this record proves the perfect harmony of Bible ethics, and holds up to shame and contempt Freethinkers and Infidels who dare to condemn priests, ministers, and Sunday-school teachers, because, even under very difficult and trying circumstances, they make strenuous and persistent endeavors to obey what the Bible so emphatically declares to be God's own first great commandment.

Lest it should be thought we overestimate the importance God gave to this commandment, we call attention to the fact that not alone was it the very first words God spake to Noah and his family after the flood (see Gen. ix, 1), but he emphasizes and repeats it in the seventh verse of the same chapter: "And you, be ye fruitful and multiply; bring forth abundantly in the earth, and multiply therein."

We learn creation was completed in the six days; yet no carnivorous animals existed (Gen. i, 30)—no lions, tigers, eagles, vultures, or flesh-devouring animals. If they were created before the flood, they had different teeth or beaks, different claws, different stomachs, different natures, different habits—in fact, were so much different that they could not hav been lions, tigers, eagles, or vultures at all.

Clean and unclean beasts went into the ark herbivorous; they came out of the ark carnivorous. It was a wonderful change, and we are left to wonder how it came about. Noah never seems to hav noticed the transformation; Moses tells us no word of how it was done. But it is Bible, so simpletons simply believe it.

"Why take unquestioned, as the infallible word of the Almighty, the imperfect, improbable narrativ handed down from an age of ignorance? Why set aside the truths of science as unworthy of confidence, and giv implicit faith to the fallacies of an age of darkness, superstition, and error?" (D. M. Bennett).

At creation every green herb was given man for food. That this is absurd, inasmuch as very few green herbs are fit for human food, the majority being injurious or poisonous, every botanist well knows. It is, however, on a par with the declaration made by God to Noah and his family after the flood: "Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb hav I given you all things" (Gen. ix, iii). This is contrary to the truths of natural history and our own experience. Are spiders, toads, roaches, chinch-bugs, worms, beetles, and maggots food for man? Must be, for Bible says so. What is botany? What is natural history? Shall we dare to doubt the holy Bible just because its assertions are opposed to science, truth, and our own experience? However we may hav regarded the Bible account of creation before, now that just exactly what it does teach in the first chapter of Genesis is before us, we hav no excuse. To believe it we must cultivate faith. The Bible says, "The just shall liv by faith" (Gal. iii, 11), and it is no more difficult to swallow Bible assertions than every moving thing that liveth and every green herb for food.

All the different races of men descended from Adam and Eve. The doctors of divinity cannot agree in regard to the color of the first man and woman. Dr. Prichard, the father of English ethnology, thought that the original pair must hav been negroes, since there are no facts which induce us to suppose that white races could evolve negroes. Pallas, Lacipede, Hunter, Dornick, and Link were of the same opinion.

The Bible says man was made in likeness and image of God. White Christians might feel sensitiv over a thick-lipped, flat-nosed, wool-headed negro as a picture of God.

But what induced the descendants of Adam and Eve—men and women too—to travel so far, this too before the invention of ships or carriages? It is as much a mystery why they traveled as how they traveled, through unknown forests, arid deserts, over mountains, swimming rivers, lakes, and even the mighty ocean; and then, after performing such wonders of intelligence, enterprise, and endurance, to retrograde mentally and physically into the lowest order of Indian savages or negroes. But they did—the Bible says so.

So much for the first account of the creation, as given in the first chapter of Genesis. In our next we propose to examin the second chapter, which givs another account of creation. In this connection we will examin into the origin of Sunday observance, and learn just what the Bible, the early Christians, and the most credible church historians say on this subject, and what authority Christians hav for seeking to coerce all to rigidly and religiously observe it as God's holy Sabbath. The Junius Question.

The moment I read in an old book catalog the extract from the English Crisis I exclaimed, "That sounds like 'Junius' and like Thomas Paine!" By calling Mr. Burr's attention to the existence of this evidence, and afterward procuring two copies of the work for him, I hav congratulated myself that I put him on track of "the missing link" that connects the English "Junius" with the American "Common Sense," and shall continue to believe that Paine wrote the "Junius Letters" until stronger controverting evidence is forthcoming.

For years Mr. Burr has called on the critics to bring forward a single incompatible fact that would militate against the Paine-Junius theory, and the few feeble attempts in this line he has as summarily swept aside as does a thrifty housewife clear away the gauzy cobwebs. But, whatever the future may bring forth to test that theory, I would as soon doubt my own existence as allow myself to think that Paine was not the "Casca" of this old Crisis. I find, however, that so far as thinking Paine to be the master spirit of this ancient Crisis is concerned, we were all of us long since anticipated in it by our English friends, for in Mr. Holyoake's Reasoner, of 1855, there was offered for sale a copy of this "rare work by Paine."

Prof. Denslow, in his "Modern Thinkers," seems to hesitate about a dislike of the Scotch being one of Paine's characteristics. In this old work he will find no lack of evidence on this point.

The two vellum-bound copies of the letters that "Junius" had expressly bound and delivered to himself fail as yet of resurrection. The ordering of them with an eye to their destruction would hav been "just like Paine."

Griswold, in his appendix to Disraeli's "Curiosities of Literature," states that Aitkin had hard work to get Paine to prepare on time the promised "copy" for the Pennsylvania Magazine. Probably his being engaged on so much secret literary work accounts for what Griswold termed his "extreme indolence."

I hav read somewhere that Cobbett said, "Although Jefferson may hav written the Declaration of Independence, Paine was certainly its author."

It is to be hoped that the authorship of "Junius Unmasked" is not destined to become as difficult a mystery for future generations to unravel as has been for others the original Junius query. I visited Mr. Burr soon after "Junius Unmasked" appeared, and frankly inquired who its author was, but his reply was evasiv and indefinit.

I am eagerly devouring some old numbers of the North American Review and Quarterly Review, in which Chabot's "Handwriting of 'Junius' Professionally Investigated" is reviewed, and the claims of Lord Lyttleton, Earl Temple, Sackville, Tooke, J. Q. Adams, Pitt, and others are treated of.

An Infidel Christening.

The Pioche Record contains the account of a naming ceremony which occurred in that place on Washington's birthday. The occasion was the naming of the little girl of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Eilers. Mr. Eilers being an unbeliever, conceived the idea of the ceremony, which the Record describes as follows:

At about a quarter to 9 o'clock, in the presence of those assembled, Mr. Thompson Campbell arose and made a few befitting remarks, and then read the following address, stating the date of birth and name of the child, handed him by Mr. Eilers:

"Ladies and Gentlemen: We hav met here this evening for the purpose of naming the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Eilers. Let it be known to you and the world at large, that her name shall be Antje Eilers, born at Pioche, Lincoln county, Nevada, on the 10th day of October, 1882, at 3 o'clock A.M. Our only wish shall be that her mind shall be free from all undue influence and prejudices; that she shall reason and choose her own welfare hereafter. She owes us nothing, but to love and respect us as long as we deserve it, as her parents. May she be a benefit to humanity, a credit to the Stars and Stripes, and the spot on the globe where she was born, and on which she may hereafter liv. Hoping health and wealth may never be wanting to her, and that she may obey the laws of the land she may liv in; that she may grow up and we, her parents, may be proud of her. Ladies and gentlemen, in her name, we thank you all for witnessing this ceremony, and that this evening may be a pleasant memory to us all."

After this, the "naming ceremony" having been concluded, three of the gentlemen present stepped to the front and signed the paper read by Mr. Campbell, as witnesses, and a toast was drank to the future happiness and prosperity of the child.

Blasphemy.

The recent conviction of three men in England for blasphemy has astounded the civilized world and awakened it to the possibilities of the persecution of all heretics. Until this event occurred it was thought that imprisonment for speaking disrespectfully of God and Jesus Christ was impossible in a country that had produced a Darwin, a Tyndall, a Huxley, a Herbert Spencer. But how little we knew the capacity for cruelty with which Christianity endows its advocates and upholders! Blasphemy in the eyes of one of England's judges is worse than murder, and while he sentences a man who has taken human life to three months in jail, he incarcerates for a year one who has only spoken slightingly of Jesus Christ.

Such is English Christian consistency!

The Christmas number of the Freethinker, for editing, publishing, and printing which Messrs. Foote, Ramsay, and Kemp are consigned to prison, lies before us. The matter which particularly offended the good Christian people of London is a pictorial "New Life of Christ," in which the prominent incidents of that person's supposititicus career are depicted in a comic manner, calculated to raise a laugh at his expense. That is all. Yet for this Mr. Foote must languish a year in a dungeon.

The trial was terribly unfair, and the bitter hatred of the judge for the accused has never been more plainly shown in a court of injustice since Benedict sentenced Mr. Bennett to thirteen months at hard labor. While surrendered for trial, and yet unconvicted, the judge remanded them to jail, where they were confined in cold cells, and shut off by iron bars and wire lattices from communication with friends who visited them. Bail was offered, but contemptuously rejected by the bigoted Judge North, who announced his determination not to relax in any degree the severity of his order.

These men are convicted under a heresy law which, if enforced impartially and in all cases, would put the greatest minds of England behind prison bars, and consign to a cell all the newsdealers and booksellers of the land.

The public prosecutor laid particular stress upon the impiety of the pictures in the Freethinker, and in addressing the jury said that there are bounds to the liberty of opinion upon political, social, and religious matters! These people had transcended these bounds, and he asked the court to use its authority to punish them. The pictures had been "publicly exhibited, to the hurt of the conscience of Christian people, and were calculated to destroy the morals of the young and inexperienced." He argued that if London once had a blasphemous store established and the windows of it placarded with such pictures, they might be sure that in a population of millions some injury would be done. He then continued:

"It has been said that the law of blasphemy was obsolete; but so far as he was aware it was no more obsolete than the law of murder or theft. The same law that had ever prohibited blasphemy prohibited it now, and that it had not been put in practice was due more to the right thinking of the people of this country in obeying the law than to the fact that the law itself had passed into desuetude. People might hold views strongly adverse to the religious world, but it was not necessary that they should obtrude those views on their neighbors; that they should be plastered over the shop windows for the purpose of hurting and grieving the conscience and feeling of Christian people. Happily, into whatever sects it might be divided, the great body of the people of this country were Christians, and it was obvious that if they once permitted publications of the character he had described, it would be impossible for the people to allow their children to be in the streets, lest they should be misled by publications of this sort. Were it permitted, it would be a control by the minority of the great majority of the people of this country. Even if no law existed, it would be felt to be absolutely necessary to check the public exhibition of such pictures."

Such were the arguments advanced for the suppression of heresy. Why the Freethinkers should be more tender of the feelings of believers than the believers are of the feelings of Freethinkers this astute lawyer did not say. Christians obtrude their pictures and writings everywhere. Will the law protect the Freethinkers against them and their tracts? Christians hav no natural rights that Infidels hav not, and it is monstrous injustice that they should be deprived of their liberties and rights, and Christians be allowed to pester every one with their silly literature. What is blasphemy in one century is good orthodox teaching in the next. Quakers were once branded as blasphemers and whipped at the cart's tail, yet who calls them heretics to-day? Unitarians hav been punished for blasphemy, but no one regards them as heretics in 1883. Lord Shaftesbury, of England, says the publications of the Salvation Army are blasphemous, but they are what Mr. Foote in his defense called "permitted blasphemy," permitted because they are Christian. There is nothing in the Freethinker tending more to throw ridicule on the Christian religion than in the War Cry, the salvationists' organ. The most that can be made out of the case is that the Freethinker illustrations are not in good taste. But if people are to be punished for exercising bad taste, who shall stay out of prison? The line between good and bad taste is an invisible mark, sure to be placed where the prejudices of the censor see it.

The assertion that there are bounds to religious freedom of discussion is the dogma that drenched all Europe with blood three centuries and more ago, and if the English judiciary are going to adopt it as law they will find plenty to do. The definition of blasphemy by the judge is in spirit curiously like Benedict's definition of obscenity. It will cover every possible case. It is this, and we print it plain that all may know what English law regards as blasphemy. "English precedent" has great weight in American courts, but it will be an evil day when this law is followed: "If by writing or otherwise any one denied the existence of the deity, throwing abuse, contumely, and outrage upon sacred subjects, scoffing at 'God,' the 'trinity,' or the 'holy scriptures,' that by law was blasphemy." The judge also said that Christianity was a part of the common law of the land. If this be so, then blasphemy is only criticism of the common law, and if that is not to be permitted, then England is indeed under a despotism. If no examination of the prevailing religion of a country is permissible, then what excuse hav the Christians for sending missionaries into non-Christian countries? It would only be serving them as they serve others for the Mohammedans to imprison every missionary in Turkey for blasphemy against Mohammedanism, which is "part of the common law of the land." By this definition of blasphemy Judge North lays Christianity open to the charge of being the most intolerant of any religion, more so than even its old competitor, the religion of Mohammed. In doing this he shows that there is absolute need of men like Foote to liberalize Christianity and render habitable the lands it dominates. If a denial of the trinity is blasphemy, why are not the Unitarians prosecuted? If a repudiation of the scriptures is blasphemous, why is not every scholar in England under bonds for trial before Judge North? Why is not every Atheist expiating his offense in Newgate dungeons?

Mr. Foote was tried twice, once on Thursday, March 8th, and again on Monday, March 12th. The determination of the judge to convict, and his equally plain determination to torture, was seen at the close of the first trial. When the case was given them the jury retired about five o'clock and remained out till a little after seven, when the judge called them into court and asked them if he could in any way assist them by explaining the law again to them. Upon being told by the foreman of the jury that they understood the law, but there was no chance of their agreeing, the judge passionately said: "Then I must discharge the jury and hav the case tried again. I will attend here on Monday and try the case again, with a different jury." Mr. Foote asked to be allowed bail, but the judge peremptorily and harshly refused. On Monday, therefore, the case was tried again, resulting in conviction. It is probable the judge would hav tried it again and again, until he forced a conviction, had not this second jury complied with his wishes.

The scene at the trial is thus thrillingly depicted by Saladin in the Secular Review. It is enough to stir the blood of the most indifferent. Revenge is too truly a godlike and Christian trait to be harbored by Freethinkers, but one can hardly help sharing Saladin's feelings to a great extent:

"I sat in the Central Criminal Court, Old Bailey, through the anxious Thursday and the intensely anxious Monday of the trial for blasphemy. I saw the baleful old creed, at whose first breath 'the world grew grey,' rise once more to hurl its remaining modicum of brute force against the tendencies which would endanger its lucrativ craft, throw out of employ its silversmith, Demetrius, and sell as old metal its once consecrated shrines. We were willing to allow the old gorgon to die by evolution; but it fatuously elects to die by cataclysm. In the columns of our secular journals, from the platforms of our secular halls, we hav for long been shaping Christianity's funeral service; but, apparently tired of life, it has risen from its bed of death and helped us to drive the nails into its own coffin. 'Thank you, my lord,' said Mr. Foote, as he left the dock for his twelve months in jail; 'the sentence is worthy of your creed;' and one of Christianity's undertakers conducted him to the cells below.

"Our Freethought martyr had stood in that dock the livlong day, facing the flashing scabbard of the sword of justice, the purple and ermine of the judge, and the heavy gold chain of the sheriff; his fine, keenly-chiseled features, radiant in the setting of his long, yellow hair, confronting these antique paraphernalia like the genius of the living Present facing the rude symbolisms of the dying Past. We felt proud of our young colleague in the forlorn hope of Humanity, and never prouder of him than when the verdict of 'Guilty' had been brought in, and, pale as marble, but firm as steel, he faced the Christian judge. His mien and aspect were, at once, those of endurance and defiance. His fixed eye, but slightly quivering lip, and the statuesque attitude which he naturally struck, said, in language beside which verbal eloquence is dumb: 'Justice North, you hav been judge and prosecuting counsel rolled in one; the Christian jury hav delivered me into your hands, I expect no mercy, and I ask none. Strike; I can endure. I flinch not; I bend not. Under such crushing circumstances let your puling Christians find shelter in the wounds of their Jesus; I, the Infidel and philosopher, hav support on the rock of my indomitable manhood.' Sobs were mingled with hisses in the gallery over his head, and the hysterical and agonizing cries of his favorit sister rang through that dim and cruel chamber of horrors in which Infidelity was tried on this dread Monday—tried, and not found wanting.

"'Foote, you hav very considerable talents and eloquence, gifts to you from Almighty God, and you hav perverted them to the use of the devil,' remarked Justice North, in his labial, mincing, little way; 'and I sentence you to imprisonment for twelve calendar months.'

"During the pronunciation of these words there was the silence of death; you could hav heard, in the awful suspense, the beating of your own heart. But, in an instant, the galleries and the doorways burst into a loud and angry roar. Mr. Foote's sister cried with an intensity of emotion that was heart-rending, 'O George, my poor dear George!' and seemed, in her frantic distress, as if she would leap over the front of the gallery. Then there was a dull thud—she had fallen to the floor insensible. 'Damn Christianity!' 'Down with the accursed faith!' 'Curse you, Judge Jeffries!' the deep-voiced rage of men and the hysterical shrieking of women blent into one thunderous chorus, such as the Old Bailey, perhaps, never heard before in all its dread experience of wrath, and guilt, and agony.

"'Clear the gallery!' cried he in the purple, and in an instant the police burst in among our people. There were some minutes of tugging, and pushing, and hustling, and jostling, and execration, and hissing—and the gallery was empty. But the ejected sympathizers had joined the hundreds of their brethren who were waiting outside, and, while the sentences were being pronounced upon Ramsey and Kemp, the angry roar of the friends in the street pierced the tremendous walls of the Old Bailey, and rang distinctly in my ears, even though I sat close to the judicial bench. There I sat all day listening to every syllable with breathless eagerness. And, although I knew its step faltered in terrible suspense on the very threshold of the prison, I was proud that I was a Freethinker when Mr. Foote concluded his magnificent defense. When Mr. Ramsey alluded with artless pathos to his sleepless eyes—eyes that would not close during the whole of the four terrible nights he had spent in his cell, because he knew that the eyes of his little children at home were red with crying, because he had not, as usual, kissed them before they went to bed—I thought of my own children at home, and the tears gathered in my eyes. I wiped them away unobserved, half ashamed of being so womanly. But when the sentence was pronounced on Mr. Foote, and the yell of rage rang from the gallery, I caught the contagious excitement of the moment, and felt just in the mood to form one item in the surging front of any infuriated multitude which would dash itself against the walls and hurl down the English Bastile from battlement to basement."

It is a matter for congratulation that there are some English papers fair enough and free enough to speak out against the Jeffreys-like conduct of this judge. Reynold's periodical says:

"It is rather hard that the defendants were not allowed the courtesy of bail, for there was, apparently, not the slightest scintilla of suspicion that any improper use would be made by them of that concession. The disagreement of the jury in the first instance proved conclusivly that the whole indictment was unwise. Keeping the prisoners in jail looks worse than a piece of unwisdom. It will to many people appear harsh, vindictiv, uncalled for, and more than personally oppressiv. We may hav abolished the court of the Star Chamber, but it is becoming a grave question with many people how far modern society is not just as arbitrary in its sentiments and legal action as at any past period in English history."

"Rather hard" is a mild expression for one of the most miserable exhibitions of tyranny shown on the English bench for years, but the harsh and vindictiv apply with pertinent force.

The Liverpool Daily Post says:

"No man whose opinions diverge from orthodoxy to any large extent can count himself safe. No matter how reverently and cautiously he may express them, no matter how they may seem to himself and to some considerable class of his countrymen to make not against, but for religion, he is at the mercy of a fanatical prosecutor, a bigoted judge, and an orthodox jury. He has no shelter in the statute law of England. The common law will furnish abundant precedents for his condemnation."

The Birmingham Daily Mail exposes "the amazing folly and mischief of this prosecution from beginning to end." As to Mr. Justice North, it remarks:

"This anxiety to obtain a conviction, however creditable it may be to the intensity of Mr. Justice North's theological convictions, appears to us to be a departure from the best traditions of the English bench. We do not impute to his lordship any desire to be unjust. No doubt he acted throughout in the sincere belief that he was doing his duty alike to Christianity and the law, and rendering the state a signal service. Still the spectacle of Christianity wreaking its vengeance on its opponents, and imprisoning its scoffers, is not a pleasant one, and the obvious sympathy of the judge with the spirit of persecution, as evinced in the vindictiv nature of the sentence, does not contribute any sweetness to the picture."

The Mail then pointedly asks:

"Do any of our readers remember the late Winwood Reade's book, 'The Martyrdom of Man,' with its eloquent, but violent, attacks on Christianity? No prosecution followed that, though some of the passages in it were couched in the strongest possible terms. Is it to be understood that these proceedings depend upon the price at which the literature is circulated? Is that but choleric in the officer which in the common soldier is literally 'rank blasphemy?' May we profane in half-calf, but not in penny broadsheets? Is permitted blasphemy a question of seven-and-sixpenny binding? These questions force themselvs upon us when we look back and remember what has been tolerated, and compare it with what is punished with twelve months' imprisonment."

That this persecution will eventually recoil upon those engaged in it is as certain as day. The Secularists of England will not lie supinely down and wait to be trodden on further, and we are much mistaken if the church party does not regret this step they hav taken ere Foote has served his twelve months in prison. Mr. Bradlaugh, however, is yet to be tried upon the same charge. For his sake we wish he may not come before this Justice North, for although he neither owned, edited, printed, nor sold the Freethinker (the only connection he having with it being the occupancy of the same building for a while), this judge would convict on the sole ground that he is an Atheist, and if one jury disagreed with him would get another till he found one subservient to his wishes. In these trials England's judiciary has retrograded about two centuries.

Easter.

LAWRENCE, KAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: What gave rise to Easter Sunday? And how does it happen that it comes in March some years and in April others? Does it hav anything to do with the weather? Some say an early Easter brings early spring, late Easter, late spring. Please answer through THE TRUTH SEEKER. J. N. WATKINS.

The date of Easter is regulated by the calendar of Judea, in which the months are conterminous with the moon. The beginning of the Jewish year goes backward on the natural year eleven days annually. This anniversary is therefore movable in reference to the calendar regulated by the sun. The alleged resurrection of Christ took place just after the Jewish feast of the Passover. The different sects quarreled about this date, as about all other matters connected with their system, and the date was settled by the council of Nicea (A.D. 325). It was agreed that it should be the first Sunday after the 14th day of the calendar moon, which happens on or next after March 21st. This calendar moon, however, is not the moon of the heavens, nor the mean moon of the astronomers, but an imaginary moon created for ecclesiastical convenience in advance of the real moon. The word Easter is a survival from the old Teutonic mythology. Many superstitions hav clustered around this day, such as that the sun dances in the morning, etc. The day has no effect on anything except the fashionable religionists, who use it as an occasion to bring out their new spring clothes.

The Origin and Pedigree of Man.

In the four most recent numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER previous to the present issue we hav published a series of extracts from "The History of Creation," by Ernst Haeckel, the distinguished German disciple of Darwin and one of the foremost exponents of the theory of descent. The extracts quoted hav mainly to do with the purely animal descent of man; that is to say, his development out of the lowest forms of life concerning which we hav any knowledge or theory, through the various stages of which still-living species furnish examples, to the stage once occupied by unknown extinct human apes, generally spoken of as the "missing link," and from thence onward to genuin man.

As the author states at the outset, of all the special inferences drawn from the theory of descent, there is none of such importance as its application to man himself. The conclusion from the general inductiv law (i. e., that of reasoning from a part to the whole) is that man has developed gradually, by about twelve distinct steps, out of the lower animals possessing an internal skeleton or bones, and more immediately out of ape-like "mammals"—a general name given that class of animals which suckle their young. Every characteristic feature which distinguishes vertebrate or bony animals from the invertebrate or boneless, is possessed by man, and his relationship to the former division (namely, vertebrata) is established beyond all question. Further, there can be no doubt that man belongs to the sub-division of mammals called placentals—those having that soft and spongy substance called the placenta enveloping the young previous to birth, and through which the unborn child respires and receives its nourishment. Finally, there are two main divisions of the placental mammals, scientifically termed deciduata and indeciduata, the difference between the two consisting in the fact that among the former the placenta is thrown off in the form of after-birth with the young, and among the latter it is not. To the former group (deciduata) man doubtless belongs. In this group are found also other animals, forming with man two legions distinguished from each other by a difference in the shape of this placenta—discoplacentalia (those having a disk-shaped placenta), and zonoplacentalia (those having a placenta shaped like a zone or girdle). Man possesses the disk-shaped placenta, therefore belongs to the discoplacentalia; and having thus far located him in the animal kingdom, the next thing to be ascertained is his position in this group to which he has at last been assigned by reason of the similarity of his physical structure to that of other members of the same tribes, groups, sub-classes, etc.

There are five orders or kinds of the discoplacental animals—semi-apes; rodents (animals which gnaw, like rats, etc.); insectivora (those which feed mainly on insects); bats, and apes, the last being more like man in bodily features than any of the others. Man is to be placed in the same order with apes, or else he represents a sixth order of the group. Some naturalists hav separated man as a special order under the name of "two-handed" (bimana), and contrasted him with the apes under the name of "four-handed" (quadrumana). This separation is not indorsed by Prof. Haeckel, nor by Huxley, as the foot is used as a hand by wild races of men; the Chinese boatmen row and the Bengal workmen weave with it. The distinction, therefore, on merely physiological grounds, does not hold good. Furthermore, it is set forth that the difference between men and the higher apes is not equal to the difference between the higher and lower apes. Man, therefore, is to be placed with the fifth order of "discoplacentalia," namely, apes.

Huxley classes man, apes, and semi-apes in a single order called "primates," and sub-divides primates into seven families, of which man constitutes the first, and genuin apes the second. Here the process of separation seems to end. There are, however, two groups of genuin apes—the apes of America, and those of the Old World. In several important particulars man most resembles the latter; and here the final and definit conclusion is reached that man has developed out of the apes of the Old World.

But there still exist great difficulties in establishing the accurate pedigree of the human race. The nearest progenitors of man are tailless apes. Of these there are four genera—that is, four kinds possessing characters which distinguish them from all the others: (1) the orang; (2) the chimpanzee; (3) the gorilla; and (4) the gibbon. None of these can be said to be absolutely most like man, but each stands nearest man in some particular respect; for instance, the first in the order named stands nearest to man in the formation of the brain; the second in the formation of the skull; the third in the development of the hands and feet, and the fourth in the formation of the chest.

At this stage the author stops to point out this important fact, upon which general information is not very clear.

"Not one of all the still-living Apes, and consequently not one of the so-called Man-like Apes, can be the progenitor of the Human Race. This opinion, in fact, has never been maintained by thoughtful adherents of the Theory of Descent, but it has been assigned to them by their thoughtless opponents. The Ape-like progenitors of the Human Race are long since extinct. We may possibly still find their fossil bones in the tertiary rocks of southern Asia or Africa."

Thus the missing link between man and still-living, tailless, man-like apes (the gorilla, chimpanzee, orang, and gibbon) remains missing still; and as development never goes backward, the inhabitants of the earth will never again behold that mysterious creature, "neither brute nor human," which connected them by kindred ties with their hairy ancestor, the anthropoid ape.

The process by which man has developed out of simple, structureless, and formless lumps of mucous or albuminous matter (protoplasm)—something like the white of an egg—is given as concisely as it is possible for the details to be clearly presented, in Prof. Haeckel's "chain of the animal ancestors of man," as printed in numbers 11 and 12 of THE TRUTH SEEKER. This development the writer traces through twenty-two stages. Some of these stages are necessarily assumed, though their reality is considered a fact as self-evident as the existence of immediate parents. This is proved by the similarity of the embryo of man as an individual and the primordial germ of man as a race.

To find out when and where man passed through these stages, and how he attained his bony form, arose to his feet, and acquired the power of speech and produced his language, the reader is referred to Prof. Haeckel's exposition of the facts. Nothing can be more interesting or instructiv than this. He has proceeded from the beginning by ignoring the assumption of a special creation laid down in Genesis and defended by the theologians. The theory of descent is natural, consistent, and altogether in harmony with reason and human experience. The fact that the chain is incomplete cannot affect the soundness of the doctrin. As the death of a parent does not sever our ties of consanguinity with a still-living grandparent, so the disappearance from among living things of the "tailless narrow-nosed apes" has no weight against the theory that they some time, ages ago, perhaps, formed a separate group of beings a little less than man and a little more than beast. Certain it is that to the theory of evolution we must look for a history and an explanation of the origin and pedigree of man, whether what Haeckel has written is the final word that science will hav to say upon the subject, or whether what is at present known is but the forerunner of a completer knowledge, in which all the secrets which now exist concerning man's origin shall be laid bare.

THE Detroit News says that at the annual association of Congregational ministers, held in Olivet not long ago, Rev. W. B. Williams read a paper on secular education, which attracted much attention. He considered that the certain drift of a secular education was toward Infidelity and Atheism, and quoted figures from various countries to prove it. That the confession was wrung from his fears is shown by his assertion that religious schools are a necessity to stem this tide of Infidelity, or that the principles of religion must be taught by the state. It will be a sorry day for republican institutions when the state is so subverted from its rightful functions as to teach a religion so vitally opposed to them as the Christian.

A FRIEND in Bristol, Conn., has sent us a malignant article published in a Catholic paper of Hartford, concerning Paine's last hours. The letter purports to be by Bishop Benedict Fenwick, of Boston, and has been periodically resurrected by the Catholics since 1846. We shall next week print an exhaustiv article on the subject, showing this charge against Paine to be a purely ecclesiastical fabrication.

Does Josephus Notice Paul Also?

If Manahem the Essene was indeed one of Paul's associates at Antioch, may not Josephus hav noticed Paul also? We answer, Yes; unless, as we suspect, the self-styled apostle to the gentiles (Arameans) was too obscure for the notice of the Jewish historian.

But whether or not Manahem the Essene and Manahen of Acts were the same, it is not a little surprising that in the very next preceding paragraph of Josephus we find another holy prophet, also greatly revered by King Herod, belonging to the same sect that Paul did, and with a name strikingly like his—Pollio the Pharisee.

The first notice of Pollio is about seventeen years earlier. In the year 37 B.C. Jerusalem was besieged by Herod and the Roman general, Sossiers, for the purpose of expelling Antigonus. The siege was successful, and Antigonus was taken captiv. Josephus then says:

"And since Herod had now the government of all Judea put into his hands, he promoted such of the private men in the city as had been of his party; but never left off avenging and punishing every day those that had chosen to be of the party of his enemies. But Pollio the Pharisee and Sameas [Silvanus?], a disciple of his, were honored by him above all the rest; for when Jerusalem was besieged, they advised the citizens to receive Herod, for which advice they were well requited; but this Pollio, at the time when Herod was once upon his trial of life and death, foretold, in way of reproach, to Hyrcanus and the other judges, how this Herod, whom they suffered now to escape, would afterward inflict punishment on them all; which had its completion in time, while God fulfilled the words he had spoken" (Ant. xv, 1, §1).

Paul would hav been about sixty years old at this time, 37 B.C.

The next reference to Pollio is about sixteen or seventeen years later, 21 or 20 B.C.:

"When Herod had already re-edified Sebaste [Samaria] he resolved to send his sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, to Rome to enjoy the company of Cæsar [Augustus], who, when they came thither, lodged at the house of Pollio, who was very fond of Herod's friendship; and they had leave to lodge in Cæsar's own palace" (Ant. xv, 10, §1).

Dr. Whiston here makes the following note:

"This Pollio, with whom Herod's sons lived at Rome, was not Pollio the Pharisee, already mentioned by Josephus, chapter i, section 1, and again presently after this, chapter x, section 4, but Ausinius Pollio the Roman, as Spanheim here observes."

Without positivly disputing this averment, we think it quite singular that Herod should hav had two aged and distinguished friends named Pollio, one a holy Pharisee of Palestine, the other a Roman orator, poet, and historian. And why should not Josephus hav distinguished this Roman Pollio in some way from Pollio the Pharisee, whom he refers to again in the succeeding section four, as we shall presently see?

Caius Ansinius Pollio was born 76 B. C. and died A.D. 4. He was consul 40 B.C., and after 38 B.C. lived in retirement at Rome. None of his writings are extant.

But Paul the Pharisee also lived at Rome in his latter days, part of the time in bonds, whence he wrote several epistles. The letter to the Philippians was probably his last, unless those to Timothy and Titus are authentic. To the Philippians he says, "My bonds on account of the messiah are matter of notoriety in all the court" (i, 13).

For court the Greek version has palace—praitorio. What court or palace? That of Augustus Cæsar; for at the close of the letter he says, "All the saints salute you, especially those of Cæsar's household" (iv, 22).

There is no evidence that any of Nero Cæsar's family (A.D. 54–68) were Christians. Commentators can only venture to claim that some of Nero's servants may hav been believers. Josephus, who visited Rome A.D. 62 or 63, the very time when this epistle to the Philippians is generally believed to hav been written, says he was introduced to Poppea, Nero's wife, by a Jewish comedian. Josephus was a Pharisee like Paul. He came to procure liberty for certain priests of Judea then in bonds by order of the late procurator Felix (Life, §3). Why did he not find Paul there, also in bonds, writing epistles to the Philippians, to the Colossians, and to Philemon?

But to return to Pollio the Pharisee. In consequence of the suffering by the famin 23–24 B.C. Herod relieved his people of a third part of their taxes, and began to recover their good will. But the malcontents were many, and sedition threatened his throne. Fearing a revolt, he sought to compel the multitude to take an oath of fidelity. The greater part yielded through fear, but some resisted.

"But for such as were of a more open and generous disposition," says Josephus, "he by one means or other made away with them. He endeavored to persuade Pollio the Pharisee and Sameas [Silvanus?] and the greatest part of their scholars, to take the oath, but these would neither submit so to do, nor were they punished together with the rest, out of the reverence he bore to Pollio. The Essenes also, as we call a sect of ours, were excused from this imposition" (Ant. xv, 10, §4).

The next section, about Manahem the Essene, we hav already given entire in our last article. But, as a preface thereto, it is now proper to quote the two remaining sentences of the present section:

"These men [Essenes] liv the same kind of life as do those whom the Greeks call Pythagoreans, concerning whom I shall discourse more fully elsewhere. However, it is but fit to set down here the reasons wherefore Herod had these Essenes in such honor and thought higher of them than their mortal nature required; nor will this account be unsuitable to the nature of this history, as it will show the opinion men had of the Essenes" (Ibid).

Now we beg the reader to understand that while we are by no means certain either that Manahem the Essene was the Manahen of Acts, or that Pollio the Pharisee was Paul, yet we point to the coincidence of name, character, age, time, and other circumstances as very remarkable; and if the identity of either of these persons is improbable, where else will you find a trace of any one of the preachers of the Messiah in the voluminous history of Josephus? And if he never mentioned a single one of them, how can you escape the conclusion that they were all too obscure for notice?

P.S.—Since writing the above, in our search for information concerning ancient personages we hav read with comical surprise the following:

"HILLEL. . . . . Our only source of information in regard to Hillel 'the old' is the Talmud, unless indeed Pollion, referred to once and again by Josephus, be also Hillel under a Greek name. For the grounds on which this probable identification rests, and for a masterly sketch of Hillel and his place in the history of Israel, the great work of Ewald may be consulted" (Encyc. Brit.).

Now, we are just as willing as the learned Ewald to identify Pollio with Hillel, if the weight of evidence is sufficient; but the chief apparent difficulty seems to be the great age of Hillel at the time mentioned by Josephus, about 20 B.C. The eminent Hebrew scholar, Bartolocci, places the birth of Hillel 112 B.C.; and this is the date generally accepted. But it would make him 92 years old when Herod excused him from oath-taking.

Admitting nevertheless the possible identity of Pollio with Hillel, who is said to hav lived to the age of 120, may we not in that case be as reasonably certain that Pollio's disciple, Sameas, was our Saul? In Acts xxii, 13, Paul is reported as saying: "I was born in Tarsus of Cilicia, but was brought up in this city [Jerusalem] at the feet of Gamaliel." Who knows but that the writer or transcriber has substituted Gamaliel for Hillel?

ANTICHRIST.

Prohibition.

"My amusement is to find you taking your place with radical prohibitionists. In my opinion you are drifting away from free principles, or, to speak plainer, to compel by force men not to touch, taste, or handle, and to do just as you do. Such a system enjoined would be freedom with a vengeance. I wish myself that the traffic in liquors could be quietly abolished, but it is utterly impossible through prohibition. I hav seen too many years of wrangling over prohibition. I want no more. I want us all to come and unite in one strong license law, and restrict the business within the bounds of moderation and decency. "J. K."

As very many other of my Liberal friends also wonder that I advocate prohibition and wish the strong arm of the law to forbid all sale of intoxicating beverages, I will right here giv a few of my reasons for so doing. While radically opposed to all compulsory laws (in theory), yet I see no way, in our present condition of civilization, to avoid resorting to them in certain cases. For instance, I would not allow a habitual thief to ever hav his liberty, any more than I would a dangerous lunatic. We hav a moral right to protect ourselvs by force from all who would deliberately injure us or any member of society. Now, I hold that every licensed saloon, every manufacturer of alcoholic beverages, every dealer in fermented liquors, is as dangerous to society as a lunatic or a thief. You may bind the licensed salesman to refuse to sell to a minor or a habitual drunkard, but these classes never fail to obtain the liquor through some middle man to whom it may be lawfully sold. Is it worse to sell to a drunkard than to the temperate drinker who keeps tippling till he at last becomes also a drunkard?

Friend Kinson accuses me of wishing to "compel others to do just as I do." Well, if I am right, and see others in the wrong, and see them rushing to self-destruction, and carrying thousands more over the precipice with them, am I not justified in doing all I can to turn them into the safe path? Few intelligent hygienists, physicians, and moralists will deny that liquor is an evil—that it is poison to the system, and that it works ruin to body and mind, producing physical, moral, and mental degradation. Here are a few authorities showing the opinion of thinkers on the effects of alcohol, proving it to be what I call it—an unmixed evil, and a fit subject for lawful prohibition, if any one thing can be so called:

"There is no drop of alcoholic liquor in healthy and unchanged nature. God has not made alcohol in any other sense than he has created carrion or rotten eggs. It is the product of sugary substances decomposed, decaying. And whether called brandy, rum, whisky, being distilled and of fiery potency, or wine, ale, cider, being fermented only, and weak, the fermented element is the same thing—alcohol. 'Fermentation is nothing but the putrefaction of a substance containing no nitrogen.' 'Alcohol cannot be evolved from the sugar of vegetable matter until after vinous fermentation sets in, which is its decomposition or death.'"—Baron Liebig.

"Is intoxicating liquor ever a food? No, for there is nothing in it which can repair the wastes of nerve, muscle, blood, or bone. 'Plastic food feeds the blood-cells, alcohol destroys them; in health, food excites to normal action, alcohol tends to feverishness and inflammation; food givs force to the body; alcohol excites reaction and wastes force in the first place, and then, as a true narcotic, represses vital action and corresponding nutrition.'"—Dr. Munroe.

"Is it then a poison? Science says yes. 'It disconcerts life's healthy movements.' 'It possesses an inherent deleterious property, which introduced into the system destroys life, and has its place with arsenic, belladonna, prussic acid, and opium,' as a medicin only. Adds Dr. Willard Parker: 'In its effects upon the living system, it is first an irritant, and afterward, when it has entered the circulation, becomes a narcotic. Were alcohol an irritant only, a man would as soon poison himself with arsenic or aquafortis. The narcotic element is the siren that leads him on to ruin and to death.'

"If one eats bread, or meat, or milk, these substances, as such, very soon disappear, being formed into blood cells, plasma, tissue, and fuel, to repair the bodily waste and keep up its warmth. If one drinks intoxicating liquor, it is received by every organ as an irritant, an enemy; remains undigested, a foreign substance, and is immediately thrust out of the body by every excretory duct.

"These statements being scientific truths, it may be asked, Whence comes the desire for drink so general among all nations? It is answered, From the natural appetite in the race for stimulants, for excitants, for diet made hot with spices, and from the momentary exhilaration, the pleasurable feelings of the quickened flow of blood after drinking alcoholic liquor.

"It is again asked how the intense, craving appetite comes to a hard drinker if these things are so. It is answered, Most persons know what are inflamed eyes, or sores that itch and tingle so that the hands cannot be withheld from rubbing and scratching. To do this givs momentary relief, but inflames the itching spots more, and makes them harder to heal. So the stomach, inflamed and sore by alcoholic irritation, burns and tingles, but, when more liquor is swallowed to satisfy the gnawing thirst, momentary relief is gained, and, with repeated draughts, a stupefying ease results. But this only inflames the organ more, increases the terrible morbid thirst, till the stomach is marked with patches of purple sores or hopelessly ulcerated."—Watchword.

We "compel" men to pay their taxes, to pay their just debts, and to become as far as possible good citizens, husbands, and fathers. Now, the right to compel them to eschew alcoholic drinks is just as legitimate as any other right, once we hav full proof that these drinks are wholly evil in tendency. If any law at all is useful and necessary, the law that makes it impossible for a husband, father, brother, or son to obtain spirituous liquor is useful and necessary. As well license the forger, the counterfeiter, the poisoner, and the murderer as the rumseller. Here is a little picture of the benefits of licensing an evil. Read it and see the outcome of such a law:

"By the law you may sell to men and women, if they will buy. You hav given your bond and paid your license to sell to them, and no one has a right to molest you in your legal business. No matter what the consequences may be, no matter what poverty and destitution are produced by you selling according to law, you hav paid your money for this privilege, and you are licensed to pursue your calling. No matter what families are distracted and rendered miserable, no matter what wives are treated with violence, what children starve or mourn over the degradation of a parent, your business is legalized, and no one may interfere with you in it. No matter what mother may agonize over loss of a son, or sister blush for the shame of a brother, you hav a right to disregard them all and pursue your legal calling; you are licensed. You may fit up your lawful place of business in the most enticing and captivating form; you may furnish it with the most costly and elegant equipments for your lawful trade; you may fill it with the allurements to amusement; you may use all your arts to induce visitors; you may skilfully arrange and expose to view your choicest wines and captivating beverages; you may, then, induce thirst by all contrivances to produce a raging appetite for drink and then you may supply that appetite to the full, because it is lawful; you hav paid for it; you hav a license.

"You may allow boys, almost children, to frequent your saloon; they may witness the apparent satisfaction with which their seniors quaff the sparkling glass; you may be schooling and training them for the period of twenty-one, when they, too, can participate, for all this is lawful. You may hold the cup to their very lips, but you must not let them drink—that is unlawful. But while you hav all these privileges for the money you pay, this poor privilege of selling to children is denied you. Here parents hav the right to say, 'Leave my son to me until the law givs you the right to destroy him. Do not anticipate that terrible moment, when I can assert for him no further right of protection; that will be soon enough for me, for his mother, for his sister, for his friends, and for the community to see him take his road to death. Giv him to us in his childhood at least. Let us hav a few years of his youth, in which we may enjoy his innocence to repay us in some small degree for the care and love we hav lavished upon him.'"

If liquor selling can be abolished without law, all the better. If murder, arson, and theft can be abolished without law, all the better. If cruelty to animals, to wives, and to helpless little children can be abolished without law, all the better. I will work as faithfully as I can to elevate, educate, and enlighten, to prepare the race for freedom and for individual sovereignty. But until they are prepared I must plead for temptation to be removed from their reach. I would not place poison, sharp knives, or mad dogs where they could be got at by children, imbecils, or lunatics. And until men hav moral sense and culture enough to withstand the temptations of the intoxicants I would hav these things placed beyond their reach by law. Ignorance, lunacy, and infancy must be coerced if they incline to go wrong. Freedom, liberty, and self-sovereignty are beautiful things—glorious things, and altogether desirable. But until the race is prepared for them it must be protected.

With liberty in the distance ever beckoning us on, with freedom shining as our goal, let us battle this foe of intemperance till it is forever banished from our land. With peace, love, and hope on our banner fear not but victory will be ours. We do not believe in war, slavery, or compulsion. Love is the best known means to reach the good and the true. We would gladly giv all for the good of the world, but vain the sacrifice till the world is better prepared for the gift.

"Then turn, and be not alarmed, O Libertod—turn your undying face
To where the future, greater than all the past,
Is swiftly, surely preparing for you."

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. By Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B. Price, 50 cents. For sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

The first edition of this work was published anonymously some ten years ago, and had a considerable circulation at that time. The recent attempts of the clergy of New England to influence state legislation on the subject of divorce, in order that the present laws governing it may be made less liberal than they are, has induced the author to issue a second edition of "Marriage and Divorce." He treats the questions involved in the discussion from a Liberal and also biblical point of view. The sum and substance of the work is that true marriage is of itself both natural and divine, and consists of a union of two persons of the opposit sex in which the natural yearning of both find their satisfaction, and in which their ideals are actualized. Any other sexual union is not marriage, and can no more be made so than true marriage can be made more holy or binding by legal or ecclesiastical enactments or ceremonies. As there are no sufferings equal to those of an ill-mated pair, he would hav no laws which would make their union indissoluble except through death or adultery, as at present exist in some states and in England. The production of children is considered more an incident than the object of marriage, as that institution contemplates the development, happiness, and improvement of the married parties, and not the mere animal instinct which populates the earth. Free love, as opposed to bond love, every sensible person must believe in, love not being subject to volition of the will, but governed by attraction, not compulsion. The work is of itself so condensed as not to admit of an epitome which could in a satisfactory manner convey more than an idea of its general drift. A list of the subjects treated of will be found in the advertisment on another page.

Prof. Westbrook is the author of "The Bible—Whence and What?" and those who hav read that work need only be assured that the present volume is written in an equally able manner to feel an immediate interest in it.

SONGS OF THE MORNING. Original and Selected. By Caleb S. Weeks. In two volumes. Vol. I., original; including Responses to Old Hymns, and Old Hymns in Responding Versions. Vol. II., selections. Price of Vol. I., $1.00. Published and for sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

Volume I. of this collection is now completed and ready for the public. These songs Mr. Weeks refers to, in his "Introductory Remarks," as his "chirpings," which he has put forth hoping that they may somewhat help to bring people to see the true character of song, and to use this powerful soul-vivifier united with truthful and elevating thought. He admits that his own and some of his selections are not of a high order of poetry (and the same may be said of almost any volume of poems), but claims that they express in some degree the sentiments of the live, evolving, natural faith. Having subserved this end, the mission of the work will be accomplished.

The author has here, indeed, "chirped" to some purpose. We hav in his first volume a book of 212 pages, embracing 228 songs or hymns, and concluding with seven stanzas which may be used as "doxologies." Tunes are assigned to many of the hymns, and among them we find the familiar airs which hav been sung from time immemorial in connection with the superstitious drivel of Watts and other religious song writers. Mr. Weeks has reclaimed these good old tunes from the bad company in which he found them, and has made it possible for them to be sung "in the spirit and with the understanding." He has undertaken no offensiv parodies on what hav passed hitherto as "sacred" songs; he has merely changed those songs in such a manner as to eliminate the barbaric ideas with which their authors invested them, and placed them before the public in language which can do violence to neither the susceptibilities of the religionist nor the common sense of the skeptic. The foremost design of the work is evidently to show by contrast the superiority of rational song over that of superstition. This design has been carried out in a consistent and able manner, and this work will be in demand by those who conscientiously feel that they can no longer "sing the old songs."

"Songs of the Morning" is printed from new type, on heavy and handsome paper, firmly bound. No collection of song-books is anything like complete without this work, and those who do not possess such a collection should hav it by all means.

THE HISTORY OF RALAHINE. By E. T. Craig. 12 mo. 204 pp. Price, half a crown (60 cents). Published by Trubner & Co., Ludgate Hill, London.

This work, which has attained its twenty-second thousand, is designed, as the author writes us, to prove that plenty, peace, and contentment may be given to Ireland without force, coercion, Arms acts, or evictions. Ralahine was a co-operativ farm in the west of Ireland, secured and managed by E. T. Craig for the benefit of the Irish peasantry. "The History of Ralahine" delineates that gentleman's trials and struggles in establishing this institution in the face of most disheartening circumstances, and also givs his views on various subjects connected with agriculture and organization in Ireland. The experiment at Ralahine survived long enough to prove its practicability if honestly managed, its final dissolution being brought about by the absconding of its treasurer. The religious system of the organization was as follows:

"The only religion taught by the society was the unceasing practice of promoting the happiness of every man, woman, and child to the utmost extent in their power, without regard to country, sex, sect, or party. Hence the Bible was not used as a schoolbook; no sectarian opinions were taught in their schools; no public disputes about religious dogmas or party political questions took place; nor were members allowed to ridicule or revile each other's religion; nor was there any attempt at proselytism. Perfect freedom in the performance of religious duties and religious exercises was guaranteed to all. The teaching of religion to the children was left to ministers of religion and to the parents; but no priest or minister received anything from the funds of the society."

Though unable to repeat the attempt, Mr. Craig still believes that a potent lever for raising humanity lies hidden in a participation in profits by the producers of wealth, enabling all to share in the advantages of organization. There is no doubt that Mr. Craig is on the right track, though in endeavoring to organize the people of Ireland for any concerted and co-operativ movement, he probably has as difficult an element to deal with as could easily be found. The Irish people are slow to recognize their friends, as is illustrated by their attitude toward Charles Bradlaugh, and as Mr. Craig also found to his cost. Yet any movement looking to the amelioration of their present condition—which is certainly as deplorable as it could well be—will be wished good-speed by American Liberals; but it will be the opinion of the majority that until some aggressiv measure is instituted against the system of priesthood which claims and secures so large a proportion of the earnings of the Irish peasantry, that class will continue to suffer the same disabilities which hav degraded them in the past. Mr. Craig's book cannot be read without interest by any who feel a concern for the welfare of the children of the Emerald Isle.

HOW TO FEED THE BABY. By. C. E. Page, M.D. 12 mo., pp., 160. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents. For sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

How to find out the wants of a human being before the age has been reached at which those wants can be made known is a question which hitherto, according to our author, has not received due and sufficient attention from physicians and parents. The baby is at best a mystery, and its ways are past finding out. The efforts of the parent and physician to interpret the significance of the limited number of sounds which it is capable of uttering are generally futil. Its sufferings from colic or cramps, hunger or repletion, and its feelings of dissatisfaction at not being carried in the arms, "trotted" on the knee, or rocked in the cradle, whenever awake, are all expressed in the same general terms. The mother or nurse must recognize this difficulty, relinquish the endeavor to surmount it, and go about finding out the way in which infantile diseases may be obviated altogether. This is what the present author has attempted, and the result, as remarked in the case of his own child, has been highly satisfactory. "How to Feed the Baby" describes his method of procedure, and givs many health hints and statistics which are of interest and use to all parents.

WE hav received two pamphlets written by the Rev. George J. Low, of Ontario (Hunter, Rose & Co., publishers, Toronto)—"What Shall the End Be?" and "The Corporate Unity of the Church." The first is a "contribution to the present controversy on eschatology." "Eschatology," by the way, being a word seldom used, may be defined as the doctrin of the last or final things, and is intimately associated with the subject of the worm that dieth not, everlasting fire and no water handy, eternal misery, and other cheerful matters that go along with Christian funerals. This author finds difficulty in reconciling justice and endless misery, believes that through the grace of God all will finally be effectually saved, and takes refuge in the alleged fact that the judge of all the earth will do right. He has his misgivings on the subject, however, and professes not to dogmatize. He believes that "punishment will be everlasting," but that everlasting does not mean forever, nor forever everlasting. Both words mean a long while—how long a while he knows not; and whether we shall be judged on earth or allowed a change of venue he does not say. Whatever happens, we must hold fast to the faith. Altogether the Rev. Mr. Low's conclusions are not nearly as startling as his premises, and he leaves the reader in a state of suspense, nothing short of agonizing, as to whether he will get hell as his portion for a few days or a few "eons." Considering his own uncertainty, Mr. Low would hav done well to defer the expression of his opinion until he had received further inspiration upon the subject under discussion.

The second pamphlet is a categorical plea for the unity of the church to resist the inroads of Individualism, "the higher historical criticism," Materialism, and Positivism, and deprecating some attempts which hav been made by theologians to Christianize the theory of Sociologists in regard to "corporate humanity." The discourse is characterized by an absence of anything of importance or interest to the general reader.

A man who will come out no further into the light than has the Rev. Mr. Low, when he sees the way as clearly as this clergyman evidently does, may be suspected of having some worldly influence governing him which he considers of more importance than the truth.

MR. J. M. HAGAMAN, editor of the Kansas Blade, has issued in pamphlet form a discussion which he recently held with Mr. John N. Palmer on the subject of "The Bible or Jew God; He is Merciful," Mr. Palmer affirming and Mr. Hagaman denying. The stock arguments of the ordinary Christian are put forward by Mr. Palmer, and Mr. Hagaman proceeds in an off-hand way to show that gentleman wherein he errs. He advises his Christian friend to giv up his superstitious belief, as in addition to the other ills to which human flesh is heir he has the fear of hell before him, if not for himself, at least for some of his friends, which must be productiv of more or less misery. The controversy is carried on with due observance of the amenities of discussion, and if Mr. Palmer is not a better man for it he must certainly be a wiser one.

A CO-OPERATIV BUILDING PLAN ASSOCIATION has been formed in New York for the purpose of furnishing persons who intend to build with plans and specifications of suburban residences at greatly reduced prices. The association has issued a large and handsome 4to pamphlet of 48 pages, entitled "How to Build a House," illustrated with cuts and partial plans of over fifty specimens of rural architecture which can be erected at costs ranging from $900 to $18,000. Anyone contemplating the erection of a house, by procuring this pamphlet, will thus hav laid before him to choose from a large variety of plans, drawn by skilled artists, and many of which hav already been built from and their practicability tested. The publishers will furnish, at prices given in "How to Build a House," correct plans and complete specifications for any design contained in that publication at what they claim to be one-tenth of the usual cost, and from which ordinary carpenters can proceed to build without the expense of a "boss" being incurred. The price of the pamphlet is 50 cents, and it is published at 24 Beekman street, this city. It may be ordered through THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

"TELEGRAPHONING the Three, M. M. M.—Malthusianism!! Mongrelization, and Murder!! Twin Relics with Vaccination!!!" is the somewhat startling title of a pamphlet published in Taylor, Texas, by Mr. J. Barry Strong. The author regards vaccination as a conspiracy to depopulate the American continent from 1880 to 1887 by the process of murder. The pamphlet is a collection of articles which he and others hav contributed to the various newspapers of Texas. The price is rather high, being set at $1.00; but Mr. Strong thinks that to pay a dollar for vaccination and scruple to pay the same price for his book is penny wise and pound foolish. The work is unique but sensible.

IN the North American Review for April, the scriptural and the legal aspects of Divorce are presented respectivly by the Rev. Dr. Theodore D. Woolsey, well known for his insistance on the indissolubility of the marriage tie, and by Judge John A Jameson, a jurist whose long experience with divorce cases in Chicago, both on the judicial bench and at the bar, lends to his observations a special value. Dr. P. Bender, a Canadian who has studied to some purpose the political, social and economic conditions of his country, under the title, "A Canadian View of Annexation," makes a forcible presentation of the reasons which incline many citizens of the Dominion to regard with favor the idea of absorption by the United States. Senator John A. Logan sets forth the need which exists for "National Aid to Public Schools" in the several states and territories. The Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby writes of "The Dangerous Classes" that menace the perpetuity of civil order and the peace of the community, meaning the manipulators of corporation stocks and the men who, having amassed enormous wealth, use it for nefarious purposes. James C. Welling, president of Columbian University, treats of "Race Education," the problem that confronts the philosophic statesman, of the presence in our body politic of a strong Negro contingent. "The Water Supply of Cities" is discussed by Charles F. Wingate. "Ethical Systems" by Professor F. H. Hedge, "Street Begging" by Rev. Dr. Charles F. Deems, and "Criticism and Christianity" by O. B. Frothingham. Published at 30 Lafayette Place, New York, and for sale by booksellers generally.

Letters from Friends.

STRBATOR, March 1, 1883.

MRS. MARY BENNETT: Please find $5.50, which will pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER this year, and Vol. IV. of "A Truth Seeker Around the World;" $1 for the Monument, and 50 cents for two "Crimes of Preachers." I would like to donate more for the Monument Fund, but circumstances won't permit. I would like to see one erected so high that all the orthodox in the state could see it and be made to think that the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are not asleep.

P. F. GRAY.

ST. CATHARINES, March 3, 1883.

MRS. M. W. BENNETT: Please allow me to sympathize with you in the loss of your good companion, not to you only but to the whole Freethinking public. But you hav got a remarkably good substitute to fill his chair editorial. The last few numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER were nuggets of gold, and may they continue thus to improve for all time to come; and may its subscription list rapidly increase yearly until all civilized men throughout the earth become Freethinkers, is the fervent desire of your well wisher, C. B. THOMPSON.

ORISKANY FALLS, March 5, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the date in my paper I am indebted to you for THE TRUTH SEEKER, since Jan. 1st, 1882; so inclosed please find $5.50 to pay for it until Jan. 1st, 1884; and also $1 to the Bennett Monument Fund. I think there ought to be Liberals enough at twenty-five cents apiece to raise a monument higher than the clouds and show the lantern-jawed bigots there is a God in Israel, and a D. M. Bennett in the spirit-land. Giv my best respects to Mrs. Bennett, and all connected with THE TRUTH SEEKER. Fraternally yours, CHARLES WATERMAN.

MONTEZUMA, March 14, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: We hav gained an important victory over orthodoxy at this place. Two Freethinkers hav been elected as directors of our public schools. It made the Methodists howl. G. W. Kierullf, a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and also cashier of the bank at this place, is a very outspoken Liberal. He does not go behind the stump, afraid to express his views. Mr. Kierullf is one of the directors, and Mr. Taylor the other. Seventy-five per cent of the men here are Freethinkers. The ladies, however, are nearly all church-members.

Truly yours, M. BENE.

WALTON, March 12, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I hav one word I wish to say about Mr. Herndon's talk of Mr. Lincoln. One-half of this nation cares nothing about Lincoln's politics or religion, alias the man, therefore half the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER take no interest in them. I would say to Mr. Herndon what D. M. Bennett said to Mr. Teed, with whom he had a theological discussion—if he wanted to promulgate his peculiar doctrins to the world he had better start a paper of his own, as he could not ventilate the new theory any longer for him. Now, half the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER wish Mr. Herndon to start a paper of his own to circulate Lincoln's religion and politics to the world.

Herein is one dollar for the Bennett Monument. The hall I will go ten dollars on. I suggest the name of the hall to be, "The Truth Seeker Bennett Hall." If he were here I think that name would please him. E. VANBUSKIRK.

CINCINNATI.

MR. EDITOR: A gentleman by the name of R. Fleming seems to be somewhat disconcerted because T. Winter claims to hav a mind of his own. He (R. Fleming) says he is a seeker after truth, but he does not say he found it. Now, T. Winter has been a truth seeker over sixty-five years, and I think R. Fleming will say that is long enough to find it. During that period T. Winter has sifted every known history, ancient and modern, and given the utmost attention to every movement of men in all parts of civilization; in a word, wherever the honest truth could be developed, there I sought it, and I squarely think and believe I hav discovered truth, and nature alone is my infallible instructor, and its teachings are thus: Man is a part of nature, begotten by natural laws, possessed of only one organic material system, which began with his first drawn breath, and ends with the last, in common with all other animal existences. The highest order of training does not alter his destiny. A dual life is visionary, fanatical, and full of error, and the longer I liv, and the more I study, the clearer are my convictions that scientific Materialism is the solid truth, and if this grand and unmistakable truth prevailed over the whole earth no disturbance, persecutions, or anti-friendly feelings would ever occur, inasmuch as the Materialistic philosophy means love, kindness, charity, morality, and the strongest desire to make our present and only existence happy and prosperous, and improved to the utmost during that life, not for a class or clique; no! but for all humanity. Materialism has nothing against man, but it bravely and boldly fights against senseless and useless systems invented by clerical knaves and other charlatans who ever plot and scheme to swindle the thoughtless and the ignorant.

In conclusion, I affirm that Materlalism is the adamantine rack of truth, and will stand the test of the closest investigation. The more it is rubbed and scoured the brighter will it shine. Not so with any other axiom. Yours, T. WINTER.

HALLVILLE, Feb. 28, 1883.

FRIEND MRS. BENNETT: I am one of those whom it seems destiny has determined should follow the plow, or, in other words, a farmer. I became a patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER through the solicitation of Calvin Livingston, of Waynesville, to whom I embrace the present to acknowledge an inexpressible gratitude. Four years' reading of Liberal literature has made me free—free indeed. Sorrow is but a feeble expression of our feelings when we learned that the great light had gone out, that a star of unequaled brilliancy had gone down and forever. But let us count the little paper safe yet; we believe it is. With us it is the last in the evening, and first in the morning. Brother Macdonald can place me on the list as a lifetime friend and supporter.

Within please find $17.00—5.50 to apply on subscription; $10.50 for the four volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," $1 to the Bennett Monument Fund. A. JEFFREY.

BELVIDERE, Feb. 5, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: The movement that Liberals are making toward establishing a new era looks to me as not necessary at all. I don't think that they will ever succeed in their enterprise, and I don't see why they feel sensitiv in using the old one, for it is not the year of our Lord Jesus Christ at all; for, according to the Christian's own admittance, Christ was born four years before the year 1. Now the best way out of the difficulty is this: If our good friend Antichrist, or some other deep reader in ancient history, will try to discover some good old Infidel that was born or died four years after the birth of Christ, it makes no difference how obscure his position in life was, let us substitute his name in place of J. Christ's, and the whole difficulty would be met. I hav no doubt that Christians would like to rectify the mistake they hav made, but custom is too strong for them. I defy them to rectify it; and if the whole Christian world is not able to remedy that little blunder, how is it possible for a handful of Infidels to do it? The mistake that Christians hav made in their chronolology is—I was almost going to say was—a providential one, but it is a fortunate one, anyhow. Why, anyone can see that the year 1883 is not the year of the Lord Jesus Christ at all, although it is most certainly the year of the Lord Someotherfellow. I remain Yours truly,

ROBERT SWAIL.

JACKSON, March 3, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I and many others hav just returned from a sight that seems to me humiliating for an American citizen to witness. It was this: A baptism. Two more souls hav been relieved from bondage—made free, so they say—but if any one will explain how they hav been made free by being dipped in the cold St. Johns and then joined to the narrow-gauge Baptist church, I am all ears to hear the explanation. O my country! how long will that mystic story of Jesus, warped and twisted as it has been by designing popery and priestcraft, hold our spiritual beings in such bondage? I who am speaking to you am a poor ex-soldier of the war for the Union. Oh how heavy the curse of slavery in our own free country rested on my young soul, and how gladly I shouldered my gun and marched away to do battle to overthrow the vile institution; but the piteous sight I hav just witnessed, and the silly bosh the Bible banger had to say, forced the questions into my mind: Was slavery the only curse? Are Americans free? Is there not a blightful, withering curse, worse even than that of slavery, twined around, fastened on, and hanging over us? My soul answers, There is; for the first only enslavened the body of colored people, while the superstitious curse of religion, so called, enslaves the body and soul of all regardless of caste. My friends, what are we to do? Must we, who freed millions of colored slaves, die now and leave our children bound hand and foot, body and soul, by those bloated vampires, those bigoted whangdoodles, the howling wolves of the church? Some may answer me by saying, "I would not worry any about it; time will make all right." I would say to them: Why did you not take that advice in regard to the slave question in '61? If we had the right then, and I think we had, we ought also to hav a right now, and I think we hav to interfere in this mental slave question. We can go this far at least: abolish the Bible from the courts and schools of our country, and force, if need be, the right of free speech on all subjects in every hamlet of our common country.

SAMUEL B. HURLBUT,
Ex-member of the 9th Iowa Veteran Volunteers.

IN THE WILDERNESS OF NORTHERN MICHIGAN, Feb. 18, 1883.

From my little log den in the wildnerness I would like to propound a few questions to my "Christian friends" of the United States, and hav explained to me some things that perplex me, in my lonely retreat, very sadly. Of course I can giv but a few samples, in many that stagger me, in my efforts to get wisdom, but here are a few stumbling-blocks.

I read that the apostles "quarreled amongst themselvs to see who should be greatest," and "rebuked little children" when they tried to come nigh to the savior. This occurred after they had been eye and ear witnesses to his astounding works, and the "voice of God thundering from the clouds, This is my son, hear ye him," etc.

Now all this most tremendous proof that what he told them was truth failed utterly to humanize and "teach the way" to those who were present with him daily for years, but left them in such a beastly condition of morals that they would "quarrel" like ward politicians, "to see who should be greatest," and at last affected them so little that, in the first hour of affliction of their friend and teacher, eleven of these hearers and followers deserted and denied him, one betrayed him for a handful of silver, and the masses killed him; (and even after he "raised from the dead on the third day" to convince the people that he was the savior—and peace the best policy—the nations who followed him slashing right on for 1883 years, even worse than Jews and pagans). If all this failed to "change the hearts" of those who heard and witnessed his awful works, in the very day, and among the living men who were with, him how then can it be expected to humanize men, and stop the "quarreling to be greatest," by reciting over the story of this signal failure 1800 years after? And I might add the same question to Moses's teachings and miracles—if the Jews after forty years of such training, in less than forty days after the close of the school, backsliding and worshiping a metal calf—if all this still left them murderers and thieves, for centuries after, can readi g of these awful failures make man human to-day?

If we desire proof of the fallacy of miracles, and the utter gross and insane stupidity of the old system of humanizing mankind, there cannot possibly be produced stronger and more positiv evidence than the Bible itself. For where we read of the greatest number of miracles, and "inspired" teachers, right there we see the most unmistakable proof of barbarous cruelty and treachery; practiced by not only the workers of miracles, but the eye and ear witnesses themselvs; and just in preportion as the miracles and "inspired" teachers decreased in frequency and numbers, we see the people becoming more and more human and intelligent.

Theologians hav always supposed—as ignorant of man's moral nature as were the physicians of the past of his physical nature, giving poison for panacea—that man could be made to love his fellow-being by appealing to his fears of pain (hell) and love of pleasure (heaven), and that he could be made unselfish by appealing to his most selfish instincts; that the cruel man, who feels no sympathy for his wounded, bleeding, and groaning fellow-man under his feet, could be made to feel genuin emotions of sympathy for the sufferer by holding up to the "sinner's" imagination a bleeding, groaning Jesus on the cross, who will send them to hell if they don't "repent," and giv them endless joy if they will feel sorrow for the afflicted. This of course makes the "sinner" very "repentant" and "sorrowful," but for whom is he "sorry?" Certainly for no one but himself; every selfish instinct being intensified, he drops on his knees and howls, anxious only to be saved," "O Lord, what shall I do to be saved?" Now it is easy to see how this system (theology in a nut-shell) must kill out the natural sympathies, and, by rousing up a man's selfish fears, make him a heartless hypocrit and soulless villian; and that the fact that there is one in thirteen Christians who cannot betray or desert and crucify this friend in his calamity—following the example of the first twelve "Christian friends"—that all are not depraved and treacherous, and made into devils under this system, is most amazing proof that nature planted the "good angels" so deeply in man's heart that all the devils of hell could not quite kill them out.

That one man in one hundred recovered under the old system of medicin, and the race not exterminated, we now see was astounding proof that nature made man with such powers of resistance that even scientific butchers and poisoners could not destroy him.

You censure Comstock & Co. for their work of cruelty and treachery, when the fact is, the hypocrit is no more to blame for being what he is than you are to blame for following the opposit course. You plainly see that all men must follow the light they hav, and go that road that givs them highest and most permanent pleasure. And all men would go the way that brings perfect success and highest happiness, if they knew the way. A distorted mental and moral vision (caused by education and hereditary influences) makes every transgressor on earth—and not one but has been more "sinned against than sinning." If we hate as Christians do, and persecute our enemies like "inspired teachers," we prove our light no better than theirs, and lack the true light, developed reason. The skilful physician never hates and censures the poor patient for disease and deformities, but finds the cause and removes it. See that you do likewise.

C. H. BARLOW.

VALLEY FALLS, KAN., Feb. 28, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find draft for $5—$2.50 to pay for my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, $1 toward erecting a monument on the grave of our beloved Mr. Bennett, and the rest as directed.

I cannot see how you could afford to reduce the price to $2.50; it was already cheap enough, and none of your patrons expected such a reduction to be made. Now let every member of THE TRUTH SEEKER family act as an agent, and each one try to get at least one more subscriber to help to double, yea, triple, the present subscription list before July 1st, next, to show dear Mrs. Bennett and her very able assistant, Mr. E. Macdonald, that we appreciate their efforts. As we help her, we also help our cause and enlist still more soldiers in our ranks of Freethought. That we need to be watchful is shown by the just now very activ so-called National Reform Association—what an unsuspicious name they selected for their purpose—which holds its conventions here in the West. One of those conventions was held here on Feb. 13th and 14th in the M. E. church. Most of the preachers present were Presbyterian. The extremest ones of those are the so-called Covenanters, who are bound and work with might to put God in the Constitution of the United States; and to work toward that end, the convention was called. They had in all four sessions. In some of their addresses they showed—or at least they tried to show—with upturned eyes, how necessary such an amendment was for the welfare and preservation of this nation, and no Sabbath law (which they try so very hard to enforce wherever they hav the power) could be successfully enforced without that amendment. How these more than useless drones strive to deprive a poor man, yea, cheat a poor man, who is compelled to work hard six full days to earn enough to keep body and soul together, so to speak, out of the only day set apart for recreation, not sanctification, and drive us in between their church walls, or sit behind the curtains at home, Bible in hand, reading some of those beautiful chapters in the Old Testament, which are too obscene to be mentioned, making a face like a dyspeptic! How they lament at the desecration of the Sabbath, and one preacher said Uncle Sam is the worst Sabbath-breaker of all.

On the Sabbath question many addresses were made, and at length and breadth discussed. They are very sure of success; they at least think so. They boasted over one step gained already, and that is, the President of the United States is not compelled to sign any document on the Sabbath day. But a good deal of labor must yet be done to gain the whole victory. (I think so myself.) Foreign immigration givs those hypocrits a great deal of trouble, and one preacher said if the gospel influence did not follow immigration westward—what gospel influence means we all know—they would turn up in our eastern cities as the Goths and Vandals once did in Rome, as immigration tends toward barbarism, What a new doctrin; how very complimentary! I wonder where his grand or great grandfather came from; whether he was an Apache or some other Indian, and did not immigrate at all. That strong Infidel element in the immigration lies pretty heavy on their tender stomachs.

Then resolutions were passed that God was the source of all power, and Jesus Christ the appointed ruler of all nations. They appointed that gentleman before I got there, as I only attended the two last sessions—the primary meeting was over, and the nomination was made. I told one of their biggest trumps, a Covenanter preacher, that suppose he should be called upon to prove beyond doubt that Jesus Christ was the appointed ruler of nations he might find himself in the same position as those Catholic priests in Australia, of which I had read just a little a few days before in one of our papers, who cannnot get the $7,000 unless they prove conclusivly that there is a place called purgatory, and the soul is really out. He did not know what to answer me. Further, I said, I was raised a Protestant, but if I would ever be compelled to unite with any church (which we should hav to do or burn at the stake if those fellows would ever gain their end) it would be the Catholic, as there would still be a chance to get out; but once in their Protestant hell, there would be no way of escaping, but would hav to burn forever and ever and in all eternity. What a horrible doctrin that was! I could not get him to listen any longer. He was compelled to go. Of course, the subject did not suit him.

In the afternoon session Mr. Harmon, editor of the Kansas Liberal, was invited by the secretary of the convention to read an essay, which he did very ably, on our reason to oppose their movement. It was very attentivly listened to by the audience. At the evening session, the last one, some of the preachers—the most intolerant ones—tried very hard to hit us Liberals back, not many being present. First, they slandered Thomas Paine; said he repented on his death-bed, warned others not to follow his path, etc. Next came Robert Ingersoll. They called him the greyhound of Liberalism, quoted some of his sayings, and ridiculed them. Now if Mr. Ingersoll could hav stepped in among those reverends, they would hav died of fright, or would hav kept silent if called upon to answer some of his arguments. If they knew him only at a distance of two hundred miles, they would not dare to mention him in that way, especially as the talent present was far below the medium. As this was in the last hour, they reserved it as a good joke or treat to their audience, I suppose. That Covenanter preacher, who it seems had most to say, tried to read the Liberal platform, free rostrum, free press, free mail; then he put in his own comments, saying free labor, free land, free money, free marriage, free divorce, free love, free whisky, in fact everything free. Would not that be a lovely state of affairs? They would soon break in our houses, take what valuables they could find to themselvs, and put their hands in our pockets. He threw Liberals, cutthroats, housebreakers, thieves, Nihilists, Communists, Socialists, Freelovers, all in one pile—no distinction made. He tried his very best to prejudice the audience against Freethought in general; indeed, he so outraged the feelings of every decent man and woman in the audience that the secretary of the convention entirely omitted to mention anything about it in the report sent to the papers, notwithstanding the applause his speech met with. Of course this speaks not very well for a community, nor better for the audience present.

The editor of the Kansas Liberal, who was present, tried to reply to that slander in a few words, saying, "Won't you let me hav a few minutes?" He said, harshly, "No, I won't." Of course that settled the thing for that time; but we Liberals here will try to get the mean slanderer to come forward again, and we will prepare for a debate. But I am afraid he will not come forward. We challenged him and some other reverends, a few years ago, to discuss some Bible questions with us, but silence reigned supreme, nobody answered, and nobody came; but occasionally sneers and slanders, calling our Liberal League a devil's league, and our hall, where we used to hold our meetings—the largest and best hall at that time in town—a devil's den. The convention hurt their cause much by the very ungentlemanly, disorderly conduct of that intolerant preacher.

Sincerely yours, MRS. SUSAN REICHERTER.

GANTZ—SEVERANCE—SYPHERS.

YATES CITY.

MR. EDITOR of the dear old TRUTH SEEKER, Truth Finder, and Truth Disseminator: As I am one who looks upon the whisky question and the prohibitory issue as being the foremost and uppermost among the live issues of this age and of this country; and also knowing that they are destined to become still more and more alive every year, until finally they will take the lead and absorb all other issues, and that they will hold the public mind until a final solution of the great problem is attained, I therefore hav concluded to write you an article on that subject.

I see in your issue of March 10th that Sister Severance gets after Brother Gantz on the score of individual sovereignty, so I hav concluded to get after Sister Severance on the score of personal rights, as set forth in her article. In the first place, she regrets that it is so hard for the common people, and for many Liberals, too (and they are generally supposed to be smart), to see the difference between the right of the individual to do what he may elect (that is, whatever he pleases), and to believe his acts, whatever they may be, to be right upon principle. She declares herself ready "to fight" for Brother Gantz's right to eat meat, drink tea and coffee, masticate tobacco, etc. But why did not the sister include "and to drink whisky" in her catalog? And especially as that is what all this arguing and writing is about. I guess she concluded (and correctly, too) that that would not sound very well in an article written for the public ear by a woman. The first question for the sister to ask herself is, Whether any of those things she has enumerated are an injury to individuals, to society, and to the human race; and if experience has proved any of them to be such, then to that particular thing her argument about the abstract right will not apply. It can cut no figure, simply because no man has any right to do wrong. Now if the sister thinks that she can see a man's right to drink whisky, then I am right here on hand to tell her that she is mistaken, and that she sees no such thing. It is all imagination. There is no right there, either natural or acquired, nor of any other kind. But how about the right of the rum-seller to take the hard-earned money of his victims, and for it giv him no equivalent? It is a down-right robbery where a man takes all and givs back nothing—yea, a thousand times worse than nothing.

Will the sister take the position before the world that whisky as a beverage ever was or ever can be an equivalent for money?

Think for a moment of the spectacle. The beautiful Mrs. Dr. Severance being ready at any minute to fight for a man's right to buy and drink whisky, and thereby make a nasty, drunken, slobbering, puking, blear-eyed, rotten-livered drunkard of himself, preparing himself to commit any kind of crime, rob and starve his family, debase and destroy all the noble faculties of both mind and body that a kind creator may hav blest him with. Oh, ye gods above (if there be any), shut your eyes and do not presume to look down this way when Dr. Severance's great fight comes off. A man has no more right to sell a man whisky and take his money for it than a butcher has a right to sell his neighbor beef from the carcass of an animal that had milk sick. The sister certainly cannot believe that men hav a right to do these things! She must mean that he only has the power to do them, and does do them in defiance to all right, law, and justice, and of course should be made to suffer the consequences. Frohibitionists propose to cut off men's power to make it and drink it simply by putting it out of existence in accordance with the wishes of a majority of the sovereign people, expressed though the ballot-box.

You will notice that those pseudo-Liberals—Mrs. Severance among the rest—in arguing this question always hav a great deal to say about "eat," "wear," "tea," "coffee," "tobacco," etc., but they are very shy about mentioning whisky and beer. Every word that they say about any of those other things is worse than time thrown away, for there is no trouble throughout the country about them. Let the pseudoes confine themselvs to the question, which is—whisky.

The fact is, society cannot exist if this thing goes on much longer as it is going. Six million drunkards in America—sixty thousand planted beneath the green sod annually! The argument of the bummers, whiskyites, and pseudo-Liberals upon the score of personal liberty, is nothing more nor less than a hollow sham, a fraud, a freak of the imagination, and it will resolve into pure sophistry at the first touch of reason and good common sense.

If horse-stealing is prohibited by law, why not the making and selling of whisky, which is a thousand times worse than horse-stealing ever was?

Every government that ever existed had a mission of some kind or other, and this great republic of this great New World has its mission also. Its mission is to solve great political and moral problems. In working out its mission it has already solved the great problem of African slavery, and now alcoholic slavery must go also.

The one was driven out with bullets, the other will be driven out by ballots. African slavery made a great to do about state rights; alcoholic slavery is now making a great to do about personal rights.

> "But the world goes round and round,
> As faithful as the sun;
> And ever the right comes uppermost,
> And ever the wrong goes undermost,
> And ever is justice done."

This country must and will get rid of whisky and alcoholic slavery, although it cost her as dearly as it did to get rid of African slavery. Yet in the midst of this great death struggle the people will keep their minds fixed upon the incalculable blessings which are to follow.

The great dark whisky-tree of mildew and death that has spread its branches all over this country, is now having the great ax of prohibition laid at its roots, and it is written that every tree which bringeth forth not good fruit must be hewn down and cast into the fire. This scripture will be literally fulfilled in this country within the next ten years; and all those pseudo-Liberals who are roosting in its branches along with that great flock of foul birds, the whiskyites, had better climb down just as soon as possible.

Whisky is the great crime breeder and mind and body destroyer of this world. Nine-tenths of all the crimes committed in this country can be traced directly to whisky.

There are more millions of money thrown away by the American people every year for drinks than would pay for their bread and clothing. Will the sharpest or even the softest of all the pseudo-Liberal writers pretend to find any kind of right as an excuse for committing this crime?

All those writers who are furnishing the groundless and wicked excuse to a drunken world for their sin and wickedness will yet be heartily ashamed of what they hav written,

> "When the hurley burley's done,
> Battle fought and victory won,"

And our world stands upon its feet at last, sober and redeemed.

Moral suasion and education afford no protection against this evil. An appetite perverted by alcoholic poison over-rides all reason, moral suasion, education, religion, and everything else that may chance to come in its way.

Our only hope and safety is to dry up this fountain, and soon this dark river of death will cease to flow.

> "O brandy, brandy, bane of life,
> Cause of tumult, source of strife,
> Could I but half thy curses tell,
> The wise would wish thee safe in hell."

The Loud Call; or, The Disinterested Parson.

There lived a parson, as we're told,
  But when or where we know not;
Who oft his snoring flock would scold,
  Threat'ning that they to heaven should go not,
But rather down to hell be hurled,
If they would not abjure the world,
  And count as dross its filthy mammon—gold,

It chanced, at length, this goodly knight,
Who stoutly fought the Christian fight,
  Elsewhere received a louder call;
What though the stipend be a trifle more,
To one who placed in wealth so little store!
  This had no weight, you know, at all;
'Twas not the cash—oh, no!
  But, 'twas the Lord commanded;
    And though 'twas hard to go away,
    Should he refuse the Lord to obey,
  And be a careless servant branded!
No, sure; so he must go.

The parting Sabbath now arrived,
And all his simple folk contrived
  To hear their priest's farewell.
He plied them long in righteous strain,
Bade them from darling sins refrain,
  And in sweet concord dwell;
To hate the world, in holy ways be bold,
And shun the soul's seducer—glittering gold.

    Tho service o'er,
    Before the door
  The parish gentry gathered round,
Smiling; the good man came among them,
Seized on their offered hands, and wrung them,
"A saint on earth!" the grannies cried,
Then rolled their eyeballs up and sighed,
  And dropped their farewell curt'sies to the ground.
    Behind the rest,
  To bid the priest good-bye,
  In nature's sooty jacket drest,
Old Cæsar came—a wag, and mighty sly.

Bowing, the stick of ebony began
A confab with the gold-despising man;
  "Oh! how good massa parson do?
    Me hope he find him berry well."
  "Well, Cæsar, well; and how are you?"
    "Ah! massa, Cæsar hardly tell.
    Dis good long twenty yeah
    Wid you he worship heah,
      An' now he sorry from you frock you go!"
    "Ah! honest Cæsar, y-e-s, it must be so;
    I'm sorry, too, that I am forced away,
      But then, you know, 'twould never do
    The Lord's loud call for me to disobey."
    "Who, massa, who you say—de Lor' call you away!
      Massa, how many poun' a yeah
      De people pay for preachin' heah?"
      "Two hundred."
    "Hem! t'odder place gib enny moah?"
    "Why, Cæsar, yes; I think they offer four."
    "Ah! massa, may be 'tis de Lor' who call,
      But don't you tink moah loud you let him
        bawl,
      Ay! call and call, till all be blue,
      'Fore you come back from foah to two?
      De Lor' he hollah till he dumb,
      'Fore massa parson ebber come!"

Young Mulkittle in a Printing-Office.

From the Arkansaw Traveler.

The other day the Rev. Mr. Mulkittle, accompanied by his son, went to the daily newspaper office to hav a notice, proclaiming a religious appointment, inserted. After the notice had been properly received by the young man in the front office, the reverend gentleman conducted his son to the composing room. During the heated revival, Mr. Bagley, foreman of the daily office, had foresworn the ways of the iniquitous and embraced the ways of the just. When Mr. Mulkittle and his son entered the composing room the foreman arose from his desk, advanced and said:

"Brother Mulkittle, I am glad to meet you. I hav longed for a visit from you, and I am more than glad that you hav come."

"Brother Bagley," said Mr. Mulkittle warmly shaking his hand, "I am glad to meet you again. This is the first time that I hav ever seen you surrounded by your daily toil, and to know that among the printers' vexations you are still firm in the faith makes me feel warm down in the deep recesses of my heart."

"I will always be true," replied the foreman. "My life has been entangled with errors, and now to know that my great disability, my great disfranchisment, has been removed, and that I am admitted to the suffrage of the redeemed, fills me with joy."

"I am happy to find you so firm, brother—what is your name?—Bagley, ah, yes! I am happy to see, Brother Bagley, that a return to the art preservativ of all arts, but an art which is notorious in its failure to religious adherence, has not changed your mind."

"Nothing can change my mind, brother," said the foreman.

"Remain true, and a crown will be your reward."

"Is this your son?" asked the foreman, turning toward the boy. "Ah, I thought so. Your very eyes and expression of intelligence."

"Do you love the Lord?" asked the boy, as his father stepped to one side, and began an examination of a lot of brass rules arranged on a "standing galley."

"Yes, my little man, your father has taught me to love the Lord."

"If the Lord waster put you in a place where there was apples, and waster say don't eat the red apple, you wouldn't do it, would you?"

"No, I would not."

"You would think that the Lord was the boss, wouldn't you?"

"Yes, and I would obey what he said."

"If he waster say don't bite, you wouldn't bite, would you?"

"No, I would not."

"Did you ever read about Paul?"

"Oh, yes."

"If he had wrote a letter to the Romans and giv it to you, you wouldn'ter read it lessen he said so, would you?"

"I think not."

"You wouldn'ter took the stamp offen the letter, would you?"

"No, I don't think I would."

"If you had been Peter, what would you done when the rooster crowed?"

"I don't know, my little man."

"Would you throwed a rock at him?"

"No, I don't think that I would."

"If you had been in the garden would you picked up the ear what Peter cut offen the man?"

"I don't know."

"You wouldn'er said he what is got ears to hear let him hear, wouldn't you?"

"I don't know what I would hav said."

"Why don't you know what you would hav said?"

"Because."

"Because what?"

"You are too hard for me."

"Am I a Jordan and a hard road to travel?"

"I should say."

"You should say what? What are these?',

"Type. Look out; you'll pi them."

"How pi 'em?"

"Mix them up."

"What is this brass thing?"

"It's a galley."

The boy was greatly interested in the "galley," and he studied it intently. Mr. Mulkittle, a few steps away, was examining a lot of large wood type. The boy looked at a "galley" containing the markets. He wanted to understand it, and drawing the "galley" toward him, he threw the whole intricate collection on the floor.

"What the h—ll hav you done?" exclaimed the foreman. "Here, Mulkittle, take this d—d kid away. Get out of here; move."

"My dear sir," exclaimed Mr. Mulkittle, taking hold of his son and drawing him away, "I am sorry for the mishap, and I assure you that I will assist you in picking up your little implements."

"Picking up the devil!" howled the foreman. "Get out of here."

"Your religion should aid you—"

"There ain't religion enough in the world to take care of a galley of markets in a printing-office. Get out, and don't you forget I mean what I say. Mosey."

Mr. Mulkittle, grieved to the very core of his warm heart, withdrew. As they passed through the door the boy said, "That man better keep outen the way of the she bears."

"Did He Pin a Ticket on Me?"

I hav just heard of some of the most amusing questions from the precocious small boy. We hav all frequently read and heard many of what might fitly be termed the unanswerable and philosophical queries of infancy, but I really honestly believe what I hav just had placed before me by a merchant friend of mine who is the proprietor of a large retail store on Charles street, Baltimore, certainly caps the climax in this particular direction. He is the fond possessor of a son of an activ mind and diminutiv frame. Last evening this gentleman, accompanied by his small boy, was in a store on Eutau street in the Monumental city. He was engaged in purchasing an article from the very pretty young lady who was waiting on him. She was a genuin Baltimore blond beauty. There are scores of such girls in the retail establishments on Lexington, Charles, Gay, Eutaw, Howard, and other similar streets in Baltimore. God bless their dear hearts! But this is a digression. The minute I begin to speak or write about a bewitching young blond "I fly the track" and forget the business on hand. To resume and return. While the father was busily engaged in examining the article placed for his inspection on the show case, the young son discovered in the case toy dolls with a card pinned on each one of them marked "twenty-five cents."

"Papa," he suddenly asked, "didn't you say you got me from God?"

"Yes, my son," was the gentle reply, while the handsome saleslady's eyes grew larger in circumference.

"When you got me from God, papa, did he hav a ticket pinned on me like that baby there—" pointing to a doll in the case—was the next query from this youth.

"Hush, hush, Sammy," was the ambiguous answer, while the unwilling blond listener's cheek grew redder and her large eyes assumed a forced expression which plainly indicated that her thoughts were elsewhere.

"Papa, if he had a ticket pinned on me when you got me, was twenty-five cents marked on it? (This child can read figures slightly when they are large.) Was that what I cost you and mamma?" was the next verbal bombshell.

"If you don't hush, Samuel, I'll whip you when we get home!" was the threatened reply, while the beautiful young lady behind the counter violently bit her full reseate lips to smother naughty laughter.

"Papa, I don't believe I had a ticket pinned to me when I come, for you tell me God loves me, and if he loves me, he wouldn't hurt me by sticking a pin in me when I was little!" was the next conversational cyclone.

The boy was at once led by his seemingly angry father from the store, while the pretty saleslady retired to the water-cooler, there to restore her shattered nerves by the internal application of ice-water.

No sooner had this boy got in the street than he glanced up at the shining stars in the heavens. It was a clear, beautiful evening.

"Papa, didn't you often tell me that God loves me very much!" was the next verbal outburst.

"Yes, my son," replied the relieved parent.

"When you are good," he sagely added.

"I don't believe God loves me very much, 'cause you always say he knows what I'm thinking about, and if he loves me much he wouldn't hav put the stars so high that I couldn't catch one when I jump up, for he knows I want one bad!"

If that boy livs he will certainly in time be the mayor of Baltimore or a member of the Maryland legislature. He has a brilliant future beyond all doubts if he can only survive his youthful precocity. OLD VICISSITUDES.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

BENNETT affirms; MAIR denies. This is an exhaustiv discussion. Price, $1.50.

Trial of D. M. Bennett in the United States Circuit Court upon the charge of depositing prohibited matter in the mail. This givs a full history of this celebrated case, and shows what monstrous injustice was perpetrated upon MR. BENNETT. Price, cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

"VICTORIA"

MAGNETIC APPLIANCES

Are surer and quicker in action than any other Magnetic Garments.

They are made out of lace or netting which makes them the coolest and lightest appliance made.

Their magnets have on them an armature or keeper which makes them continuously curative. No others have this necessary addition. See any work on Natural Philosophy to see how necessary the Armature is.

The VICTORIA is so constructed that the patient can remove the magnets at pleasure and wash all the goods. This cannot be done with any others.

Paralysis, Asthma, Catarrh, Incipient Consumption, Female and Spinal Diseases, Rheumatism, Sick Headaches, Dyspepsia, General Debility and all diseases arising from deficient nerve force, there is no other treatment that is as successful as the wearing of VICTORIA MAGNETIC GOODS.

All other garments are slow in action.

VICTORIA is quick and sure. All other appliances oblige the patients to hope for to-morrow.

VICTORIA gives help to-day.

Send for circulars, price lists, etc., before you buy of others!

Introduced to the People of the United States His

MAGNETIC GARMENTS

For the cure of Disease without Medicine or Medical Treatment. The Statement made by him at that time that his Magnetic Clothing, if worn for any form of Disease (and as advised), would cure ninety per cent of the so-called Incurables, has been verified, he having Clothed and Cured Thousands of Persons of all Forms of Disease. Positive proof of this has appeared in all the leading Newspapers by Testimony of many of our most Prominent and Wealthy Citizens, who, having been Cured by the

Wilsona Magnetic Garments

After all other Treatment had failed, were pleased to assist the Inventor in giving confidence to the Suffering Invalids of America by allowing him to use their well-known and respected Names as Reference; and it is now admitted by many most highly accomplished Scientists and Physicians that the Success and Cures attending the introduction of "Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing has been unprecedented in the history of Electrical Therapeutics. In the face of such Positive Proof as given by us no person can doubt the value of this Invention in all cases.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Any of the above garments sent to any address upon receipt of price, and we will return the money if they are not as represented in every respect. If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case, send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselvs. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them at about

ONE-THIRD THE PRICE HERETOFORE CHARGED,

So that we can say with truth, None are so poor that they cannot procure them, being but a trifle higher than ordinary clothing.

Remember that we are offering you the cheapest and best magnetic appliances in the market, and if upon receiving the garments they do not meet your expectation, return them at our expense and we will refund your money.

Ladies' Abdominal Jackets and Gentlemen's Vests are made to order, and a fit guaranteed.

DR. FELLOWS

SWAP-O-HOPE

A REGULARLY educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove,

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES,

Spermatorrhœa and Impotency,

As the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions, (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an EXTERNAL APPLICATION in from 30 to 60 days. No medicine taken. It has never been known to fail!

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in cut. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.

☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

"PRIVATE COUNSELOR"

Sent to any address, securely sealed, for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhœa or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞Remember a radical cure is certain. Address, plainly, DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey, and say in what paper you saw this advertisement.

THE Hindoos, says the New York World, pray to 330,000,000 gods.

A RHODE ISLAND minister has given alcohol a new name. He calls it "aqua mortis"—the water of death.

IN the trial of a Buffalo priest for an assault on a child, every member of a church, whether a Roman Catholic or a Protestant, was kept from the jury.

GAIL HAMILTON says that a Mormon is a husband who harnesses his wives abreast, and a man who has been a widower three times is one who drives them tandem.

THERE is a bill before Parliament authorizing a railroad to pass within 100 yards of Stonehenge. The vibration would in time probably ruin the monument, and Sir J. Lubbock will oppose.

THE projected Scottish Temperance Life Assurance Company of Edinburgh, which is to hav a capital of $100,000, will insure the lives of total abstainers "at greatly reduced premiums."

THE Arkansas legislature has passed a law forbidding liquor to be sold within two miles of a house of worship. This law is evidently designed to encourage pedestrianism among church-members.

ACCORDING to the Philadelphia Medical News, the faith-cure establishment in Buffalo has been broken up through lack of funds. The amount of assets in the form of faith is large but not very good legal tender.

"FEEL bad to think I put that faro chip in the contribution box by mistake?" said the Louisville man. "I reckon I do. That was a $5 chip and they'll go and get it cashed and get $5 out of me, when I only intended to giv them 50 cents."

THE ancient church of Birdbrook, England, contains a monumental slab bearing the extraordinary record: "Martha Blewitt, of Swan Inn, at Blaythorne End, in this parish, buried May 7, 1861. She was the wife of nine husbands consecutivly, but the ninth outlived her."

THE Chinese hav no word that is equivalent to hell and no conception of such a place. A missionary in an agricultural district of China states that when he tried to explain it the people asked if it was anything that could be raised. He might hav answered that it was—very often.

THE Rev. John W. Satterfield was seen at Brownsville, Pa., with an empty bottle protruding from his pocket, and the whisky which it had contained was manifest in his staggering gait. Such is the accusation that was made by the deacons of his church, and his wife charges that he frequently whips her.

THE Rev. Dr. Talmage has said that the Brooklyn bridge will marry the two cities which it connects, and that the bride, meaning Brooklyn, will "smile from Fulton Ferry to South Bushwick." Here the reverend individual attributes to the whole city a smiling capacity to which only he himself would be equal.—Sun.

JOSEPH COOK squanders his strength when he seeks to breathe a spark of life into the old New England theology. Calvinism is deader than a gravestone. Infant damnation, heathen damnation, predestined damnation, with their blue and ghastly exhalations, hav lost their spectral power. Mr. Cook is not serving his day and generation by reinvoking the reign of sulphur.—Syracuse Standard.

AT Springfield, Mass., a revivalist named Fowler has been rendering service for a term at Grace church. A careful footing up of the results of his mission shows that he has made one convert. The question now open for discussion is whether or not this one convert could hav been won from his wicked ways by the ordinary course of effort on the part of the pastor of the church without the aid of the revivalist.

As Leo XIII. was recently conversing with a French lady in her nativ language, he found himself at a loss for a word, and asked her if she spoke Italian. The reply was in the affirmativ. "Then," said the pope, "we will use my nativ language, for I fear that if I employ yours I may hav to compromise my infallibility!"

BISHOP SIMPSON of the Methodist church advises his friends: "Never invest in mining stocks any money that you are not prepared to lose." The experience on which this advice is based arose from the transaction in Isabella which cost the good bishop about $800. Some of the brethren who purchased Isabella wish that they had gone short instead of buying.

MISS LEISHMAN, against whom the Rev. F. R. Beattie, of the First Presbyterian church at Brantford, Ont., has entered an action for $10,000 for defamation of character, charges Mr. Beattie with having criminally assaulted her on three different occasions in his own house during Mrs. Beattie's absence in December last. Mr. Beattie was required to find $4,000 bail.

THE mayor of Jacksonville, Fla., is a Jew. He is said to enforce the Sunday laws with a degree of strictness that is irksome even to orthodox church-goers. In Ohio there is a Jewish justice who displays a similar strictness in punishing violations of the Sunday law. It is in accordance with biblical justice that Christians should "eat the fruit of their own doings."

JOSIAH GABS, colored, of Oyster Bay, L. I., professed to hav been converted at a revival meeting held in the village African M. E. church, but he was arrested shortly after for stealing chickens, as he was about to board the train at Locust Valley for Hunter's Point. When religion and a darkey's natural yearning for other people's chickens come in conflict, religion is apt to suffer.

A RICH Chinaman of Rock Springs, Wyoming, to whom his wife lately presented a fine boy, has been entertaining his friends with an exuberance corresponding to his joy. He invited 600 guests, in detachments of 150, to a feast which cost $1,300, and made everybody "dlunk;" and even then he was not satisfied, but announced his intention to hold a second celebration the following week in Evanston, and a third next month in San Francisco.

WITHIN a few days the governor of New Jersey has affixed his signature to a bill passed by the legislature requiring that all goods manufactured in the state prison shall be stamped or branded with the name of that institution. This is only one method of dealing with the problems of convict labor, but it will perhaps result in enabling those persons who do not care to encourage such labor, when it comes into competition with free work, to avoid doing so through ignorance of the source of the goods they buy.

THERE was an auction sale of girls down in McMinnville, Tenn., one night last week, to raise money for a church organ, and a Cleveland paper notes the fact that one of the largest churches in that city has just organized "hugging parties" for the support of the gospel, with the following rates per hug: girls under fifteen years, 25c.; sixteen to twenty, 50c.; twenty to twenty-five, 75c.; another man's wife, $1; widows, 10c. to $2. It being fully understood, of course, that "the end sanctifies the means."

POPE LEO XIII. recently gave audience to a commission charged by the archbishop of Mexico, two other archbishops, and a bishop of that country to present to his holiness a large sum of money, collected in their diocese for Peter's pence. In thanking them for their offering he expressed his regret that he could not yet re-establish diplomatic ties with so important a part of Catholicism. He knew what profound piety existed in Mexico, and felt sure that its rulers, even in their own interests, would not fail to renew those cordial relations with the holy see which had been interrupted by exceptional circumstances. Catholicism is not just now flourishing in Mexico.

A FRENCH traveler, according to the Pall Mall Gazette, recently returned from Siam givs an account of a new Buddhist temple which has just been completed in the environs of Bangkok, and which closely resembles in appearance a Christian church. The guide told him to his great surprise that it was a pagoda, and on entering the building he observed the same close imitation of the interior of a Catholic place of worship. There was an altar, with a large image of Buddha placed on it, stained-glass windows, prie-dieus, and all the other accessories of Catholic devotion. "What do you think of it?" asked the Bonze who took him over the building, and who was evidently very proud of it. "It is very modern," said the tourist deprecatingly. "Modern it is, of course," said the priest, who took the remark as a compliment. "We hav even an organ; and a better one than any you hav in France, for it plays without an organist. We had it made to order by Messrs. Bird & Co. of London; and as you will hear, it plays nothing but the finest sacred music." Whereupon he turned the handle, and the Frenchman, to his great edification, heard the familiar air which fits the words of a comic song.

HERBERT SPENCER, said a railway conductor to a reporter of the Philadelphia Press, was the most restless traveler I ever saw, and Bob Ingersoll is the best. When Ingersoll enters a car to go on a journey, the first thing he does is to hang up his big slouch hat, then he commences to make himself comfortable, and by the time the train starts he just acts as if he were at home in his study. If there's no one on the train that he knows, it don't take him long to strike up an acquaintance, and everybody seems glad to know him. He's a very jolly and a very liberal traveler. I remember one night there was a freight wreck, and our train had to lay up for three or four hours. It was a terrible night, the wind blew a hurricane, and the rain came down in torrents. Colonel Ingersoll was one of the passengers. Everybody got tired. Nobody could get anybody to talk with him. At last a little Scotchman who was traveling through America sight-seeing, learned who Ingersoll was, and he tackled him then and there. Ingersoll was just in the humor, and in less then ten minutes everybody in the car crowded around him and listened to him for over two hours and the passengers seemed so pleased and entertained that they forgot all about the night and the accident.

MARK TWAIN finds two glasses of champagne admirable for loosening the tongue and a happy inspiration for an after-dinner speech; but his experience has been that wine clogs the brain for mental work, and he can never write to his own satisfaction after drinking even one glass. He likes tobacco as a stimulant. Oliver Wendell Holmes prefers an entirely undisturbed and unclouded brain for mental work, unstimulated by anything stronger than tea or coffer, unaffected by tobacco or other drugs. His faculties are best under his control in the forenoon, between breakfast and lunch. The only intellectual use he can find in stimulants is the quickened mental action they produce when taken in company. He thinks ideas which thus reach the brain may remain after the stimulus has ceased. W. D. Howells never uses tobacco, except "a self-defensiv cigaret" where a great many other persons are smoking, and when he takes wine it weakens his work and his working force next morning. Lyman Abbot uses neither alcohol nor tobacco. Matthew Arnold drinks claret habitually, and it suits him. The late George M. Beard found alcohol benumbing and stupefying, but tobacco, opium, tea, and coffee had an effect precisely the reverse. Prof. Blackie takes wine to sharpen his appetite, but never as a stimulant for intellectual work. Wilkie Collins say that he is nerved and composed by tobacco. Thomas A. Edison is too violently incited by smoking or drinking, but gets inspiration from chewing tobacco. Gladstone regards wine, in moderate quantities, as necessary to him at the time of the greatest intellectual exertion, but he detests tobacco.

A Fabricated Account of a Scene at the Death-bed of Thomas Paine.

"I hav lived an honest and useful life to mankind; my time has been spent in doing good, and I die in perfect composure and resignation to the will of my creator God." (Will of Thomas Paine, Jan. 18, 1809).

Several newspapers, religious and secular, hav lately published a long and libelous account of "The Last Hours of the Great Infidel, Thomas Paine," purporting to be a letter signed "† Benedict, Bishop of Boston." The Right Rev. Benedict Joseph Fenwick, D.D., was born in St. Mary's county, Md., Sept. 3, 1782, was bishop of Boston in 1825, and died Aug. 11, 1846. The letter, if authentic, was written to his brother Enoch, who died in 1828. It begins thus:

"A short time before Paine died I was sent for by him. He was prompted to this by a poor Catholic woman who went to see him in his sickness, and who told him among other things that in his wretched condition, if anybody could do him good it would be a Roman Catholic priest. This woman was an American convert (formerly a shaking Quakeress), whom I had received into the church only a few weeks before. She was the bearer of this message to me from Paine. I stated the circumstance to F[ather] Kohlman at breakfast, and requested him to accompany me. After some solicitation on my part he agreed to do so, at which I was greatly rejoiced, because I was at the time young and inexperienced in the ministry, and glad to hav his assistance, as I knew from the great reputation of Paine that I should hav to do with one of the most impious as well as infamous of men."

Father Fenwick at this time had been a Jesuit priest less than one year, was not yet twenty-seven years old, and was sent in that very year from Georgetown, D. C., with Father Kohlman, another Jesuit, to take charge of the only Catholic church in New York city. Now there were two classes of men that Paine hated above all others, namely, Scotch tories and Catholic priests. But the writer of this letter tells us unequivocally and repeatedly that Paine sent a poor shaking Catholic Quakeress to invite a Romish priest to visit him, and that she accordingly went and summoned a young Jesuit father who had just become pastor of the only Catholic church in New York. Credat Jesuiticus cum pelle caudæ!

Arriving at the house where Paine lodged, the two priests were met at the door by "a decent-looking, elderly woman," who inquired if they were the Catholic priests. "For," said she, "Mr. Paine has been so much annoyed of late by ministers of other denominations calling on him that he has left express orders with me to admit no one to-day except the clergymen of the Catholic church."

Poor pestered Paine! Parsons Milledollar and Cunningham had been there, and the latter had said to him, "You hav now a full view of death; you can not liv long, and whosoever does not believe in the Lord Jesus Christ will assuredly be damned." And to this pious and polite address Paine had replied: "Let me hav none of your popish stuff. Get away with you. Good morning, good morning." And when Mr. Milledollar attempted to address him he was interrupted with the same language. And when they were gone Paine said to Mrs. Hedden, an elderly woman employed to wait on him, "Don't let 'em come here again; they trouble me" (Sherwin's Paine, 220). Other clergymen had spoken to him in a similar manner, and were similarly repelled. But after all this we are told that Paine sent for a Jesuit and gave orders to his pious Protestant attendant to let in none that day but Catholics! Credat holy friar!

The two priests entered the parlor. Paine was asleep, and the housekeeper said it wouldn't do to wake him, it made him so cross. Mr. Sherwood, a neighbor, who frequently visited Paine in his illness, says that old Mrs. Heddon was a religious bigot, and never let slip an opportunity of teasing Paine with her clattering tongue, and that she was artfully sent by priests to attend on him during his illness. She would frequently read the Bible to him, but to this he paid no attention (Sherwin's Paine, 222, 226).

The Jesuits resolved to wait until Paine awoke. Meanwhile the woman said to them:

"Gentlemen, I really wish you may succeed with Mr. Paine, for he is laboring under great distress of mind ever since he was informed by his physician that he cannot possibly liv, and must die shortly. He sent for you to-day because he was told that if any one could do him good you might." [Credat Joseph Cook!]

The next sentence of this woman's reported conversation is remarkable:

"Possibly he may think you know of some remedy which his physicians are ignorant of."

As if Dr. Manley and other regular physicians were to be superseded by the medical skill of a youthful priest who had recently arrived from the Jesuit college of Georgetown, D. C. Credat ex-Surgeon-General Hammond!

But now comes a sentence for which we happen to hav a prior parallel in a letter written Sept. 27, 1809, by Paine's physician, Dr. Manley, at the request of the malignant libeler, Cheetham, and published that same year. Here are the parallel sentences:

From Dr. Manley's Letter, 1809.

"He would call out during his paroxysms of distress, without intermission, 'O Lord, help me! God help me! Jesus Christ help me!' etc., repeating the same expressions without the least variation, in a tone of voice that would alarm the house."

From the Fenwick Letter, 1849.

"'O Lord, help me!' he will exclaim in his paroxysms of distress, 'God help me! Jesus Christ help me!' repeating the same expression without the least variation, in a tone of voice that would alarm the house."

Here is a sentence of thirty-seven words plagiarized from Dr. Manley's letter. The only words that differ from Manley's are "will exclaim in" for "would call out during." Four words are transposed and two omitted by the literary thief. This evidence alone stamps the Fenwick letter as a fabrication. Its first publication was in the United States Catholic Magazine for 1846, and in the Catholic Herald, Oct. 15, 1846. That was the year Bishop Fenwick died, and was eighteen years after the death of the brother to whom it purports to hav been addressed. And now the question for the Catholic church in America to answer is, Did Bishop Fenwick write it? Credat Leo XIII!

But now we propose to prove that Dr. Manley's statement is untruthful. It is certainly a gross perversion of the facts. He says he was called upon by accident to visit the patient on the 25th of February, 1809; that the next day he related his condition to two of Paine's friends, one being an executor of his estate (the will is dated Jan. 18th, and the executors named are Walter Morton, Thomas Addis Emmett, and Mrs. Bonneville, all legatees), and being requested to pay him particular attention, he from that time considered Paine under his care. It certainly looks as if Dr. Manley sought to be employed, and his whole conduct was, to say the least, unfair and deceitful. Soon after writing that letter he joined the church. It was written at the solicitation of Paine's enemy and calumniator Cheetham, to be incorporated into Cheetham's "Life of Paine," then preparing for the press. The author solicited Dr. Manley's observations on Paine's "temper and habits, the cause and nature of his disease, the kind of persons by whom he was visited during his illness, their general conversation with him respecting his Deistical works, his own remarks, opinions, and behavior" (Cheetham's Paine, 300). Five days after the date of that request Dr. Manley has an answer completed, filling eleven pages of Cheetham's lying biography. The doctor says:

"I hasten, in conformity to your wishes, to communicate the information I possess respecting its subject. Though my opportunity has been great, you will, no doubt, observe my knowledge to be very limited" (Ibid).

The house where Paine died was owned by Amasa Woodsworth, who was living as late as 1839 in East Cambridge, Boston. In that year he made an authorized statement to Gilbert Vale about Paine's last days, in which he characterizes Dr. Manley's published account as false. He says that he visited Paine every day for six weeks before his death, frequently sat up with him, and did so on the last two nights of his life. He was always there with Dr. Manley, assisted him in lifting Paine, and was present when the doctor asked him if he wished to believe that Jesus Christ was the son of God, and heard Paine's emphatic answer, "I hav no wish to believe on that subject" (Vale's Paine, 156).

Now at that very time Dr. Manley says he introduced the subject to Paine by saying:

"'Why do you call on Jesus Christ to help you? Do you believe he can help you? Do you believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ? Come, now, answer me honestly. I want an answer from the lips of a dying man, for I verily believe that you will not liv twenty-four hours.' I waited some time at the end of every question; he did not answer, but ceased to exclaim in the above manner. Again I addressed him: 'Mr. Paine, you hav not answered my questions. Will you answer them? Allow me to ask again, "Do you believe, or, let me qualify the question, Do you wish to believe, that Jesus Christ is the son of God?"' After a pause of some minutes he answered, 'I hav no wish to believe on that subject'" (Cheetham's Paine, 307).

These were Paine's last words, and were uttered in the hearing of Dr. Manley and Amasa Woodsworth. I now quote from the latter's authorized statement in 1839, made to Paine's biographer, Vale:

"He informs us that he has openly reproved the doctor for the falsity contained in the spirit of that letter, boldly declaring before Dr. Manley, who is yet living, that nothing which he saw justified his (the doctor's) insinuations."

The fact was, as Woodsworth states, that Paine was too ill and too much tortured to converse on abstract subjects. And anyone can see that Dr. Manley was impertinent and cruel in insisting upon an answer to such a question from a dying man. And his repeated statement about Paine's calling on Jesus Christ to help him is a gross perversion. For this same Woodsworth in 1842 was asked by Philip Graves, M.D., if Paine recanted and called upon God to save him. And Woodsworth replied:

"No. He died as he had taught. He had a sore upon his side, and when we turned him it was very painful, and he would cry out, 'O God!' or something like that. But that was nothing, for he believed in a God" (Ingersoll's Paine Vindicated, Truth Seeker Tract No. 123, p. 21).

Another probable source of this perversion of facts is an extract from the journal of Stephen Grellet, a Quaker preacher, made in the fall of 1809. He records the falsehoods of Mary Roscoe. We quote the last few lines:

"She told him [Paine] that when very young his 'Age of Reason' was put into her hands, but that the more she read in it the more dark and distressed she felt, and she threw the book into the fire. 'I wish I had done as you,' he replied, 'for if the devil ever had any agency in any work, he has had it in my writing that book.' When going to carry him some refreshments, she repeatedly heard him uttering the language, 'O Lord!' 'Lord God!' or 'Lord Jesus hav mercy on me!'" (Ibid, pp. 13, 14).

The reader will now begin to see the probable source of the Manley inspiration. Cheetham wanted evidence of Paine's recantation. The lying Mary Roscoe, who probably never visited Paine, was reporting to her Quaker brethren that Paine regretted his Deistical work and called on Jesus to hav mercy on him.

Ten years later, when Mary Roscoe had become Mary Hinsdale, another Quaker, Charles Collins, learning that William Cobbett contemplated writing a life of Paine, went to him and wanted to persuade him that Paine had recanted. Cobbett laughed at him, and sent him away. The wily Quaker came again and again; he wanted Cobbett to say, "It was said that Paine recanted." "No," said Cobbett; "but I will say that you said it, and that you tell a lie, unless you prove the truth of what you say. Giv me proof, name persons, state times and precise words, or I will denounce you as a liar." Friend Charley was posed, but something had to be done. He at last brought a paper cautiously and craftily drawn up and signed with initials. Cobbett compelled him to giv the full name; it was Mary Hinsdale. As soon as practicable, Cobbett called on Friend Mary. She shuffled, evaded, equivocated. It was so long ago she could not speak positivly of anything; she had never seen the paper; had never given Friend Charley authority to say anything in her name. And finally she said:

"I tell thee that I hav no recollection of any person or thing that I saw at Thomas Paine's house" (Vale's Paine, 183, 184).

The falsehood about Paine's recantation is now so apparent that no intelligent and reputable person pretends to believe it. The following letter, therefore, from the Rev. A. W. Cornell, of Harpersville, N. Y., to the New York World in 1877, will be highly amusing to those who never read it before:

"I see by your paper that Bob Ingersoll discredits Mary Hinsdale's story . . . Ingersoll is right in his conjecture that Mary Roscoe and Mary Hinsdale was the same person. Her maiden name was Roscoe. . . . My mother was a Roscoe, a niece of Mary Roscoe, and lived with her for some time. I hav heard her relate the story of Tom Paine's dying remorse, as told her by her aunt, who was a witness to it. She says (in a letter I hav just received from her) 'he (Tom Paine) suffered fearfully from remorse, and renounced his Infidel principles, calling on God to forgiv him, and wishing his pamphlets and books to be burnt, saying he could not die in peace until it was done'" (Ingersoll's Paine Vindicated, Truth Seeker Tract No. 123, p. 57).

Reader, what do you think about the case now? The Rev. A. W. Cornell says in another part of his letter, "'No one who knew that good lady [Mary Roscoe Hinsdale] would for one moment doubt her veracity, or question her testimony." Credat Cornell!

But let us return to the Fenwick letter. The talk of the old housekeeper to the Jesuit priests continues:

"Sometimes he cries, 'O God! what hav I done to suffer so much?' Then shortly after, 'But there is no God!' And again a little after, 'Yet, if there should be, what will become of me hereafter?'"

The original of this falsehood will be found in the journal of the Quaker Grellet in 1809, as quoted above. Mary Roscoe said that she repeatedly heard Paine say, "O Lord!" "O God!" or "Lord Jesus hav mercy on me." And Parson Cornell says her veracity was beyond question. But it so happens that the Quaker merchant and preacher Willet Hicks, whose standing was beyond reproach, discredits Mary's story altogether. He was in the habit of visiting Paine, and sending little delicacies to him by his daughters, one of whom afterward stated that their hired girl Mary Roscoe "once wished to go with her but was refused" (Vale's Paine, 177–178).

In 1841 Gilbert Vale interviewed the venerable Willet Hicks, concerning the last hours of Paine. The old gentleman said that his servant Mary Hinsdale never saw Paine to his knowledge. After Paine's death, the Friends annoyed and pressed him to say something detrimental to Paine. He was beset by them here and in England, where he went soon after. They wished to convict Paine of calling on Jesus, and they would say: "Did thee never hear him call on Christ?" And he added:

"You cannot conceive what a deal of trouble I had; and as for money, I could hav had any sums if I would hav said anything against Thomas Paine, or if I would even hav consented to remain silent. They informed me that the doctor [Manley!] was willing to say something that would satisfy them if I would engage to be silent only. But, they observed, he (the doctor) knows the standing of Willet Hicks, and that he knows all about Paine, and if he (Hicks) should contradict what I say [i. e., what the doctor says] he would destroy my [i. e., the doctor's] testimony."

The reader will perceive from this that Dr. Manley's testimony might hav been still more false but for the fear of Willet Hicks.

In conclusion, Mr. Hicks said to Mr. Vale, who took down the words and published them:

"Thomas Paine was a good man—an honest man."

And with great indignation he added:

"He was not a man to talk to Mary Hinsdale" (Vale's Paine, 178, 179).

When Cobbett had got from Mary Hinsdale a recantation of the falsehood that Paine had recanted, he sought to bring Friend Charley's nose to the grindstone; but Charley had left town for fear of the yellow fever, and Cobbett soon returned to England.

Some years afterward this same Collins called at the house of Gilbert Vale to beg him not to leave the Beacon at his house. Mr. Vale then asked Collins what induced him to publish the account of Mary Hinsdale. Collins said he thought it true; he believed she had seen Paine, who might confess to a girl what he would not to Willet Hicks. He knew that Hicks and many other respected Friends did not believe it, but yet it might be true. Vale asked him what he thought of her character now. He replied: "Some of our Friends believe she indulges in opiates, and do not giv her credit for truth." "Do you believe they are justified in their opinions?" said Vale. "Oh, yes," said Collins; "I believe they speak the truth, but this does not affect her testimony when a young woman; she might then hav spoken the truth" (Ibid, 185, 186).

No more need be said on the question of the veracity of Mary Roscoe Hinsdale, or whether the dying Deist said in her hearing, "Lord Jesus hav mercy on me." Nor will any intelligent reader of Paine's "Age of Reason" believe that he ever cried out in the hearing of his housekeeper, "But there is no God." Or that he ever said in his senses, "Yet if there should be, what will become of me hereafter?" Credat Mrs. Partington!

The old housekeeper continued her talk to the Jesuits, as reported in the Fenwick letter:

"Thus he will continue some time, when on a sudden he will scream as if in terror and agony, and call out to me by name. On one of these occasions, which are very frequent, I went to him and inquired what he wanted. 'Stay with me,' he replied, 'for God's sake, for I cannot bear to be left alone.' I then observed that I could not always be with him, as I had much to attend to in the house. 'Then,' said he, 'send even a child to stay with me, for it is hell to be alone.' I never saw, she concluded, a more unhappy, a more forsaken man; it seems as if he cannot reconcile himself to die."

This is borrowed from Dr. Manley, who says:

"He would not be left alone night or day; he not only required to hav some person with him, but he must see that he or she was there, and would not allow his curtain to be closed at any time; and if, as would sometimes unavoidably happen, he was left alone, he would scream and holla until some person came to him."

The doctor had previously said that at first Paine was satisfied to be left alone during the day, but later he was afraid he should die when unattended. And though he professed to be above the fear of death, some parts of his conduct were with difficulty reconcilable with his belief. But he further states that Paine's expressed anxiety was concerning the disposal of his body, an application being pending for an interment in the Friends' burying-ground, which was at last rejected. And in this conversation the doctor reports Paine as saying, what one may well imagin he would, "'I think I can say what they make Jesus Christ to say—"My God, my God! why hast thou forsaken me?"'" Such expressions may be used by sick or distressed people, and it is easy to torture them into profanity. But Paine was never charged with profanity of speech, and Dr. Manley introduced the subject of religion to him by saying:

"You hav never been in the habit of mixing in your conversation words of coarse meaning; you hav never indulged in the practice of profane swearing."

We now return to the Fenwick letter. Paine having awoke, the two Jesuits were conducted into his room:

"On entering we found him just getting out of his slumber. A more wretched being in appearance I never before beheld. He was lying in a bed, sufficiently decent of itself, but at present smeared with filth."

O holy mother! Did the "decent-looking elderly woman," who was expecting the priests to call that day, introduce them to the dying man in a bed besmeared with filth? Why did not Dr. Manley or the executors discharge such a nasty nurse? Credat Lord Dundreary!

"His look was that of a man greatly tortured in mind; his eyes haggard, his countenance forbidding, and his whole appearance that of one whose better days had been one continual scene of debauch."

Paine was troubled in mind about his burial, just as Voltaire was before him. Dr. Manley argued with him that that should be a matter of least concern. Paine answered "that he had nothing else to talk about, and that he would as lief talk of his death as of anything; but that he was not so indifferent about his corpse as I appeared to be." The description of Paine's person in the Fenwick letter is borrowed from various accounts by his lying adversaries in those times. Credat Dr. Talmage!

"His only nourishment at this time, we are informed, was nothing more than milk punch, in which he indulged to the full extent of his weak state."

Did the scholarly bishop of Boston, ex-president of Georgetown College, commit the solecism, "only nothing more than?" Credat Artium Magister!

When Dr. Manley first saw Paine he had been dispensing with the usual quantity of stimulus, which privation seemed to make him worse, and he had just resumed it. And the doctor further says, "He never slept without the assistance of an anodyne."

The Fenwick letter proceeds:

"He had partaken, undoubtedly, but very recently of it, as the sides and corners of his mouth exhibited very unequivocal traces of it, as well as of blood which had also followed in the track and left its mark on the pillow. His face to a certain extent had also been besmeared with it."

Shame on such a nurse! At this time Paine's executors were paying $20 a week for the sick man's board and attendance. Why didn't this "decent-looking" nurse wipe her patient's face before bringing in these two priests? Credat Mark Twain!

Dr. Manley says that, about a fortnight after his first attendance on the patient,

"He became very sore, the water which he passed in bed excoriating the parts to which it applied, and this kind of ulceration, which was sometimes very extensiv, continued in a greater or less degree till the time of his death. . . . In this deplorable state, with confirmed dropsy, attended with frequent cough, vomiting, and hiccough, he continued growing from bad to worse, till the morning of the 8th of June, when he died. . . . During the last three weeks his situation was such that his decease was confidently expected every day, his ulcers having assumed a gangrenous appearance, being excessivly fetid, and discolored blisters having taken place on the soles of his feet, without any ostensible cause, which baffled the usual attempts to arrest their progress; and when we consider his advanced age, the feebleness of his constitution, his constant practice of using ardent spirits ad libitum, till the commencement of his last illness, so far from wondering that he died so soon, we are constrained to ask, How did he liv so long?"

Mark the language—"using ardent spirits ad libitum till the commencement of his last illness." The doctor is unwilling to attest the ad libitum indulgence during the last sickness, and what did he know about prior indulgence? It looks as if Cheetham had a hand in the draft of the Manley letter. The doctor evidently stopped the diet of milk punch and prescribed morphine, for he says the patient never slept without the assistance of an anodyne.

The stories about Paine's beastly intemperance are all lies. They were started by Cheetham, the convicted libeler, and were continued by Grant Thorburn, who after Paine's death was compelled by advice of his counsel, the late Horace Holden, to retract a libel about Mrs. Bonneville, if we remember rightly, but incidentally about the deceased Infidel. Perhaps the most plausible authentic testimony against Paine's sobriety was given by Carver, who invited him to board at his house. Nothing was said about charging for board, and Paine remained with him some months. While there Paine had a stroke of apoplexy, and for a while had to hav a nurse. Carver got straitened for money, and sent Paine a bill for board for himself and nurse. Paine was indignant, and was going to pay it and cut Carver's friendship. But his friends said the charge was exorbitant and persuaded him to resist payment. Then Carver wrote a scurrilous letter in which he accused Paine of helping himself too freely from Carver's demijohn of brandy, and of pretending that it was a stroke of apoplexy that caused him to fall down stairs. But that it was apoplexy appears from Dr. Manley's letter, who says he found the patient in a "fever, and very apprehensiv of an attack of apoplexy, as he stated that he had had that disease before, and at this time felt a degree of vertigo." And in August, 1806, Paine wrote to his farm tenant Dean, saying that he had a stroke of apoplexy, Sunday, Aug. 15th, the fit taking him on the stairs, that he was supposed to be dead at first, and had not been able to get out of bed since. "I consider the scene I hav passed through," he writes, "as an experiment on dying, and I find that death has no terrors for me."

For a complete refutation of the libels about Paine's intemperance, see Vale's "Life of Paine," and Ingersoll's "Vindication of Paine," Truth Seeker Tract No. 123. Paine intended to make Carver one of his legatees, but after this affair he renounced him. The bill was amicably settled by Paine's friends, and Carver confessed that he wrote in anger. But he was angrier still some years later to see the correspondence republished by Grant Thorburn, and cut it out of the book. He said that Cheetham first printed the letter without his consent for base purposes. And when Paine was on his death-bed Carver wrote him a tender letter of apology and sympathy, which is published in the preface of Vale's "Life of Paine." Jarvis, the celebrated portrait painter, with whom Paine lived after leaving Carver, says that Paine was neither dirty in his habits nor drunken.

But to return to the Fenwick letter:

"As soon as we had seated ourselvs F[ather] Kohlman, in a very mild tone of voice, informed him that we were Catholic priests and were come on his invitation to see him. Paine made no reply."

They had come on his invitation, and he had instructed the housekeeper to admit that day none but Catholic priests, and yet they said to him: "We are Catholic priests, come on your invitation!" Credat tonsured monk!

"After a short pause F[ather] Kohlman proceeded thus, addressing himself to Paine in the French language, thinking that as Paine had been in France he was probably acquainted with that language (which however was not the fact) and might better understand what he said, as he had at that time greater facility, and could express himself better, in it than in the English."

Perhaps Father Kolhman, whose name is a German one, could talk French better than English; but when the writer says that Paine, who had lived nine years in Paris, was not acquainted with the French language, Credat Ollendorf!

The newspaper copy of this letter omits the French; we supply it from the lives of "Deceased Bishops," published by O'Shea, New York, 1872.

"'Mons. Paine, j'ai lu votre livre intitule L'Age de la Raison, ou vous avez attacque l'ecriture sainte avec une violence, sans bornes, et d'autres de vos ecrits publics en France, et je suis persuade que'"—

"Paine here interrupted him abruptly, and in a sharp tone of voice, ordering him to speak English thus: 'Speak English, man; speak English.'"

As if Paine could not understand French! for that is not only the inference but the fact alleged by the writer. As if Paine had to wait until forty words of a foreign language were spoken before he interrupted the speaker! And as if Father Fenwick many years afterward could report the very words spoken in French, and remembered that Father Kohlman was interrupted at the particle que! Credat notre Dame!

The apocryphal character of the Fenwick letter is now so apparent that perhaps further comment will be superfluous. The writer translates the beginning of the sentence, and has Father Kohlman complete it with variations, thus:

"'Mr. Paine, I hav read your book entitled, the "Age of Reason," as well as your other writings against the Christian religion, and am at a loss to imagin how a man of your good sense could hav employed his talents in attempting to undermine what, to say nothing of its divine establishment, the wisdom of ages has deemed most conduciv to the happiness of man. The Christian religion, sir—'"

"'That's enough, sir, that's enough,' said Paine, again interrupting him. 'I see what you would be about; I wish to hear no more from you, sir. My mind is made up on that subject. I look upon the whole of the Christian scheme to be a tissue of absurdities and lies, and J. C. [sic] to be nothing more than a cunning knave and an impostor.'"

Any one who has read the "Age of Reason" knows that Paine never could hav said that Jesus Christ was a knave and an impostor. Credat ignoramus!

The next three paragraphs being omitted in the newspaper copy, we supply them from the book. The canard is incomplete without them:

"F[ather] Kohlman here attempted to speak again, when Paine, with a lowering countenance, ordered him instantly to be silent, and to trouble him no more. 'I hav told you already that I wish to hear nothing more from you.'

"'The Bible, sir,' said F. Kohlman, still attempting to speak, 'is a sacred and divine book, which has stood the test and criticism of abler pens than yours—pens which hav at least made some show of argument, and—'

"'Your Bible,' returned Paine, 'contains nothing but fables; yes, fables, and I hav proved it to a demonstration.'

"All this time I looked upon the monster with pity mingled with indignation at his blasphemy. [Here the newspaper copy begins again.] I felt a degree of horror at thinking that in a very short time he would be cited to appear before the tribunal of his God, whom he so shockingly blasphemed, with all his sins upon him. Seeing that F. Kohlman had completely failed in making any impression upon him, and that Paine would listen to nothing that came from him, nor would even suffer him to speak, I finally concluded to try what effect I might hav. I accordingly commenced with observing:

"'Mr. Paine, you will certainly allow there exists a God, and that this God cannot be indifferent to the conduct and action of his creatures.'

"'I will allow nothing, sir,' he hastily replied. 'I shall make no concessions.'

"'Well, sir, if you will listen calmly for one moment,' said I, 'I will prove to you that there is such a being, and I will demonstrate from his very nature that he cannot be an idle spectator of our conduct.'

"'Sir, I wish to hear nothing you hav to say. I see your object, gentlemen, is to trouble me; I wish you to leave the room.'

"This he spoke in an exceedingly angry tone, so much that he foamed at the mouth.

"'Mr. Paine,' I continued, 'I assure you our object in coming hither was purely to do you good. We had no other motiv. We had been given to understand that you wished to see us, and we are come accordingly, because it is a principle with us never to refuse our services to a dying man asking for them. But for this we should not hav come, for we never obtrude upon any individual.'

"Paine, on hearing this, seemed to relax a little. In a milder tone than he had hitherto used he replied:

"'You can do me no good now; it is too late. I hav tried different physicians, but their remedies hav all failed. I hav nothing now to expect' (this he spoke with a sigh) 'but a speedy dissolution. My physicians hav indeed told me as much.'

"'You hav misunderstood,' said I, immediately to him; 'we are not come to prescribe any remedies for your bodily complaints; we only come to make you an offer of our ministry for the good of your immortal soul, which is in great danger of being forever cast off by the Almighty on account of your sins, and especially for the crime of having vilified and rejected his word and uttered blasphemies against his Son.'

"Paine, on hearing this, was roused into a fury; he gritted his teeth, turned and twisted himself several times in his bed, uttering all the while the bitterest imprecations."

Dr. Manley does not describe the patient as able to turn and twist in his bed, and he expressly says he was not a profane man. But this writer says he uttered the bitterest imprecations. Credat Anthony Comstock!

"I firmly believe that such was the rage in which he was at the time that if he had a pistol he would hav shot one of us, for he conducted himself more like a madman than a rational creature."

What a lucky escape for Father Fenwick! Just think of the youthful priest being sent straight to paradise by a pistol shot from the trembling hand of the dying Infidel! Credat George Francis Train!

"'Begone!' said he, 'and trouble me no more. I was in peace,' he continued, 'till you came.'

"'We know better than that,' replied F. Kohlman; 'we know that you cannot be in peace; there can be no peace for the wicked; God has said it.'"

And why didn't he add, "Your housekeeper has confirmed it?" Credat Judge Benedict!

"'Away with you, and your God, too; leave the room instantly,' he exclaimed; 'all that you hav uttered are [sic] lies, filthy lies, and if I had a little more time [and strength?] I would prove it, as I did about your impostor Jesus Christ.'"

In the "Age of Reason" Paine says of Jesus Christ, "He was a virtuous and amiable man." Now he tells the Jesuits that he was an impostor! Credat Beelzebub!

"'Monster!' exclaimed F. Kohlman in a burst of zeal; 'you will hav no more time; your hour has arrived. Think rather of the awful account you hav already to offer, and implore pardon of God. Provoke no longer his just indignation upon your head.'

"Paine here again ordered us to retire in the highest pitch of his voice, and seemed a very maniac with his rage and madness. 'Let us go,' said I to F. Kohlman, 'we hav nothing more to do here; he seems to be entirely abandoned by God; further words are lost upon him.'"

Yes, of course; and why should not the Jesuits hav discovered that at first? Was it not evident to the dullest mind? And how thin the pretense that after repeatedly refusing to hear any argument about the Bible and Christianity Paine relaxed when told that they had come purely to do him good, and at his own invitation, and that he then expected them to prescribe some remedy for his disease! Their persistence was far greater than that of the hypocritical Manley. The insolent priests did not go until ordered to do so some six times. Credat Diabolus ridens!

"Upon this we both withdrew from the room, and left the unfortunate man to his thoughts. I never before or since beheld a more hardened wretch. This you may rely upon; it is a faithful and correct account of the transaction."

Credat Baron Munchausen!

The newspaper copy adds what the book does not, to wit:

"I remain your affectionate brother,
"† BENEDICT, Bishop of Boston."

Gloria patri Benedicto!

And now we challenge the dignitaries of the Catholic church to produce the original letter and prove who wrote it. We do not believe that Bishop Fenwick ever saw it. It is a fabrication, like the Decretals of the primitiv popes, and the apocryphal gospels of the early Catholic church. By such forgeries Christianity was propagated through the Dark Ages; but they only serve a contrary purpose now.

A Plain Perversion of Truth.

We hav received the following letter by due course of mail:

LEBANON, PA., March 19, 283.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Last evening Rev. Theodore Schwanck delivered a sermon in the old Lutheran church of this place, taking for his subject, "What Think Ye of Christ?" In the course of his remarks he said: "There never lived any person of intelligence or learning who doubted the divinity of Christ." Please giv an account in an early issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER of some of the prominent "unintelligent" men of the past and present who did not or do not believe in the Christian mythology.

AN OLD READER.

It appears to be the favorit amusement of the average minister of the gospel in this year of grace 1883 to see how far he can go in the direction of absolute falsehood and not be set down as a truthless man in the estimation of his flock. Many hav ventured very near to the verge of the reservoir of untruth from which theologians are wont to irrigate the moral vinyard; but the adventurous Mr. Schwanck has gone further and fallen into it, and has received a full baptism unto the remission of the sin of truth-telling. "There never lived any person of intelligence or learning," he declares, "who doubted the divinity of Christ." It may be that Mr. Schwanck himself believes this statement, for there are preachers who know nothing but Christ and him crucified; but it is doubtful if there was a person in his audience credulous enough not to know that it is totally at variance with fact. If all the learned people hav believed in the divinity of Christ, then every Jew is an ignoramus, every Buddhist is a dunce, every Mohammedan is a fool, and every Freethinker and scientist is idiotic. This does not sound very reasonable, but we hav the word of the Rev. Mr. Schwanck for it. The man who uttered the Golden Rule of Christ before Christ was thought of died without knowing enough to realize that he was brainless. The men who wrote our Declaration of Independence filled that document with profound and immortal political truths without the assistance of an enlightened mind, and we once had a simpleton for president in the person of Thomas Jefferson. Alexander von Humboldt graduated at the highest university of Germany without learning anything; yet he "died covered with the insignia of honor, loved by a nation, respected by the world, with kings for his servants." "The world is his monument; upon the eternal granit of her hills he inscribed his name." Opposit this name the Rev. Mr. Schwanck has scribbled "Idiot."

If we follow out this clerical gentleman's line of thought we find the foremost scientists of this age and every other on the dunce-block. Haeckel knows nothing; Huxley is without understanding; Darwin died enveloped in the darkness of ignorance; Herbert Spencer and John Fiske hav not as yet acquired the alphabet of knowledge, and Prof. Tyndall lacks ordinary intelligence. These are startling statements, and no one believes them or would be so adventurous as to make them except the Rev. Theodore Schwanck, of Lebanon.

The opposit of Mr. Schwanck's affirmation—i.e., that no person of learning or intelligence ever believed in the divinity of Christ—would be nearer the truth than his version of the state of things; but it would not be the whole truth, because there would be exceptions to the rule. Possibly no one would suspect that gentleman himself of furnishing such an exception, and perhaps one might search through his congregation without finding an example of it, but still no unbeliever would be so unfair as to make that allegation against the religious world. It would be safe to say, however, that nine out of every ten ignorant persons in the United States accept Christ's divinity without a doubt, and the less they know the more earnestly they believe.

Any minister who makes the kind of a statement herein ascribed to the Rev. Mr. Schwanck may with safety be set down as a knave or misinformed, and THE TRUTH SEEKER will undertake the task of proving him to be one or both.

Notes.

DOCTOR MONROE has re-christened his paper The Iron-Clad Age.

ALL FOOL'S DAY (April 1st) this year very appropriately fell on Sunday.

THE Methodist organ of this city says the influence of John W. Chadwick, of Brooklyn, and M. J. Savage, of Boston, is utterly antichristian.

H. L. GREEN lectured in North Lawrence, Ohio, April 6th. He speaks at Ashley, in the same state, on the 8th; at Frankfort on the 11th, and at Laura on the 12th. He will be absent from home but ten days.

LAST Sunday Mrs. A. H. Colby began her course of lectures before the Spiritualist Society of Philadelphia. Her engagement lasts all through April. She made us a pleasant call on her way to that city from the East.

COL. OLCOTT, it is said, has discovered in the province of Madras a curious race of people he calls Yanadhis. They liv entirely on frogs, bandicoots, rats, mice, etc., and yet do the work of oxen and horses, and liv to immense ages.

THE Liberal, of Sydney, New South Wales, Australia, seems to be doing its best to keep the people of that far-away country alive to the fact of its existence among them. It is about as aggressiv and sharp in its conclusions as an able-bodied hornet.

THE Sun says that Easter Sunday was utilized by the fashionable part of New York as a poker day. In many cases the ladies allowed their husbands to play on the condition that the winnings, if any, went to decorate the churches. What would Jesus hav said to this, supposing?

AT a recent meeting of the London Physical Society, Mr. Braham gave an experimental demonstration of the vorticel theory of the formation of the solar system by rotating a drop of castor oil and chloroform in water until it threw off other drops as planets. This method may prove an explanation of how Jehovah went about it when, according to Genesis, "he made the stars also."

IN a recent state paper Ben Butler referred to the "Christian emperors of Rome in the third century," and the senate committee whose bill he had vetoed took occasion to remind him that the state had furnished the governor a library which, if he had consulted it, would hav saved him from this anachronistic blunder. It is evident that, though Mr. Butler may know considerable about politics and silverware, his knowledge of the early history of Christianity is limited.

ON Friday evening, April 6th, Mrs. A. C. Macdonald lectures before the Manhattan Liberal Club, on Materialism and Spiritualism from a universological point of view. The advocates of universology claim that the science is a "canon upon thinking"—to use their own phrase—and as Mrs. Macdonald has been somewhat a student of that science for the last dozen years, the public hav an opportunity of judging whether or not it has led her to any unusually wise conclusions.

A MASS MEETING was held at Edinburgh, Scotland, on March 11th, to protest against the recent outrage on the freedom of speech perpetrated by the judge and jury in the case of the prosecuted publishers of the London Freethinker. The following resolution was adopted:

"This open meeting of Edinburgh citizens, without expressing any opinion as to the contents of the Freethinker, condemns the prosecution of that journal as a dangerous revival of laws framed in a spirit of persecution and now out of harmony with enlightened opinion, and resolves to take all lawful means to obtain a repeal of the statutes relating to blasphemy; that, considering the severity of the sentences on Messrs. Foote, Ramsay, and Kemp, the circumstances attending their trial, and the invidious character of prosecutions for blasphemy, this meeting approves of a memorial being presented to the home secretary praying for a remission of the sentence."

As noted last week, Dr. Edward B. Aveling has taken charge of the London Freethinker. He proposes to edit that paper until one of three things happens; namely, the failure of his bodily health, his committal to prison, or the release of the former editor, Mr. Foote. It is the avowed intention of Dr. Aveling to conduct the Freethinker in the spirit of its imprisoned editor, and his greeting to its readers goes to show that the present persecution, if nothing more, has served to develop the editorial resources of the Freethought leaders of England.

THE Agnostic has issued a prospectus for its April number. Among the titles of its articles for that month are the following: "The Wilfordic Fetich!" "The Jewish Homicide!" "Buddhist Christians;" "Christian Justice;" "A Bill to Amend the Law Relating to Parliamentary Oaths;" "Annihilation;" "How These Christians Love One Another!" "Fanatical Intolerance;" "Ribald Blasphemy;" "Death of J. W. Fishburn;" "Prophecy;" "The Radical Victory;" "Liberty of Conscience in Conflict with Religious Fanaticism;" "Statuary for Washington, D.C.;" "Jews and Jew-Baiters;" "Sabbath Rest and Recreation." The Agnostic is published at Dallas, Texas.

MR. CHARLES WATTS, of England, has been lecturing in Canada. On Thursday evening, the 22d, he spoke at Montreal under the auspices of the Montreal Pioneer Freethought Club. His subject was "Thomas Paine and the Fallacies of the Christian Theology," the recent seizure by the customs officers of some of Paine's and Voltaire's works forwarded from this office to parties in Canada making the question of more than usual interest. Mr. Watts's next lecture was on the Friday following; subject, "Secularism." This advocate of Freethought has made a good impression on the people of Montreal, and has a standing engagement to again address them if he should chance to cross the Atlantic a second time.

HELEN WILMANS'S Woman's World, published in Chicago, is a lively paper. Although it has adopted the hop-skip-and-a-jump method of appearing, the editor promises to giv fifty-two numbers for the price of a year's subscription, saying nothing about how long it will require to fill the bill. The Woman's World is a go-as-you-please journal. Miss Wilmans sets forth her desires and object as follows, in which she must hav the sympathy of every gentleman:

"I want to make men and women free—free from fear of tyrants, whether those tyrants be men or gods; whether they exist in fact or only in imagination; and I want to help the people up to a truer appreciation of their own manhood and womanhood, and I will do and say fearlessly whatever seems to me to be calculated to produce that result, and neither men nor ghosts shall keep me from it."

The allusion in another part of the paper to Mr. Monroe, editor of the Age, as "one fellow—a complicated crank that owns a paper in Indianapolis," we cannot commend. We hav never discovered any similarity between the editor mentioned and the aforesaid piece of mechanism. Doc. Monroe is no crank, but the balance wheel of a good large engin of destruction to the church. Long may he revolve!

THE Christian Advocate has got a grain of sense from some quarter—possibly from its experience with the Isabella mining swindle—and it thinks pious people should let the heretics alone. It says:

"The religious committee in England which has ordered, according to report, an examination of the works of Mill, Darwin, Huxley, and others, in order to find in them a basis for a prosecution for blasphemy, must be an uncommonly stupid committee. It is not necessary to search to know what these writers teach, and the only effect of the order will be to put religion into the attitude of prosecuting those who reject some or all Christian teachings. It is strange that pious men can be found still, who do not know that the truth gets all the advantage of free printing of opinions and arguments. It might be well if we could agree all round to suppress a coarse and vulgar kind of irreligious printing. Very likely we might if the line could be drawn so plainly that all men could see it. But the authors named for prosecution are not obnoxious on any such grounds, and to prosecute the publishers of their books would be a phenomenal folly."

The pope once wished to suppress Luther for his coarseness and vulgarity—and he was coarse and vulgar—but would our bigoted contemporary hav counseled interference in his case? Where do one set of men get their right to suppress another set of men, anyway? Is the assertion that "might makes right" a Christian dogma?

IN a recent scientific lecture Professor C. A. Young, the astronomer, of Princeton College, used the following language:

"Do not understand me at all as saying that there is no mystery about the planets' motions. There is just the one single mystery—gravitation—and it is a very profound one. How it is that an atom of matter can attract another atom, no matter how great the disturbance, no matter what intervening substance there may be; how it will act upon it, or at least behave as if it acted upon it, I do not know, I cannot tell. Whether they are pushed together by means of an intervening ether, or what is the action, I cannot understand. It stands with me along with the fact that when I will that my arm shall rise, it rises. It is inscrutable. All the explanations that hav been given of it seem to me merely to darken counsel with words and no understanding. They do not remove the difficulty at all. If I were to say what I really believe, it would be that the motions of the spheres of the material universe stand in some such relation to him in whom all things exist, the ever-present and omnipotent God, as the motions of my body do to my will—I do not know how, and never expect to know."

Professor Young might hav gone further and said that he believed the almighty hand is behind every drop of water to urge it on its course down-hill (without which it would undoubtedly run up-hill); that when a stone is thrown into the air the omnipotent one throws it back; and that but for a little omniscient supervision men would walk like flies on the ceiling, and trees grow into the ground instead of out of it. Professor Young's contributions to the science of astronomy are of great value, but his guesses about things unknowable hav no more weight than those of the Rev. John Jasper.

AT a recent meeting of evangelical ministers, the discussion turned upon the literal interpretation of the scriptures. One of the assembled divines had been making an impassioned appeal for taking the word of God exactly as it was written, without adding thereto or taking therefrom. Said he: "When God said 'streets of gold,' he meant streets of gold; when he said 'gates of pearl,' he meant gates of pearl; and when he said 'sea of glass,' he meant sea of glass," etc. When he made an end of his harang, a thin, piping-voiced member from the rural districts got the floor. He said he was fully in accord with the sentiments of the eloquent brother who had preceded him. He too was in favor of taking scriptures literally, and believed God meant just what he said every time. Of course, he said, there were some things that rather puzzled him, as, for instance, where it speaks of the woman who was seated on seven hills. He could not understand how she could ever do it, but he was willing to suppose that she was endowed with extra large seating capacity.

THE attitude of the government of Mexico toward the Catholics of that country is not very favorable. Consul-General Strather, in his January report to the state department, sets forth that by the "laws of the reform" the whole of the Catholic church property was confiscated, amounting in round numbers to $200,000,000. All the cathedrals and Catholic churches now used belong to the state, and can at any time be sold for the benefit of the public. Other religious sects, however, are not only tolerated, but in some cases specially encouraged. When a Protestant minister recently applied to a governor for protection against a mob, he granted the request, stating: "While I feel no interest whatever in your religious forms or opinions, we are all interested in encouraging the organization of a body of clergy strong enough to keep the old church [the Catholic] in check." The Catholic church is undoubtedly a nuisance to the people of Mexico, as it is to the people of every other country where it has obtained a footing; but the government in discriminating against it in favor of Protestantism is only supplanting one evil with another. If the Catholic church has committed overt acts against the state, it should be held in check by the state, and not by the minions of an opposing system of religion, who, when they obtain the ascendancy, will be equally as lawless. It is to be feared the government of Mexico is not exactly what it ought to be.

IT is said in favor of certain somewhat new notions in theology or modified forms of expressing religious truths that they tend to reconcile the faith of the church and modern philosophical and scientific opinions. The Christian Intelligencer asks:

"Is that worth while? If once begun, where is such a movement to end? Besides, what security is there that the opinions to which the faith of the church is to be accommodated will remain unchanged for the next five years? Do these conclusions in philosophy and science rest upon data not likely to be essentially modified — to say the least? Does the history of science and philosophy warrant an expectation that present theories will prove permanent? And, moreover, what is the faith of the church to represent, the truths of the revelation or the indications of science and the fruit of philosophy? If the creeds and the accepted theologies fairly and clearly present the truths of the holy scriptures, what more is to be asked of them? Are the ministers to be 'ministers of the word' or instructors in natural science and human speculation? Indeed, has there not been too much yielded, not in the creed, but in practice, already?"

The truth of the matter is that theologians find themselvs in a very embarrassing position. They know enough about science to realize that it is in conflict with "revealed" religion. They realize further that one or the other must go. The proofs are pretty plain that science has come to stay, and it takes little notice of dogma. The ministers are uncertain whether it is yet time to run up the white flag, or whether it is best to stave off the capitulation a while longer by a seeming suspension of hostilities, and a hypocritical pretense of harmonizing religion with the teachings of science. It is their business to settle that question, and it is a matter of small moment to their opponents whether they settle it one way or another.

Undoubtedly Christian.

HOUSTON, March 8, 1883.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Some one has sent me a copy of your paper, and these are the impressions it makes on me:

1. Its name is a misnomer. It should be called "Truth Sacrificer."

2. It givs special force and point to the words of Christ in John viii, 44: "Ye are of your father, the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do."

3. If I had ever doubted the existence of the devil, I could doubt no longer, after seeing such a publication. It leaves no room for doubt on this subject.

4. Yet every atrocious word it utters against the Bible and its divine author only fulfils the inspired prediction in 2 Peter, iii, 3: "There shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts," etc.

You are at liberty to publish this, and you will be at least a "truth finder." A PASTOR.

And that is all "A Pastor" can say in support of the superstition he is presumably preaching every Sunday! That is argument!

THE Lady Elks' Journal says: "S. P. Putnam author of 'Prometheus,' has just written a most delightful story, 'Golden Throne.' We highly compliment the author upon the style, beauty, and attractivness of this his latest effort. While dealing with the most advanced ideas of the day with ungloved hands, he has woven the most beautiful and brilliant colors and blendings into the texture. 'Golden Throne' is indeed a fascinating story."

Report of Funds

RECEIVED FOR DANIEL TUTTLE SINCE FEB. 12, 1883.

H. Tickner, Jefferson, Ohio, $1; Dr. Fairchild, New Brunswick, N. J., 50c.; Clayton Garwood, Baltimore, Md., 50c.; H. L. Potter, Lamotte, Iowa, 50c.; J. S. Weeks, Onekama, Mich., $1; Carl Hyedahl, Prescott, Arizona, $1; Lyman Smith, Honolulu, Hawaii Is., $2; John R. Kelso, Modesto, Cal., two books. Not a large amount, friends, yet it is enough to show that there are generous hearts among Liberals, and I feel grateful to each one of the donors every time I see his name on my record-book. I hav the name and address of everyone who has sent me money for Hacker or Tuttle, and each time I add a new one to the list I feel glad and proud, and I hope it will grow and grow till our aged friends will never need for any of the comforts of life. If everyone who reads this could go back in the past, when these men faced danger and death in their efforts to keep alive their papers, teaching truth in the place of myths, and happiness here instead of dreams of future joys, I know that they would feel that it is a glorious privilege to share with them now in their hour of need, thus making a small return for the good seed sown of which we are all reaping a fruitful harvest. ELMINA.

The Passion Play.

It seems strange that, after 1800 years hav elapsed, around the mock representation of Jesus should wage one of the fiercest fights for bigotry; that as in connection with his living personality the orthodoxy of the day declared its opposition to liberty of thought, so now around the dramatic picture of his eventful career the same bitter spirit of persecution and calumny is manifested. The orthodoxy of to-day, represented by Protestant clergymen, is as narrow-minded and as scornful of genuin worth as the Pharisees who crucified Jesus. It is the same story over again, and the essential Jesus—that is, the spirit of human liberty and progress, is again put to the cross. Shame on these devotees of formalism who in their blinded zeal cannot see the deadly blow they are striking at what is most noble in the world's advancement!

We hav witnessed the Passion Play and hav been agreeably surprised. It is a noble and beautiful representation. It is well conceived; it is dramatic; it has grace and power. It is produced with a fine and reverential spirit, and the whole impression is elevating. We expected to find something grotesque. There was nothing of the sort. The incidents and situations brought before us this mighty drama of history with sublime effect. Jesus was presented as a man with a tincture of transcendentalism indeed—full of mystic faith—but in the midst of it all a genuin humanity was seen, exquisit and poetic. The most orthodox, if touched with sentiment and true faith, would not hav been shocked by the lofty idealism of the character. The specially miraculous was omitted; the moral glory of the Christ was brought pre-eminently to view, and his kingdom, which was not of this world. To me, looking at it purely from the artistic standpoint, it touched and thrilled the imagination without a jar. Salmi Morse has interpreted Jesus, if with something of the old faith, with a modern nobleness of outline and spiritual breadth which is charming; for it is not a wonder-worker that we behold, but a great and struggling soul—a martyr filled with enthusiasm, a lofty genius who in his day represented the most forward step in human advancement. Only the formalist can object to the Passion Play; those who hav any faith must find in this dramatic picture something to delight; for Salmi Morse has written this play with the soul of an artist and poet. He has revealed the finest points of this historic drama; he has mingled the play of passion with extraordinary skill; the characters of Pilate, Herod, Herodias, and Salome are depicted with wonderful faithfulness and insight. The costumes and the manners and the spirit of that age hav been reproduced with remarkable fidelity. Evidently the author has studied that period with a lover's enthusiasm, and also with impartial intelligence. If Salmi Morse believes in the divinity of Jesus he does so after a most liberal fashion, and does not thrust that divinity forward in any discordant way.

On the whole, the representation of the Passion Play in this city for the first time was a noble triumph, and the author must be congratulated on his success won after so many defeats. He has within him the unconquerable soul of the prophet, and in his effort to bring forth his admirable drama he represents the spirit of liberty, and every lover of art and humanity should sustain him. The noble mind and heart can rejoice in his deep and truthful rendering of a great epoch, and because in so doing he has met with the opposition of all the formalism of to-day, and those cursed Pharisees who would call brutal force to back up their hypocritical pretensions, he should be sustained by every generous and pro gressiv man. He is sure to win the day, for he has both genius and patience. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The New Era of Man.

From the Nashville Liberal.

The truism that agitation of thought leads to wisdom is applicable in the certainty that a new project can only be brought to the notice of a people and finally adopted through agitation. The National Liberal League at its last session at St Louis, Mo., adopted a NEW ERA CALENDAR for the use of Liberals, with the hope that the people of the world may in time grow into it, or that it may become generally adopted—the old Anno Domini Era of myth and blood having become a drug to enlightened Liberals, like unto kissing the Bible in law courts, etc., before one can tell the truth.

This project, or new era adaptation, has become pretty well known, and is called, not the era of a demi-god, but the Era of Man, commencing with the martyrdom of the noble Bruno, who was burnt at the stake in Rome, 283 years ago, Febuary last.

For myself, I was quick to adopt anything, to get rid of the usages of cloudy Christianity. But recently I read an article in the New York TRUTH SEEKER which argued that instead of the one man martyrdom plan for a New Era, copying from the bloody Christians of old, the birth of American liberty would be much preferable. And I fell in with the idea at once; perceiving that the birth of the first really free nation upon the earth would be preferable for the beginning of a New Era to the death of a man.

I hav not now by me THE TRUTH SEEKER that contains the article I mention and hav forgotten who the author of it was, or I would gladly mention his name. I considered it able and timely. And now, again, I am reminded by an article in your noble little paper of March 3d, just passed, from the pen of my venerable, intellectual, and valued friend, La-Roy Sunderland, of Quincy, Mass., on the same theme, viz: to make the New Era date from the declaration of our National Independence, it being 107 years, rather than the 283 since the martyrdom of Bruno. Yes, friend Sunderland, I am fully convinced that to date from the declaration of our nation, the first really free nation on earth, is best and most becoming us as a people.

The amendment is fully accepted by me. For as the nations of the Old World, one by one, come to adopt our plan of government—as they assuredly will—they would likely also adopt our Calendar. And I trust that the National Liberal League will see the feasibility and change to it.

Said the noble Thomas Paine: "Freedom hath been hunted around the globe. Asia and Africa hav long expelled her. Europe regards her like a stranger;" and he prayed that she might find an asylum here. DR. T. S. ANDREWS.

A Local Lament.

TRUE AS TO MINISTERS, BUT NOT ALTOGETHER MOURNFUL AS TO INFIDELITY.

From the Turners Falls Reporter.

The editor of this paper has had extended interviews with many of the leading citizens of nearly every town in Franklin county, to obtain opinions of the Greenfield method of tolerating "sanctimonious constables" in regulating the liquor traffic, and our information has given us pain. Brought up to reverence the church and the clergy, it grieves us to learn that in one short year the ministers of the gospel of the shire town, and other outlandish places, hav so lowered their dignity by becoming petty constables that a contemptuous sneer has taken the place of respect for the profession. A clergyman can be on occasion the most impracticable creature under the sun, but when he resorts to the tricks and traps of the ward politician and displays a vindictiv spirit that is anything but Christian, the average individual quickly discovers that the livery of heaven is worn to gratify a very human passion—to get the best of the other fellow. We were pained to read that the ministers of the gospel had met in a public hall in Greenfield, under the cloak of religion, to say hard things about their neighbors, and deliver political stump speeches, ostensibly as prayers to God, but really as bids for the assistance of the straggling tough-end voter. Whoever reveres the name of the savior, abhors the sight of a pair of eyes like those of a dying calf turned to the ceiling of a public hall, on a Sunday evening previous to an election, where prayers are rendered blasphemous by their association with venomous political clap-trap, and sad it is that the churches of these latter days are becoming the schools of Infidelity, because the pastors are allowed to use their holy office to assist them in their political trades. Charity might lead us to say that all the efforts of radical prohibitionists on behalf of temperance were for the benefit of humanity, but men of the world fancy they see the same old cloven foot of persecution which has followed the church from the dark ages, in the persistent dogging of democratic old man Simonds, who may perchance hav contributed much less to the support of the gospel than the aristocratic Mansion House. For the moral of these remarks, the reader is simply referred to the vote on the license question in the several towns of Franklin county on "town meeting day."

CHAPTER XXXI.

ARIANISM AND ATHANASIANISM.

That a Jew named Jesus was similar or consubstantial with God is both absurd and impious.

That there are three persons in one substance is equally absurd.

That there are three Gods in one is also absurd.

None of all this is a part of the Christian system, since nothing like it can be found in any one of the writings of the evangelists recognized alone as the foundation of that religion. It was only when they began to run after Plato that the Christian leaders lost themselvs in such chimerical ideas. The wider Christianity spread, the more its teachers labored to rendered it incomprehensible. All their subtleties only preserved the inferior and coarse parts.

But why preserve all these metaphysical conceptions? What difference would it make to society, or in the manners and customs of people, whether God was in one person, or in three, or in four thousand? Does it benefit man any more to pronounce words which he does not understand? Religion is the submission to providence, love, and virtue. Is there any need of making it ridiculous before adopting it?

For a long time the meaning of that misunderstood word, logos, was in dispute, until Alexander, pope of Alexandria, brought the wrath of many of his brother popes upon his head by preaching that the trinity was a simple being—a monad. The name pope, by the way, was conferred indiscriminately at that time upon bishops and priests. Alexander was a bishop. A priest named Arius had put himself at the head of the malcontents, and thus formed two very violent cliques, and the matter in dispute having changed, as it often happened, Arius held that Jesus had been created, while Alexander maintained that he was begotten. This profound dispute was very similar to that which afterward divided Constantinople. It was a question there whether the light the monks saw in their navels was that of Thabor, and whether the light of Thabor and their navel was created or eternal.

There was no further question of the three hypotheses among these disputants. The father and the son filled the soul, and the holy spirit was neglected.

Alexander excommunicated Arius. Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, a protector of Arius, assembled a small council, which declared that doctrine erroneous to-day accepted as orthodox. The quarrel grew more violent. The bishop of Alexandria and the deacon Athanasius, who had already made himself known for his resolution and his intrigues, overturned all Egypt. The Emperor Constantine was despotic and hard, but he had the good sense to look upon this fuss as ridiculous.

Every one has heard of that famous letter which he sent to the chiefs of the factions by Osius. "These questions," he wrote, "only arise on account of your idle curiosity; you are divided on a very pitiful question, and your conduct is wrong and puerile—unworthy of sensible men." The letter counseled peace, but then the writer did not understand the temper of theologians.

The aged Osius advised the emperor to call together a great council. Constantine, who adored show and pomp, convoked an assembly at Nice, where he appeared in state, wearing his imperial robes, a crown upon his head, and covered with precious stones. Osius presided, being the oldest of the bishops. The writers belonging to the papal party have since declared that Osius presided only in the name of Pope Sylvester, of Rome. This shallow falsehood, which ought to be placed by the side of the tales about the donations of Constantine, is refuted by the very names of the deputies of Sylvester, Titus and Vincent, charged with his proxies. The Roman popes were, in truth, regarded as bishops of the imperial city and the suburban cities in the province of Rome; but they were far from having any authority over the bishops of the East and of Africa.

The council, by a great majority, drew up a resolution in which the name of the Trinity is not merely pronounced: "We believe in one God and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only son of God, begotten of the father and not made, being of one substance with the father." After these inexplicable words they put in addition: "We believe also in the Holy Ghost," without saying what was the Holy Ghost, whether it was created, or begotten, or consubstantial. And they finally added: "Anathema upon those who say that at any time the son was not."

But what was most ridiculous in the Council of Nice was the decision concerning the canonical books. The fathers were much embarrassed in choosing the evangelical books and other scriptures. Finally they piled all these books upon an altar and prayed to the Holy Ghost to cast upon the ground all those which were not authentic. The Holy Spirit immediately granted this request of the fathers.* A hundred volumes fell of their own accord under the altar; this is an infallible means of determining the truth, and it is so reported in the Appendix of the acts of this council. This is one of the best proven facts of ecclesiastical history.

Our learned and wise Middleton,† discovered a chronicle of Alexandria written by two patriarchs of Egypt, in which it is said that not only seventeen bishops but also two thousand priests protested against the decision of the council.

The victorious bishops prevailed on Constantine to exile Arius and three or four of the conquered bishops, but afterward Athanasius, having been elected bishop of Alexandria, and having abused his authority, caused the recall of the exiled bishops, together with Arius. Athanasius was exiled in turn. It was one of two things, either the two factions were equally in error, or Constantine was very unjust. The fact is, the wranglers of that time were intriguers like those of the present time, and princes of the fourth century resembled those in our own age, who understand nothing about the subject, neither they nor their ministers, and who indiscriminately sent people into exile. Happily we have deprived our kings of the power of exiling, and if we have not been able to cure our priests of the passion for intriguing, we have at least rendered their intrigues ineffective.

There was a council at Tyre, at which Arius was reinstated and Athanasius condemned. Eusebius of Nicomedia was about to introduce his friend Arius into the church of Constantinople with great pomp, but a holy Catholic named Macarius prayed God with so much fervor, and with such profusion of tears, to cause Arius to die of apoplexy, that God in his goodness granted it. It is reported that all the bowels of Arius fell through his fundament. But St. Macarius having forgotten to ask for repose in the Christian church, God never gave it to him. Constantine some time afterward died in the arms of an Arian priest. It seems that St. Macarias had forgotten to pray to God for the safety of Constantine.

*This is reported in the appendix of the Acts of the Council which have always been considered authentic.

†Conyers Middleton (1683-1750) was an English divine, very much given to theological controversies. So strongly and freely did he express his views that it brought upon him the imputation of being an "Infidel in disguise."

Infidel Philosophy.

Children are gathered into the Sabbath-school at an early day and taught that the Bible is the word of God. But whether it was handed down directly from heaven by God himself, in a book as we now find it, or whether it was spoken by God from the clouds, or whether he inspired some person or persons to write it, not one Christian out of a hundred can tell. And if two-thirds of them were called upon to giv a reason why they believe it to be the word of God, all the evidence they could bring would not giv them a judgment in a court of justice to the value of a peck of bran.

God never made a book. He is not a printer by trade; he is known to be too careless for a printing-office; he would knock everything into pi. Men hav made all the books which men ever hav read, and the Bible forms no exception. The men who wrote the Bible are not entitled to the respect of candid men, as most other writers are, for they wrote not to instruct and enlighten, but to deceive and impose upon the people. Besides they knew no more about God than a caffre knows about metaphysics, and couldn't hav found out where he was with a double-barreled telescope. Moreover, we don't know who wrote nor when they wrote nor all they wrote about. The autographs of the original writers would be as great a curiosity as the devil's tracks in the mud.

Dr. Smith flatly admits that "the title at the head of each book in the New Testament was not prefixed by the writers themselvs, but by the early transcribers."

Now, when eternal torments await us on the one hand, and eternal bliss on the other, should not some one be able to tell us who these early transcribers were and when this transcribing was done, and giv us some clue to their character? If they took such liberty without authority, what assurance hav we that they did not take other and greater liberties? And what assurance can we hav that these writings are the genuin productions of the authors whose names they bear? And if it should turn out that by using certain names the writings would be more authoritativ and valuable, would not the same motiv lead them to make other additions and alterations for the same purpose?

And the same author admits that "it is well known that in the early days of Christianity many silly and fraudulent persons composed fictitious narrativs of the life and actions of Jesus Christ and his apostles, and gave them out as the writings of Peter, Nicodemus, Thomas, Barnabas, and even Judas Iscariot." What admissions for a learned doctor of divinity to make! And he further says, "The early fathers admitted as much." And then, to crown all, and as if to brush away the last vestige of doubt, he makes the declaration that "in the time of Simon and the learned Benedictines very grave and numerous errors with respect to persons and transactions of those dark ages were commonly received."

Remember these are admissions and statements of a Christian writer, and one, too, who was running stark mad because an Infidel writer had assailed the veracity of the scriptures of the New Testament. What a predicament for sacred writings—"fictitious writings of the life of Jesus Christ." And who at this day is to separate the fictitious from the genuin, if any genuin ever did exist, especially where "numerous errors in these dark ages were commonly received."

Gibbon says in the year 451 the exercise of the pagan religion was prohibited under pain of death. Now if there was a disposition and power to take human life for the exercise of religious rites, when a religion was to be crushed out; would not the same power and the same means be used to bring a religion into favor which was to be built up?

Mosheim says (p. 109, vol. i): "Not long after Christ's ascension several histories of his life and doctrins, full of pious frauds and fabulous wonders, were composed by persons whose motivs perhaps were not bad, but whose writings discovered the greatest superstition and ignorance. Nor was this all; productions appeared which were imposed upon the world as the writings of the holy apostles."

Now howl, all ye pious priests; pound your desks in holy indignation, and tell your hearers what a vile wretch "Tom" Paine was for attempting to undermine the word of God. Pour into their ears the certainty of damnation if they doubt. Gather in the youth at your Sabbath-schools, and instruct the young mind that our present Bible has been faithfully compared with the ancient manuscripts still in existence, and that it is exactly the same, while all the time the most that this great Christian writer can claim for it is imposition, fiction, fable, and fraud.

I would call particular attention to the fact that Mosheim admits that these "pious frauds and fabulous wonders" could be written by persons without a bad motiv. And the church has never until this day impugned the motiv of a man who lied for the church.

In Mosheim (p. 108, vol. i) will be found the following statement: "The opinions of the learned as to the authors of the New Testament are extremely different. The question is attended with insuperable difficulties in these latter times." This is flatly admitting that the New Testament is without authority. For if the learned cannot agree as to the authorship—and it is impossible to find out who the authors were—why, then, there is a cat in the well, and who wants the water?

If it should be discovered that no such man as Euclid lived, no geometrical law would be disturbed. If it should be found out that some other man, and not Newton, discovered the law of gravitation, the law would remain the same. Not so with the holy scriptures. For should it turn out that a "thus saith the Lord" was said by some priest, or by Tom, Dick, or Harry, why, there's an end of the whole matter, and we might just as well stop fretting about hell and try to enjoy ourselvs.

Here is another choice bit from the pen of Bishop Fell, which may hav a tendency to strengthen the Christian's faith in the infallibility of the New Testament scriptures. Hear him: "Such was the license of inventing; so headlong the madness of believing, in the first ages, that the credibility of transactions derived thence must be hugely doubtful. Nor has the world only, but the church also reasonably, to complain of its mystical times."

Now, my Christian friend, if after this kind of evidence, you still hav faith to believe that the scriptures are the pure, unmixed, and unadulterated word of God, then that same faith will enable you to believe that the water which is discharged from a city sewer is just as pure as the limpid water which leaps from a mountain rock.

To show that there was a disposition on the part of the early Christians to put down all opposition to their religion and force it upon the world by fair or foul means, I will quote a decree from Theodosius: "We decree, therefore, that all writings whatever which Porphyry or any one else hath written against the Christian religion, in the possession of whomsoever found, shall be committed to the fire." And the following are the reasons given for the decree: "For we would not suffer any of these things to come to the ears of men, which tend to provoke God to wrath, and offend the minds of the pious."

From that day to this the Christian has treated his God as a pusillanimous being, incapable of asserting his own rights or taking care of his own business. He has acted the part of a pious bully, always trying to clear up the character of his God, and ready to fight the man who asserted that God could take care of his own matters without the Christian's help. "God has been provoked to wrath" every time anything has been written to offend the priesthood, and nothing so offends them as to expose the tricks of the trade.

To show how willingly the people received the doctrin of the holy trinity, I quote from another decree of the same emperor. All who did not take to it kindly were to be submitted to the following penalty: "Besides the condemnation of divine justice they must expect to suffer the severe penalty which our authority, guided by heavenly wisdom, may think proper to inflict upon them" (Gibbon, vol. v, p. 15).

The forbearance and loving kindness of the Christian religion are here made manifest, "Verily I came not to bring peace, but a sword." What will become of the cloth if the people ever become even partially acquainted with the history of the Christian religion? The stake, the rack, the lash, and the thumb-screw hav ever been the accompaniment of slavery, and the slavery of the Christian religion forms no exception to the rule. JOHN PECK.

Naples, N. Y.

Temperance.—Christianity.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Seeing a number of truth seekers, "Law," "Liberta," Walker, Gage, Rose, Bartlett, and others crossing pens in your paper upon the subject of prohibition, and as one has "taken my name in vain," I hav thought proper, with your permission, to enter the arena of contest.

I am now past sixty, and hav never bought, sold, drank, or knowingly eaten any kind of intoxicating liquors, and I would that all men, women, and children, in this respect, "were even as I." So much for my position.

I desire here in justice briefly to say that I am personally acquainted with E. C. Walker, and that any one charging him with advocating or apologizing for drunkenness knows nothing about what he is falsely charging.

It is evident that prohibition will be very generally discussed, and nearly every paper in the land will be a vehicle for such discussion. Perhaps in Liberal papers only can it be discussed in all its bearings.

Only a little more than a century ago Massachusetts, the state which has always been pointed to as the most intelligent, moral, and religious, exempted from taxation any man who would yearly manufacture one hundred barrels of beer. The vessels that sailed from Boston harbor to carry out missionaries to Christianize the heathen carried also cargoes of New England rum. All who could afford the luxury kept sideboards well loaded with decanters. Every wholesale and retail grocer kept it for sale. Every Christian dignitary called it "the blood of Christ," and drank it as a pious and pleasant duty. The clergy universally drank it as "the good creature of God." At every church raising or similar gathering "distilled damnation" was freely furnished. All classes drank the burning beverage, and throughout New England about every fourth entry in the day-book of the retail merchant was "N. E. rum." But distillers had not then taken out patents for manufacturing whisky with strychnin.

Reforms always originate outside the church. The Christian church has only "the atoning blood of Christ," and the "God-ordained" club, with which to reform mankind; and outsiders organized temperance societies for the purpose of reform. The first pledges required abstinence from strong drinks only, except upon special occasions, as washing sheep, etc. It was soon found that this course would never reach the end sought; still the clergy generally, if not universally, denounced such organizations.

At length total abstinence societies were organized, one of the first movers in that direction being Judge Thomas Herttell, of the Marine Court of New York—a man whom intelligent Infidels delight to honor. These societies labored zealously and nobly in the cause of reform, and accomplished great good; but they encountered no opposition equal to that of the church. Even the basement of a church on a week-day evening could not be obtained for a temperance meeting.

At last, in a saloon in Baltimore, the Washingtonians originated. Being reformed inebriates, they could sympathize with the victims of the cup, and with no threats or denunciations they took the poor inebriate and liquor dealer by the hand as a brother, and with honest eloquence appealed to his reason, his manhood, his feelings for his family and society at large, and they went forward "conquering and to conquer." The chief value of previous organizations was guarding and restraining the rising generations, comparativly few inebriates being reformed. They now, however, acknowledged that the Washingtonians had struck the keynote of reform, and cheerfully acquiesced and worked with them. Thousands of drunkards were reformed, and hundreds of liquor dealers quit the business forever. In some instances men so drunk that it took two others to hold them up were taken into Washingtonian and Sons of Temperance meeting thoroughly reformed and made good and useful citizens. The church in some cases afterward drew them to her embrace, revived the old taste by giving "the blood of Christ" at communion, and they filled a drunkard's grave. Still the church denounced the reform, and declared the reformers had "scattered Infidelity broadcast through the land." The church was still the strongest opponents of the temperance cause. Yet the cause moved on; drinking rapidly decreased, and the great mass of the young were being saved from the evil. The annual consumption in the United States at that time amounted to $800,000. The wiser ones in the church saw that in spite of their opposition the cause would triumph. What must be done?

The church has never originated any reform, and never embraced any except upon compulsion, and then only to curse and destroy it. She now relaxed her opposition to the temperance cause, and by a general concert of action she wheeled round and took the control of the movement out of the hands of the Washingtonians. She declared defiantly, "We hav had enough of moral suasion! Now we will hav legal suasion." And ever since, for thirty-nine years, the "God-ordained" trumpeters hav sounded, "Prohibition! prohibition!" throughout the land. The state Young Men's Temperance Societies hav disappeared; the Washingtonians hav passed to forgetfulness; the Sons of Temperance, Daughters of Temperance, Temple of Honor, Rechabites, Daughters of Rechab, Good Templars, and Cadets of Temperance, where are they? And through the dark mists of prohibition the echo comes faintly, Where?

And now after thirty-nine years of church control, the annual cost of "liquid poison" consumed in the United States is from $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000! And our so-called temperance societies, the clergy-controled Women's Christian Temperance Unions, are still bawling, both to God and man, "Prohibition! prohibition!"

But, Mr. Editor, I hav made this letter too long already, and hav not written one-quarter of what I desire. Yet, if you will allow me to do so, I will continue the subject. M. FARRINGTON.

A Methodist Couple's Cruelty.

INHUMAN TORTURE OF AN ORPHAN.

From the Milwaukee Sentinel.

The Humane Society hav been instrumental in bringing to light a case of cruelty to a child wherein the methods of torture exceed in number and ingenuity those practiced during the dark ages. The alleged perpetrator of these inhuman acts is Sumner Pickering, of Plainfield, a farmer well-provided with this world's goods, a member of the Methodist church of that place, and heretofore bearing a good name and standing high in the community as a man and a church-member. On Aug. 15th last, Superintendent Whitehead had placed in his charge a bright little boy of 10 years, Arthur Gilroy, for whom he was anxious to secure a good home. The little fellow was given to Pickering, who proposed to take him to his home, treat him as his own son, and if after three months' trial both were satisfied, he was to be formally adopted into the family. Owing to a press of business matters in the city, Superintendent Whitehead was unable to visit the child in his new home as early as desirable, and on Feb. 23d, received a letter from a friend in Plainfield to the effect that the man was grossly abusing the boy. Immediately following this, one of the directors of the Humane Society was in receipt of another letter containing the same information, and further saying that unless the society took steps to end this the citizens of the village would hang Pickering. The next day Mr. Whitehead went north, visiting the man and removing from his care the boy, whom he placed with a kind-hearted gentleman, T. P. Bovee, who agreed to investigate the matter. Pickering and his wife were finally arrested, and at the trial evidence was elicited to place the couple on the level with the leaders of the Spanish Inquisition. The little fellow was placed on the stand, and after the nature of the oath was explained to him, he was asked if he hated his persecutor. "No," he said, "I don't hate him, but I don't like him very well." The boy had been repeatedly whipped and beaten, the man and woman using whips, brush, horsewhips, slabs, and pitchforks, as shown by the evidence taken during the trial. The boy was pounded with a pitchfork until the tines were broken over his back. Another time the tines of a fork were run through his thigh and again through his heel. He had been tied to the gate-post and left exposed, half clothed, for some time in the cold. On one occasion he had been taken to the barn, a chain placed around his neck and he was suspended in this position from a rafter, his feet barely touching the top of a fanning-mill upon which he was placed. He had been whipped and beaten, starved and frozen, and by exposure to the severe cold his hands were once frozen until the nails dropped off. On one occasion he was detected in a trifling falsehood and his guardian as a punishment slit his tongue with a pair of shears.

During the trial the court-room was crowded, 1,000 to 1,200 people being present during the entire proceedings, and the greatest interest was manifested throughout. It was with great difficulty that the people, infuriated by the tales of suffering told by the child in his artless way, could be prevented from taking the accused from the hands of the sheriff and his deputies, and hanging them to the neighboring trees. One woman volunteered in open court to walk home, three miles distant, and get a feather bed, providing sufficient spunk could be found among the men present to tar and feather the accused. The boy was subjected to other treatment so inhuman and disgusting as to be unfit for publication. The trial resulted in an expense to Pickering, including fine and costs, amounting to $200. The case was tried before Judge T. H. Walker, and the prosecution was conducted by W. N. Kelley. Supt. Whitehead and Rev. G. E. Gordon, of this city, were present during the trial, representing the Humane Society.

Pickering, the man who practiced this torture upon the little fellow, is a farmer living one and a half miles from Plainfield; he is quite well off, and a member of the Methodist Church.

Hell and Salvation.

The greatest theologians no longer contend that there is a hell of burning fire; but they must hav some kind of hell with which to scare the people into being good. They say the hell in which they believe is remorse; that when our bodies are dead and our souls are riding clouds in the land of the supernatural, our past records will loom up before our eyes in shining letters; and when we see our whole history at a glance, remorse will be so great that the fires of hell will be preferable. This hell is no improvment on the old one; for eternal torment of one kind is about as bad as another. It is more absurd to threaten an Infidel with this hell than it is to threaten him with the brimstone hell; because if this doctrin be true, the honest Infidel is safe, there being nothing to cause his remorse. It is absurd and inconsistent to suppose that when Atheist finds himself before God and all the hosts of heaven, he can eternally laments, because there was a time when he didn't know he had a soul. If there is a God, a person in the spirit world cannot be punished in any way whatever because he didn't always know it. And it is just as absurd to suppose a man can rob, murder, and plunder in this world, and then, when his last breath is going, call on Jesus, be forgiven, and then be eternally happy, regardless of what he once did.

Every religion is founded on this horrid doctrin of eternal torment, and when it is destroyed, all religions must unresistingly take their leave; because when their foundation is gone, their massiv walls must tumble to the ground, and because extinguishing the flames of hell obliterates the scheme of salvation.

As civilization advances the belief in this infamous doctrin rapidly fades from the minds of the people; and by all scientific men the scheme of salvation is believed to be too ridiculous to deserve one moment's sober thought.

Most of the religions and barbarisms of ancient times are gone; the stock and rack are buried in the grave of superstition, and the thumb-screw is exhibited merely as a relic of a barbarous age. And now,

> "As progress rolls her car along, > Slowly righting human wrong," the doctrin of eternal torment and the scheme of salvation, the only fragments of barbarism that still cling to civilization, must slowly but surely depart.

Religion Run Mad.

The New York Times correspondent writes from Denver, Col., regarding a fanatical sect as follows:

The Hermands Penitents, a fanatical religious sect, numbering about 2,000 persons, in the territory of New Mexico, who believe in the periodical atonement of sin by inflicting on their bodies agonizing tortures, were originally with the Roman Catholic church, but Archbishop Laney, shocked by the barbarous cruelties, promulgated a decree banishing them from communion. The members hav greatly thinned out since, and they now inhabit principally but four counties in the territory. Great care is taken to prevent the discovery of their identity by the Inspector, and all are masked. While conducting their annual penance the devotees often travel hundreds of miles to undergo the prescribed torture.

Los Griegos, a small Mexican village, near Albuquerque, boasts of the great body of penitents. This morning the ceremonies were inaugurated by an introductory procession containing about 30 men and women. The process of purification by torture began at 10 o'clock.

Five men, naked to the waist, barefooted, and wearing black robes and hoods, completely concealing their identity, were seen to issue above the lodge-house of the sect led by the master of ceremonies, who carried cat-of-nine tails. Two huge wooden crosses, weighing 250 pounds each, were placed on the naked shoulders of two of the self-torturers, the sharp edges cutting into the naked flesh caused the blood to spurt out and drop to the ground. One penitent produced a sharp goad, which he thrust into the flesh of his fellow-sufferers from time to time, while the procession moved up the street, to a wild chant in Spanish, halting once. The crosses were transferred to the others' shoulders, the attendants applying their raw-hide whips mercilessly, each blow taking off the skin and bits of flesh. The procession took its way to the jail a half a mile away. During the march not a groan was heard or a word spoken.

Must the World Perish When Christianity Dies?

A writer in the Christian Advocate, the Rev. Luther Lee, D.D., has taken it upon himself to expose what he calls "the folly of Infidels." After quoting portions of the League demands, he goes on:

"All this is extreme folly, and its folly is seen from three standpoints:

"I. This folly is seen in their selection of an enterprise on which to spend their energies. It must be the last degree of folly to devote their powers to the procurement of an end which, if successful, would ruin the world. Their complete success would throw humanity back upon its own resources, and it would become what it is, always has been, and always must be without the light of the scriptures.

"1. We should lose all knowledge of God, of the origin of the material universe, of the origin of our race, and all knowledge of our destiny after death, except so much as humanity has known and may know without any light from the Bible. Without attempting to elaborate this fearful proposition, it is enough to say we should become a world of idolaters, for humanity has never risen above gross idolatry without a revelation from God, which is found in the scriptures.

"2. We should lose all the knowledge which has been derived from the Bible, and all the improvements and advantages which hav resulted from that knowledge. Fancy the change coming over us, and realize in imagination the result of these Infidel efforts, could they prove successful.

"II. Infidels show their folly in their modes of attack and defense, in their war upon Christianity. They commence their blind and reckless work by denying all revelation from God, and all supernatural influence. This leaves them no basis upon which to rear a theory, and they struggle and flounder in labyrinths of negativs. It is undeniable that man is a religious being; hence all men must hav some kind of religion. As Infidels remove the scriptures they must supply man's religious want in some other way, which they hav rendered impossible by denying the existence of the supernatural.

"Religion includes worship, and worship includes the supernatural. If there is no supernatural there is and can be no equal to man, and, hence, nothing for man to worship, as he cannot worship himself, or anything inferior to himself. They hav no way of supplying man's religious necessity; here their negativ system fails them, and they flounder at every attempt.

"1. When they deny the existence of a creator, they virtually affirm that nothing has produced something, which is an impossibility. If there had once been nothing, there never could hav been anything; hence something must be eternal.

"2. When, to escape the above, they affirm that the visible universe is eternal, they only increase the difficulty. Creation wears upon its face marks of intelligent design, and there must hav been an intelligent designer. If there is no intelligent creator, these marks of design hav no cause, and nothing has produced something, or something exists without cause.

"Vegetable, animal, and human life exists in such a succession of lives as proves that there must hav been a first life of each kind.

"3. When Infidels affirm that these different degrees and forms of life are the result of nature's own spontaneity, evolving the higher from the lower, they obtain no relief. Nature has never given any evidence of speech [such?] a spontaneity, and never produces anything without a germ, seed, or scion. It leaves the beginning unaccounted for. Where did the first plant, first tree, animal, and first man come from? It avails nothing to talk of a chain consisting of links of men, monkeys, oysters, and vegetables. Where did the first link come from? This phantom folly has been chased far enough.

"III. Infidels show their folly by undertaking so hopeless a task as the destruction of Christianity.

"1. To succeed they must destroy the Bible, the oldest and most venerable book in the world, and which is the book of the civilized world, of which more copies are printed and read by more people in more languages than any other book. They must destroy the Bible, which contains the moral law, which has stood the test of three thousand years without amendment, and has become the basis of the jurisprudence of all civilized nations. They must destroy the Bible, which contains the only religion in the world which can make any show of authority or command the indorsement of enlightened reason and common sense, and which contains all the religious truth in the world worth knowing. No religious truth worth knowing can be named which is not in the Bible.

"2. To succeed, they must blot out Christianity from the world, erase all its signatures, cover up all its footprints, expunge it from the pages of the world's literature, overturn all the institutions with which it is blessing the world, demolish all the monuments it has erected, as schools, churches, hospitals, almshouses, asylums, and the monumental graves of the saints."

We notice this, not because these objections are in themselvs of any account, but because they are the popular and stock arguments of the Christian portion of the world.

The reverend gentleman says that the accomplishment of the aims of the Freethought party "would ruin the world." But how? It is admitted on all sides, from the pulpit and by the press, that religion is gradually fading away. But yet the world is better to-day than it ever was before. Skepticism always precedes progress. This is an age when men doubt more strongly and keenly than ever before. Out of a population of 800,000 non-Catholics in New York only 97,000 are church-members. This is but a fraction over one in ten. When New York was settled every one, nearly, belonged to the church. There can be no doubt of the spread of Infidelity. The very fact of the League's existence shows it. Twenty-five years ago the officers of the League and the editors of the Liberal papers would hav been imprisoned and mobbed, as was the case, in fact, with Abner Kneeland and the Abolitionists. The toleration of the church party is against its own will, and forced from it by the growing spirit of rationalism. And with all this growth, there is nothing clearer than that the world is growing better, more moral, more civilized. This is evidenced on all sides. Considering this point, the Rev. E. P. Powell, of Utica, made these remarks, and we commend them to the Rev. Luther Lee, as the opinion of a brother clergyman:

"I know of no evidence that comes so forcibly home as a review of our surroundings. I hav never seen the man who after a cry of horror or despair could be induced to carefully compare his own neighborhood with what it was twenty-five years ago, without he stifled his lamentations with exclamations of joy. I hav my home to-day where I had it fifty years ago. Then of the inhabitants of College Hill from base to crown, ten families, seven were cursed with drunken fathers, or sons, or both. Now of fifteen families there is but one in any way identified with the traffic or use of intoxicants. In the same way consider the habits of young men who were your companions in school. Not only will you be compelled to note a vast improvement as regards drunkenness, but as concerns chastity and general decency.

"On the farms of to-day, the men whose language is most unchaste and gross are those whose gray hairs should be a guarantee of something better. The narrow life of the past left them more sensuous and selfish. The larger range of topics now before the young men leads them out into more intellectual and less sensual ways of living and talking.

"Utica has a history of mobs, arson, and hanging involving its leading citizens and highest families, that it can never repeat."

Summing up the advances made by this nation during the past twenty-five years, Mr. Powell continued, and we ask the Rev. Luther Lee, D.D., how he accounts for the facts if the growth of Infidelity is to ruin the world. We do not ask him to take our word, but giv him the statements of one of his cloth:

"But step out beyond your own neighborhood.

"A man's single life spans the rise and progress of the temperance reformation; the downfall of human bondage; the establishment of international peace congresses; the education and civilization of eight millions of our citizens, who were forbidden to know the alphabet; the abolition of concubinage and the establishment of marriage over half our states; the establishment of equal rights for all religions; the abolition of the vestiges of intolerance and mob law; the rights of children secured; the emancipation of woman almost a fact; prison punishment changing to prison reform; punishment for debt, the stocks, and human degradation in public avoided; and not least a wondrous development of mercy to dumb brutes, which is more Buddhistic than Christian."

These words of President Eliot, of Harvard University, are also respectfully commended to the attention of the Rev. Luther Lee, D.D. He said in a recent lecture:

"The decline of the ministry is a recognized fact of the last few decades. In the last century clergymen made one-third of all the educated people, and wielded an influence proportionately great. To-day all but one in nineteen of the graduates of Harvard, and all but one in thirteen of the graduates of Yale, shun the ministry."

These strides in civilization hav been made, and Infidelity has spread a hundred-fold. It appears to us that there is a strong connection between these facts. How does it appear to the Rev. Luther Lee, D.D.? In all countries the growth of the church has been inimical to advance. Italy has been obliged to confiscate the property of the church to save itself. So has Mexico. France has been obliged to expel the Jesuits in order to obtain good government. If throwing overboard the church would ruin the world, why are not France and Italy ruined instead of being benefited? Will the Rev. Luther Lee, D.D., explain?

And secondly Mr. Lee says that should the League triumph we should lose all knowledge of God, of the origin of the universe, and of our destiny after death! That is good. There is not a preacher in the world to-day who knows the first thing about God, or that can tell who he is, or what he is, or where he is. All the theologians in the world cannot giv even a logical guess. And as to the origin of the universe, what knowledge does the church or the Bible giv? Every statement made in regard to it by the church has been shown to be false. The church says it was made six thousand years ago, but that time is not sufficient for one stratum of the earth's crust to form. Niagara Falls has roared over its ragged rocks for at least five times that period. The church tells us that vegetation flourished before the sun appeared, but that is only another fable of the pious ones. The church tells us that the sun is only a light set in the firmament for the special benefit of this earth, and that the moon was created only to rule the night.

What a great loss it would be if the world were deprived of this inestimably valuable information!

And what accurate knowledge has the church given us regarding our destiny after death? Tell us, Mr. Lee, what do you know about it. Your church has painted a lurid hell and located it somewhere in the lower regions, but tell a waiting and anxious world, O Rev. Luther Lee, where it is and all about it! Tell us also where your painted heaven is, and tell us for certain. Do not guess about such a matter. Any one can guess as well as you. Giv us absolute, accurate, and scientific information, or the "ruined world" will think that your pretensions to knowledge are larger than your stock, like a huckster who has all his wares on the sidewalk.

And tell us also where is the great "knowledge which has been derived from the Bible." Did the church and the Bible invent the steamboat or the railroad? Did they harness the lightning or map out the courses of the planets? Did they photograph the sun or detect the coursing of the blood in the veins? Does the Bible hint at the rotundity of the earth, and did the church encourage its circumnavigation? Mr. Lee is probably too well versed in church history to need an answer to these questions. He knows that even the harmless fanning-mill was denounced as of the devil, and as contrary to the scriptural text that the wind bloweth when it listeth. He knows that telegraphy was derided; that the astronomers were all heretics in the eyes of his braggart church; that one of Servetus's heresies was the idea that the blood circulated through the system, and that Magellan was denounced as an impious man for daring to say he could sail around the world. Even the numerals by which Mr. Lee makes plain his propositions were invented by a nation that will all be damned. He knows that the Bible and the church hav never given man a single fact in science, and yet he deplores the loss of that knowledge!

We admit that Infidels hav denied supernaturalism and the existence of the Bible God, and we thank them for it. We are glad that men hav been kind enough to put out the fires of hell, brave enough to defy the infinit fiend who created it, and self-sacrificing enough to take away a heaven to gain which man must lose his manhood.

The church asserts that there is a God who exists outside of nature. Let the church prove it before she asks rational men and women to believe it. It has not been done, and cannot be done. There is no evidence to go upon.

And concerning God and the claim that he created the material universe, let us ask the church these questions: If the fact that the universe is here shows necessarily that something must hav caused it, would not the fact that God is here necessarily show that something must hav caused him?

If, because there is design exhibited in the universe, it must hav a designer, would not the same logic show that that designer had a designer also?

Something cannot come from nothing, Mr. Lee admits. In this admission he has been incautious. It destroys the whole Bible scheme of creation. He claims that God made the universe. What did he make it of? There was nothing in existence before its creation but God! Did he make it out of himself? He could not hav done this unless he lessened himself, for a part cannot be taken away and leave the whole remaining. Then he had to make it from nothing, which Mr. Lee says cannot be done.

Mr. Lee is very anxious to find the beginning. Bend your ear, Mr. Lee, and we will whisper the secret to you. The beginning never was. Matter is eternal, uncreated, and indestructible. It fills all space, and space is infinit. It does all, and is all. It changes forms and conditions, but can never be destroyed, as it was never created. Stop and think of this a moment, Mr. Lee. Reason logically, and see if there is any other conclusion you can arrive at. A little syllogism, common to most schoolboys, will aid you. The major premis you hav admitted to be correct. It is this: 1. Something (matter) cannot come from nothing. 2. Something (matter) is in existence now. Therefore, 3. This something (matter) always existed.

The scientific conception of the universe is that it always existed, and that matter has evolved all the living organisms now upon the earth, or anywhere else. The precise form and condition in which matter was when the first living creature was formed science does not pretend to say positivly. It was probably the protoplasmic. The difference between the scientists and the theologians is seen in this very plainly. The former are patiently investigating the subject, learning a little every day, but the theologian "chases his phantom folly" back to "God" and then stops, never seeing, or at least ignoring the fact, that the cause of God's existence needs an explanation ten times more than man's. Certainly it is more inexplicable that a being all-good, all-wise, and all-powerful, should create a universe and people it with strong beasts that liv upon weaker beasts, with men bound round with laws and environments that make it impossible for them to do otherwise than as they do, and then burn them forever for committing sins he created, and doing that which he made them do, than it is to locate the precise spot where the first protoplasmic drop evolved life.

The third proposition of the preacher is that Infidels propose to destroy the Bible. This is ridiculous. Against the Bible as a book Infidels would never raise a hand. What they object to is the making of it an idol, a fetich to worship, and burning and imprisoning men for not believing it. Infidels would put it on the shelf alongside of the Vedas, the Koran, and other religious books. If it is written by a God, let that God take care of it. It is not the oldest book in the world by any means, and when Mr. Lee makes this statement he takes advantage of the ignorance of his readers to make an assertion he would not dare make in a secular paper. In the pulpit and religious papers the ipse dixits of the ministers and writers must be taken. There is no argument, no appeal. Asserting that there are more copies of it printed than of any other book is no argument, although the Rev. Talmage used it as such. A lie is no less a lie because it is printed a million times, or ten or a hundred millions. Such an argument is ridiculous, though it may be the strongest one in favor of that ancient volume, which has not stood the test of three thousand years by some six or seven centuries, during which time it has been kicked around by councils, mutilated by priest, emended by revisers, corrected by scholars, and transformed by every doctrinarian into a crutch to support his own crankology. Infidels do not want to destroy such a valuable historical relic. They simply want to, and will, destroy the superstitions that like barnacles hav attached themselvs to it. Instead of there being no religious truth worth knowing not found in the Bible, it would be more correct to say that there is no teaching in it worth knowing which is not found in other religious works, without a tithe of the obscenity, coarseness, tyranny, and brutality of that much-abused volume.

To the last paragraph of the eminent divine Freethinkers would put in a general denial. They would blot Christianity out only as it is bad. Its history would be kept as an example, to draw information from, and as a lighthouse to warn philosophy from the rocky coast of authority. They would erase the signatures of blood it has stamped on every country it controled, and wash away with tears its footsteps of cruelty. Such institutions as the Inquisition and the nunneries and monasteries—pious brothels and prisons—Infidelity has no use for. The monumental graves of its saints might be of use to raise food on to support the wives and children of the Infidels now in English jails. Its churches could be lecture rooms, its schools changed to real schools and turned over to the state. With the hospitals in the hands of the Infidels, it would not be necessary to hav a fever according to John Calvin, or the small-pox according to John Wesley, before being taken in and cared for, and there will be very much less need of asylums when one great prolific cause of insanity is eradicated. We shall hear of fewer fathers and mothers murdering their babes through a religious desire to please God, and having to be taken care of by society to protect itself. This is not an age of saints and reverence. Only the fit and practical will survive. Let Christianity show its fitness before pleading for a reprieve from the sentence pronounced upon it. Its own ministers are singing its requiem. Why should not the funeral procede?

The Inefficiency of Christian Morality.

A writer in a religious paper last week attempted to show that in the present "drift from God" morality is in danger; that the loosening of religious ties will drive men back to barbarism and ruin, and that only in religion—re-binding to God—is there safety. Such sentiments, perhaps, are to be expected from the fossils of the church. They hold that "duty to God" is the highest aim. But duty to the unknown, it seems to us, is the last thing that should engage men's minds. We cannot affect "God" in any way, for either good or ill, and the first duty man owes is to himself and his fellows. It is the duty of every man to provide himself and those dependent upon him with a good, comfortable home, good clothes, good food, and to do this without making himself or wife or children slaves of work. It is the duty of everyone to obtain the best possible education they can. An educated Liberal man or woman finds recreation and consolation in intellectual pursuits, which of themselvs are calculated to advance material prosperity.

The ignorant followers of the church, like the Catholics, seek amusement at the corner saloon, clustering around the bar, telling obscene stories, drinking poor liquor, and squandering the little means they hav. Christianity has utterly failed to provide recreation attractiv to the masses. The churches are dull and devoted to teaching doctrins worse than false, and the desire evinced by pious bigots to drive people into them cannot obtain. They enact laws making it a crime to seek healthy amusement on Sunday, and what can not be obtained openly will be and is sought surreptitiously behind closed doors. If the Christians could hav their own way, no one could stir out of doors, unless to go to church, on Sunday. Healthy, reasonable, and moral amusements are forbidden. The museums and libraries are by law closed to those who can visit them on no other day. The consequence is seen in our crowded public courts, almshouses, and penitentiaries. Christianity is directly responsible for most of the crime committed. The church wields an all-potent influence over the masses from whose ranks the criminals are recruited, but it fails in any way to restrain them. All the preacher's time is spent in talking about another world. It is taught that the only reason why men should be honest in this world is that they may escape punishment in the next. But this will not do. The next is too far away. Its terrors do not restrain, and its pleasures are too unsubstantial. Every believer in Christianity thinks he can do as he pleases here, and, if he repents just before his final taking off, is as sure of heaven as though his life had been as moral as that of Socrates. The average evil-doer is satisfied that if he can get clear of retribution here, he can in some way wriggle out of it there. Frank James is a good Christian. He believes in the divinity of Christ, in the sufficiency of the atonement, and calls Ingersoll the champion evil-doer. But he is nevertheless one of the most brutal murderers in existence. The world needs something besides Christianity to make it honest and moral. It needs a philosophy which will restrain from wrong-doing. There being no orthodox heaven of rewards nor hell of punishment, it follows that actions must be measured and weighed in this world. Churchmen are continually complaining that Liberalism offers nothing in place of Christianity, but they might with as much reason complain of the physician who removes one disease for not substituting another. A mansion cannot be built on the site of a hovel until the hovel is torn down and the debris carted away. Religion—except in its broadest sense, as the expression of the emotional side of man—is not necessary. A system of ethics that shall be a guide to the feet of the young is necessary, but that is not found in any religion based on supernaturalism. All religions are subject to the same law that governs nations. All hav their periods of youth, of manhood, of decay. Christianity has entered upon the period of decay. The best minds are leaving it, and the world no longer sees, or thinks it sees, in it a solution of the social problems that are every day coming to the front. The intelligent masses are viewing it with distrust, and a sufficient number hav already discarded its dogmas to make a new philosophy, or system of ethics, a necessity. The religionists hav always persecuted the men who hav endeavored to teach goodness independent of the supernatural structure they are pleased to call God, and the latest effort they are making is to suppress the writings of the man who has really given the world a new system and guide which will stand the test of practical wear—John Stuart Mill. Consciously or unconsciously the progressiv world is coming to adopt the Utilitarian method of moral teaching. Utilitarianism furnishes a criterion of right and wrong, independent of sectarianism. Indeed, the Christian grievance against it is that it is rank Atheism, and Christians will never forgiv the man who shows that men can be good without a god. When their Bible has fallen all apart, and their religion is shown to be unhistorical, impossible, and false, they hav fallen back upon the Theistic fallacy that men must base morality at least upon authority, and they triumphantly ask, Where is the authority but in God? John Stuart Mill solved this, and their answer to Utilitarianism is a threatened prosecution of his publishers for blasphemy. When their greatest objection to Liberalism is removed, they would suppress the removers of the objection by brute force, and go on repeating the objection! What chance is there for philosophy when the philosophers are in jail? Let the brains of the world stay out of prison for a generation even, and Liberalism will evolve a system of ethics beside whose grandeur the selfishness of Christianity will be apparent to all the world.

Christianity may rightly be called a hap-hazard guide. Neither its premises nor its conclusions are right. It is based on a supposed duty man owes to a supposed deity, who it is supposed has placed him here, given him a supposititious revelation, telling him to be a good boy and get the stick of candy promised him sometime in the future. The trouble is, the candy dissolves, and then why should the boy be good? Such teaching is childish puerility, only fit for the days when the world was in pinafores.

The true basis of morality is the adaptation of our actions to promoting the general welfare and happiness of the world. The true criterion of right and wrong must be scientific or it cannot serve, and the first step toward a scientific morality is the collection of facts, the same as in physical science. It must be discovered what has in the past in all countries tended to make men honest and moral. "That which promotes the general happiness is right; that which lessens it is wrong." Christianity not only has not promoted the general welfare of the world, but it has tended directly the other way and produced discord and misery. Its sects are eternally warring with each other, and Christianity as a whole is warring with all other religions, many of which hav a record a hundred times cleaner than its own. Its devoutest believers hav been the worst persecutors. No one questions the deep convictions of Torquemada, Calvin, John Knox, and other worthies. They were sincere men, but their very sincerity made them cruel. Every Christian who acts up to the teaching of Jesus and the Bible must be a persecutor. They believe that if they can by imprisoning a man a few years in this world save him from an endless imprisonment, they are doing him a kindness. They believe that God will eternally burn all heretics hereafter, and the most natural thing in the world is for them to experiment a little on them here. Wherever it has gone Christianity has been a bane to progress, a perpetual barrier in the pathway of man.

Morality must be built on a much firmer foundadation than the Bible and the church furnish. These are being racked to pieces, and before many years the one will be relegated to the shelf, and the other will cease to exist. The only savior to be looked to is Science. Spasmodic morality will not do. The church and God are shifting, and new standards are being set up every day. It was once highly immoral to assert that the world is round. It is not quite so immoral to teach that to-day. In view of the transformations the church has undergone, it is impudence amounting almost to sublimity in the clergy to accuse the Freethinkers of loosening the bonds of morality.

From the Valley of the Shadow of Death.

AN ENGLISH SECULARIST'S LAMENT FOR HIS CHILD.

Ten feet down lies my blue-eyed and yellowed-haired Bruno, his little coffin covered with flowers and wet with my impassioned and bitter tears. The bright and happy child never had an illness except his last; he laughed and prattled in the warmth and love of his peaceful home. His heart never knew sorrow, and there is no mark of care on his sweet young brow. But, as I stood over his still open grave, I saw the upper layer of the yellow gravel which would be occupied, ere a long time pass, by an older, taller, and grimmer intruder, who had known much of the ups and downs of life, particularly of its downs, whose too sensitiv heart had been convulsed in agonizing bitterness, and whose brow bore the scars of many saber-strokes received in conflict with hostil fate. At what time I hav to join my Bruno in that upper layer of yellow gravel I cannot tell; but men who elect to lead a forlorn hope do not usually liv to a ripe old age.

My small estate in the Woking Necropolis is in the "unconsecrated" section; but, oh, how intensely consecrated it is to me! The cabalistic jargon of a hireling priest is pompous desecration. My Bruno's grave is sanctified by a father's agonizing cry and hallowed by a mother's tears. I hav only a few feet of ground "in perpetuity"—the Duke of Sutherland has thousands of acres; but his landed estate is not dearer to him than mine is to me. From his estate he has his magnificent income; from my estate I hav nothing. My small income is earned by work and worry. He may hunt the hare and the deer over his; I hav the privilege to weep over mine. I, a man of the people, care little for the delicate flowers with the learnedly-botanical names. But over the tomb of my child shall flourish the flowers that smiled up into my own eyes when I was a child among the Galloway moors. Over the little grave the light green fronds of the fern shall contrast with the purple bloom of the heather. There shall grow the daisies I was wont to gather in my pinafore, and the bonnie blue-bell shall whisper to me of the blue eyes of my Bruno. And there, by that little mound, in the long Sunday afternoons of summer may I lie, my brain aloft, grappling with unraveled mystery, my heart underneath in the grave.

Several Christians, and even one or two skeptics, hav written to me to ask whether it would not be better for me to believe in "God" and "immortality" like them, seeing that, if these turn out to be verities, I should hav the disadvantage, and, if they turn out to be mythical, even then the believer would be in as good a position as I. For the Christians who hav tried to comfort me I entertain only feelings of kindness and gratiude; but for this calculation-against-emergencies doctrin of theirs they must pardon me if I write in bitter scorn. In the first place, I cannot believe or disbelieve simply by an effort of the will. I cannot help believing anything that recommends itself to my reason; I cannot, even if I would, believe anything that is beyond or contrary to the criterion of reason. Susposing I were to be damned for not believing that I walked upon my head, wearing my hat on my feet, could even the threat of perdition force me to believe that I did so? If I were to be "saved" for believing that I walk upon my feet and wear my hat on my head, I could not help believing it, whether salvation depended upon it or not. Giv proof, and I cannot help believing; withhold proof, and no threats can make me believe, although they may frighten me into being a hypocrit with a pretense of belief.

But, apart from this difficulty, the fashion of stating the position implies that the Christian himself is in doubt, for he alleges: "If immortality should turn out to be an illusion, I am no worse off than you; if it should prove to be a verity, I am infinitly better off." This is simply reducing the "never-dying soul" to the level of goods in a little huckster-shop, and making "God" the agent or manager in an Anti-Hell-Fire Insurance Company. If it turn out that you hav no "soul," good and well; if it turn out that you hav one, it will be kept impervious to the combustion of ignited brimstone and the borings of that strange helminthological specimen, "the worm that never dies." If I were convinced my "soul" were an animistic entity instead of a somatic phenomenon, I should not thus, in regard to it, behave as a pettifogging hucksterer; if anywhere I could find a god, I should select for him some avocation more compatible with the exalted rank of deity than that of a humble Anti-Hell-Fire Insurance agent—an inky knuckled office-hack, a thing of post mortem premiums and dividends and bonuses.

Some hav sent me tracts, rubbish leaves at sixpence per hundred, dealing with "Nell the Converted Barmaid" and "Little Jack Smith and his Immortal Soul." I hav smiled kindly even over these, and calculated how it would be possible to get down to the mental plane of the senders, and of their notions of ratio and magnitude, and their idea of the length and steepness of the road by which I traveled to anti-theology, the road on which I walked to Freethought, through many earnest years, but by which it is impossible to return.

Others, meaning kindly, hav advised me to lay hold on the "Christian scheme of salvation," to secure a reunion with the loved and lost. I am not so abandoned that I am prepared to prostrate myself before—

Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum.

The Ulysses of science has bored out even the one red eye that was wont to leer in the middle of the narrow and sinister forehead of the Christian Polyphemus. Did deity damn the world because his poor creature, man, ate an apple? Are the majority of the dead in endless torment because that apple was eaten? Christianity says, Yes; and to this Christianity you send me for comfort. For eating an apple against special orders to the contrary, a fretful washerwoman would hardly whip her child of two years old; and am I to believe that over the eating of this apple the Christian God tortures, and will torture, untold billions of the human race? I state plainly that I regard with unmitigated hate and horror a conception so diabolical. I am aware, of course, of the new-fangled trimming and trickery by which the woman and the apple and the snake and the god are all set down as allegorical. But if Adam and the fall are only an allegory, than did Christ and the redemption require to be literal? If the world were not lost by the apple, what need had it to be saved by the cross? The Eden and the Calvary incidents hang inextricably together; if the former be not true, the latter does not require to be true. If the former be true, I desire for mine and me that I be removed as far as possible from the paternal fiend, Jehovah; if the latter be true, I decline to accept for mine and me an immoral redemption of blood and cruelty, based upon the fiendish conception of the pleasures of the guilty (guilty of eating an apple!) being purchased by the suffering of the innocent. In my sorrow hav you nothing better to offer me than this wicked mockery, this incredible, monstrous, and immoral myth?

Even if heaven were worth the going to, I should demur to going to it upon such terms—through the death of an innocent person, and by a belief in that person's vicarious death, whether or not such belief should be supported by proof and justified by reason. But heaven is not worth going to. I care not that my lost one should hav a crown and a harp and a pair of white wings, and that he should keep screaming out day and night among the celestial beasts of the apocalyptic menagerie.

Even if it were a joy for me to believe in heaven's mad compound of Booth's Salvation Army and Wombwell's menagerie, what proof should I hav that my child was there? According to the teachings of Jesus, the heavy majority of mankind go to perdition. What right should I hav to assume, what right has any Christian to take it for granted, that those dear to him are in heaven? If we are to credit the pious texts on Christian tombstones, all the departed ones hav gone to glory; and yet this cannot be, for narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it; and broad is the way which leadeth to destruction, and many there be who enter thereat. Therefore, if I hav not the Christian "consolation" that my child is in a state of felicity, I can balance against it the fact that I hav not the Christian doubt that he is in a state of misery. My want of hope in the Christian heaven is more than compensated for by my absence of dread of the Christian hell.

Then, what know I of eschatological design? I say with Carlyle: "What went before and what will follow me I regard as two black curtains which hang down at the two extremities of human life, and which no living man has yet drawn aside. Many hundreds of generations hav already stood before them with their torches, guessing anxiously what lies behind. On the curtain of futurity many see their own shadows, the forms of their passions enlarged and put in motion. They shrink in terror at this image of themselvs. Poets, philosophers, and founders of states hav painted this curtain with their dreams, more smiling or more dark as the sky above them was cheerful or gloomy; and their pictures deceive the eye when viewed from a distance. Many jugglers, too, make profit of this our universal curiosity; by their strange mummeries they hav set the outstretched fancy in amazement. A deep silence reigns behind this curtain; no one once within will answer those he has left without; all you can hear is a hollow echo of your question, as if you shouted into a chasm." I trustfully leave Nature's at present impenetrable mystery unprofaned by my empirical touch. Of nature I know more than I do of Jehovah; and I trust and love the former rather than the latter. I writhe under the severed ties of love and friendship; but I dread not death. Before I was conceived nature took care of the atoms which now compose my ego; I can trust her to take care of those atoms when my ego is no more.

I bow to the inevitable. Who does not do so is a madman. No bitter and agonized remonstrance of mine can arrest winter with its biting frost, or keep back summer with its sweltering noon, and no shriek of mortal suffering blunt the edge of the scythe of death. But nature, although inexorable in her legislativ, is merciful in her executiv. If all that we suffer were cumulativ, if present afflictions were hurled upon us without the possibilities of past afflictions being assuaged, existence for man would be impossible. But nature does not exterminate our race with accumulated misery. If in the one hand she carries the chalice of agony, in the other she bears the nepenthe of time and the anodyne of death. She will never make my suffering greater than I can bear. When it becomes unbearable she takes me to her cold but kindly bosom, and allays the fever of my reeling brain by filling my skull with the calm and throbless mold of the tomb. With the nepenthe of time and the anodyne of death she makes the odds all even. In my childhood I hav clambered high up the mountain's brow, and beheld with terror where yesterday's lightning had split the granit rocks asunder, a ghastly and hideous rent. But five years afterward I again clambered up the mountain's side. The sharp, raw edges of the levin-wound had been rounded off by summer's sun and winter's frost, and the hideous rent had been partly filled up with moss and lichen; the heather already half hid the gash that had been made by the knife of the lightning, and the green and succulent ferns had all but concealed the stab which had been inflicted by the bolt of the thunder. I look forward to mercy and solace. I am a link in the universal chain. Nature will not medicate to the rent side of the mountain, and find no balm in her mighty Gilead for the agonized heart of the man!

The man must be consumed with personal vanity who deems his little life worth eternal prolongation. I feel that mine is not worth it. All of my egoity I desire to be preserved is the memory of some little kindness I may hav done to the weak and helpless, some little straw I may hav removed from the burden of ignorance which bends down the head and shoulders of humanity.

"What hallows ground where heroes sleep?
'Tis not the sculptured pile you heap;
But strew his ashes to the wind
Whose sword or pen has served mankind,
And is he dead whose glorious mind
Lifts thine on high?
To liv in souls we leave behind
Is not to die."

Life and death are only differentiations of indestructible atoms and molecules. Death implies a different combination, not an annihilation of essence. Morbfiic influences may so change my neurine ganglia as to annul my consciousness of relativity to the subjectiv cosmos and its objectiv hypothesis. What is known as the life of the ego may cease to be; but there is no possibility of my losing my share in the anima mundi. The significance of this is, at present, imperfectly understood; but our positiv knowledge in regard to it is widening year by year. We hav, at length, so far directed our vision from heaven as to find out that earth is no mere inert bulk, but is an activ mass, charged with the to us, at present, esoteric potentialities which are manifested in the various forms of motion known as electricity, magnetism, light, heat, and chemical action. What we so pompously style our mental powers or our soul are, undoubtedly, correlated with—or, more properly, are simply a specialization of—the material forces of the universe. Since the Newtonian philosophy first made itself heard in regard to the inherent energy of every atom of this material world, the animistic hypothesis has been superseded and rendered unnecessary; and till we know more than we do of the potentialities of matter, we are not in a position—

"To say where Death the specter grins,
And where he's not and Life begins."

To the individual, what we call death, and which religion has invested with harrowing anxieties and inexpressible horrors, is neither more nor less than a loss of conscious egoity, and that we lose every night when we go sleep. There is nothing dreadful in death, per se; the dread springs from your standing above ground and allowing your mind to speculate upon the prospect of your lying below ground dead.

If somewhere outside the pale of human comprehension there should exist a benevolent and magnanimous god, I hav thought honestly, even if erroneously, and hav done my best; and I fear not to fall into his hands. If the malevolent and pusillanimous Jehovah exist, I hav nothing to expect, and I would not sue for his favors, even if I knew how. But of a god or of gods I know nothing; and my life is, I trust, better spent than in searching for them. I feel I hav some noble instincts, quite independently of the prospect of their bringing me a reward in heaven; I am conscious I hav some faults and failings, quite independently of the prospect of having to do penance for them in the pit without a bottom. Virtue is its own exceeding great reward, and vice carries with it, inherently, its own condign punishment. The roses bloom under my feet, and the tenebrious clouds overhead hav a golden fringe, even as I walk, as I do at present, through THE VALLEY OF THE SHADOW OF DEATH. For he who means no evil has no evil to fear.

"Preserve the dignity of man
With soul erect,
And trust the Universal Plan
Will all protect."

Sectarian Appropriations.

From the Democratic Advance.

It has been the practice of an institution called the Roman Catholic Protectory, having lands and buildings located northeasterly of the Harlem river, to apply annually to the legislature for an appropriation from the state moneys. The basis of this demand is that juvenil delinquents are at times committed to, and received by, the Protectory. The State and city both hav largely contributed to the procurement of the lands, the erection of buildings, and the support of the inmates.

In fact it is believed that the valuable property now held by the corporators has been principally the gift of the municipal authorities. After having been refused by the legislature of last year the donation then persistently demanded, the claim has been renewed at the present session. The committee reporting the appropriation bill declined to place the objectionable item in the bill. When in Committee of the Whole the matter was brought before the House by a motion to insert the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars.

Several members opposed the motion on the ground of being in violation of the provision of the Constitution forbidding the donation of public money to sectarian institutions. Finally, on a promis to place on file a letter wherein it is declared that if the proposed appropriation is made, such demands will not be in future presented, the amount of twenty thousand dollars has been inserted. It is also said that at some time it is intended that this institution shall be transferred to the state.

We hav and do object to this use of the public money. It is not because the institution is controled by one religious denomination more than if controled by any other. It is because it is openly, and declared to be, sectarian, and intended to promote the purposes of one religious body to the exclusion of the advantage of all others.

"Roman Catholic" it is, and doubtless will be. It was formed for the promotion of the objects of that particular denomination, and will be so continued. As such it can never be accepted by the state as one of its institutions until the state itself shall hav adopted the Roman Catholic church as the state church, and civil and religious liberty shall hav been overthrown.

We repeat that it is not because the institution is Roman Catholic that we oppose the making of this appropriation. It is because it is sectarian. We absolutely and positivly object to all taxation, all levies of money on taxpayers, for the purpose of the same being devoted to, and expended in, the private management and support of institutions held and controled by sectarian powers, whether such be of the Protestant Episcopal, Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Universalist, Quaker, or any other sect or denomination. If this be "bigotry," we invite our enemies to make the most of it.

Just at this time there is a bill pending before the legislature aimed at an institution for the reformation of juvenil delinquents. This institution is non-sectarian. It had done good service before the Roman Catholic Protectory was even thought of. Among the names of its official board are included those of honored members of the Roman Catholic church, and no fault has been alleged in its administration, yet it has been assailed by Romanistic methods, with a view to the promotion of sectarian purposes.

We sincerely hope that no sectarianism will be allowed in any institution receiving money from the public treasury; or, otherwise to state it, that no money from the public coffers will be allowed to go into the funds of any institution held under control of sectarianism. On this we take broad ground—it is as to all public moneys and as to all sectarian institutions!

It has been suggested to us that party ends render the making of this appropriation desirable. We deny it. That party which serves the people most faithfully and justly will reap the greatest success. Every dollar of public money devoted to sectarian purposes in the state of New York will cost more than one vote to the party ascendant and making the appropriation. The objection is the same in principle, whether the sum be twenty cents or fifty thousand dollars. As well giv the one as the other; and where does the legislature get its authority to giv away the property of the individual citizen?

At the present time the popular demand in Great Britain is that state and church shall be divorced. Shall they be united in America? In our respect for the conscientious convictions of every man—believing it to be the right of each to enjoy perfect freedom of faith and form—we desire to treat religious matters in the best spirit and most respectful language, and regret that we hav felt constrained herein to refer with some particularity to one denomination, when our opposition to the misappropriation of public money would apply equally, and to all, under similar circumstances.

We desire, in this connection, to add that it ill becomes, in our judgment, the organ of any religious denomination to attempt to force the success of measures on legislativ bodies by the use of threats, such as those in the New York (Roman) Catholic Review, when it declares: "We wish to say that there are enough men interested in the passage of this measure (so called freedom of worship bill) to secure the political damnation of any man or any party that will not do us full justice. We hav already marred the political future of more than one bigot, and we advise all others to note the fact. We want as nearly a unanimous vote as can be had."

As an exponent and defender of democratic principles we feel justified in asserting that, as a matter of policy—if this tribute must be paid by the Democratic party, as implied by the Catholic Review—it would, in our opinion, be wisest for the organization to pay it from the treasury of the Democratic State Central Committee rather than vote this tax on the electors of the state. As a matter of principle the Democracy had better maintain its motto of "equal and exact justice to all men" than to suffer the consequences of a departure therefrom.

If the hierarchy cannot support this Roman Catholic institution, let it be transferred to "state" control, and then and thereby placed on a footing with other institutions. It is a selfish idea of Democracy which will lead an honest and intelligent advocate of "civil and religious liberty" as the "glory of man" to accept defeat at this time for the sake of a few paltry dollars which ought to be raised by other, and voluntary, means if actually needed.

It would be a profitable investment for the Republican managers to pay more than the desired amount of appropriation to hav forced from their present legislativ majority a favorable response to this exaction. Is it possible this is one of the devices of the enemy? The very conditions under which it is alleged this last appropriation item has been placed in the legislativ bill is an admission of its being wrong, and its granting will be regarded an evidence of weakness of principle yielding to importunate solicitation mingled with insolent threatenings. The bill passed under these circumstances, the prompting will be attributed not to charity but to cowardice. When this question has received the thoughtful consideration of intelligent Roman Catholics, we believe that they will be as ready to assume the position which has been taken in this article as other of our readers. We again repeat that the Democratic Advance is opposed to union of church and state affairs, and we express our firm conviction that, in view of public sentiment and the conditions of organizations, no political party can afford to become responsible for the making of appropriations of public funds to the maintenance of avowedly sectarian institutions, though professedly charitable and correctional, when it is required to be done at the cost of the people and through governmental instrumentality.

Roman Catholics hav objected to paying taxes in support of public schools not under sectarian control. Shall non-sectarians and religious people of other denominations be compelled to furnish means for sustaining institutions for the Roman Catholic church? Is this justice?

Reforms That Should Be.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav lately read so many articles in your paper relating to progress and reform that I'm induced to say, in the language of the Society of Friends, The spirit moveth me to speak. I shall, however, be very brief, and merely suggest, and leave your correspondents to criticise and discuss.

Prison Reform.—Punishment should be reformatory, and criminals should be educated to labor; in other words, the punishment for crime should be labor, and as an incentiv to reform, and to produce habits of labor, the prisoner should receive all the profits over and above his maintenance. The contract system should be abolished, and the state dispose of prison-made goods. No prisoner after having served his time should be sent out in the world penniless, which is demoralizing of itself.

Intemperance.—Prohibition is tyranny; excessiv charge for license is exclusiv, partial, and giving an aristocratic character to the business. Liquor should be free to all to sell, and the civil damage act should be made to apply upon the principle of the "kill-sheep-dog law." To explain: All damages arising from intoxication should fall on the liquor dealer of the city or district. If a man become intoxicated, a fixed sum should be imposed on the liquor sellers of the district, and not on the person intoxicated. The names of all persons found intoxicated should be published. To be brief, I would make it to the interest of the liquor dealer to keep men sober, and also to keep guard over his neighbor in the same business. A civil damage act, properly enforced, would reform the seller and the drinker.

Taxation.—All taxation should be based on that which a man realizes out of the labor of others. For instance, if I hav made by my own labor one thousand bushels of wheat, or one thousand dollars, and I loan this to my neighbor for sixty bushels, or sixty dollars, it's the sixty bushels, or dollars, that should be taxed; and in this country there is sufficient of that obtained from others' labor to bear all the burdens of government, and amount to but a small per centage at that. In brief, a graduated income tax, both on real and personal property, and so graduated on unproductiv land as to ultimately destroy holding and buying for speculation. Rentals to be limited; assessed incomes or rents in place of assessed values, with right to appeal, as at present. The precedent to limit rentals is already established, by limit to interest, railroad fares, etc.

Financial.—A domestic circulating medium (or money), controled and issued by government exclusivly, to hav no intrinsic or speculativ value. Gold and silver to be coined, or otherwise, for international purposes, paying balances of trade, thereby becoming commercial regulators without affecting our internal financial condition—like a governor to an engin, when checking importations it would increase exportation, as the governor increases or diminishes the steam as required.

Paterson, March 20, 283. JNO. J. HAVILAND.

Government—What Is It?

In endeavoring to answer this question properly, it will be necessary first to inquire, What is the duty that each and every one owes to themselvs? And that our position may be clear and plain to each and all, we would say that duty demands that we put forth all our energies to unfold and perfect our own individuality. And the best means we hav at our command to accomplish this is to labor in harmony with nature, reason, and good common sense.

Nature has implanted in our orgauisms the necessity as well as the desire to "eat, drink, and be merry," also a desire to know "how to eat, what to eat, and when," in order to hav the most real enjoyment, as well as to secure the proper nourishment to keep up the physical strength, mental vigor, and moral and spiritual growth, or development. And the same may be said of drink.

This duty is basis, as regards ourselvs. Then it is necessary that we hav clothes to wear to keep us warm, and houses to liv in to protect us from the heat of summer, the cold of winter, and the storms of both.

When these are all provided, then we can begin to look for true enjoyment by proper association, viz., that which is given to us, mental culture, and spiritual enlightenment.

To secure these we must hav eyes to see, ears to hear, a head to properly interpret what we see and hear, that the heart may be kept "warm, tender, and true" to our highest convictions of the rights and duties we owe to others as well as to ourselvs, and sufficient spiritual light to discern what they owe to us as fellow-travelers along the interminable pathway of life.

This being accomplished, what more do we need to make us fit subjects of a government that looks to nature for its pattern, rendering justice to all by asking no more for ourselvs than enough to unfold and perfect the possibilities that nature has endowed us with in harmony with her immutable laws?

This, then, in brief, is government: To obey the laws of nature, as far and as fast as we can interpret them in harmony with our highest light.

If by experience our light, so-called, proves to be darkness (or violation of her immutable laws) there is a penalty attached that none can escape or evade paying, no matter how wise, learned, or sincere they may be.

This, then, is true government, viz., To follow where nature leads in harmony with our best light, born of our own experience and that of others.

MRS. JULIA C. FRANKLIN.

THE newspapers and periodicals of all kinds issued in the United States and territories now reach the imposing total of 11,196. This is an increase of 585 in twelve months. Taking the states one by one, the newspaper growth in some is very considerable. The present total in New York state, for instance, is 1,399—a gain of 80 in the past year. The increase in Pennsylvania is 48, the existing number being 943. Nebraska's total grew from 175 to 201, and Illinois's from 890 to 904 A year ago Massachusetts had 420 papers; now the number is 438. In Texas the new papers outnumbered the suspensions by 8, and Ohio now has 738 papers instead of 692. The most remarkable change has occurred in the territories, in which the daily papers hav grown from 43 to 63, and the weeklies from 169 to 243—Dakota being the chief area of activity. The number of monthlies throughout the country grew from 976 to 1,034, while the dailies leaped from 996 to 1,062. The figures given above are exclusiv of Canada, which possesses a total of 606. It is interesting to note that the newly-settled regions of the Canadian Northwest are productiv of newspapers as well as of wheat, for the number of journals issued in Manitoba was nearly doubled during the year.

Letters from Friends.

EUREKA, March 12, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find within $10, for which please forward "Bible Myths and their Parallels in Other Religions," the "Brain and the Bible," and to the Monument Fund apply $5. Yours, G. L. GREEN.

PORTLAND, March 7, 283.

MR. EDITOR: We are holding Liberal meetings every Sunday at 2 P.M. and 7 in the evening, and if you hav any circulars you would like distributed, I will do so if you will sead them to me.

Yours truly, C. H. SAUNDERS.

OSSEO, March 17, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: As the time of my subscription for the paper has expired, I herewith send you $5—$2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, $1.50 for Mr. Bennett's fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," as I hav the other three, and $1 for Mr. Bennett's monument. CHRIST. SCHREIBER.

PETERBORO, March 18, 1883.

MR. EDITOR; I don't feel that you can send THE TRUTH SEEKER for $2.50, and I send you $3. Put me down $5 for the Monument Fund. Notify me when the money is wanted. Believe me that I feel the loss of D. M. Bennett as much as those who hav expressed their feelings in writing. GEORGE GEER.

EDEN, March 15, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5—$2 50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, $1.50 for the last volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and $1 toward the erection of a monument over our hero—a slab to point his place of rest, but whose monument is his life and labors. The grand old man is gone, but the products of his master-mind can never die. For years he has sown the seeds of truth; the result is an army of truth seekers marching on to aid in the emancipation of the slaves of superstition.

Yours truly, W. N. KELLOGG.

WEST POINT, March 15, 1883.

MRS. M. W. BENNETT AND E. MACDONALD: Please find inclosed $4—$2 50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $1.50 for the Bennett monument. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from the first number, and the Investigator for forty years. I am now on the shady side of seventy; cannot much longer help you. All I do I consider a duty. I wish that many may keep with you. Believe me that I, with the many of your and the late Mr. Bennett's friends, regret much the sad bereavement that has befallen us. The future is left to the living. Keep a good conscience and liv sacred to duty. Truly yours, JOSEPH ATKINS.

PALATKA, March 19, 283.

MRS. M. W. BENNETT: D. M. Bennett cannot be forgotten while humanity livs. To numberless generations yet unborn his name will be the synonym of all that is honest, earnest, energetic, industrious, thoughtful, loving, sympathetic, loyal, and manly. I am amongst those who feel sure that "our loss is his gain," and, therefore, while I sorrow with those who must miss his genial presence, I rejoice that his opportunities for righteous work, and therefore for comforting and happifying himself, are much greater than when confined to mundane spheres.

I inclose you $2.50 for subscription for 1883 and $1 50 for fourth volume of "Round the World."

With sisterly affection and the largest wish for the prosperity and success in its mission of our dear old TRUTH SEEKER, I am for the truth in all subjects,

MARY A. VORE,

HARVARD, March 13, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Please find inclosed $3.50—2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $1 for the Bennett monument. I say, hav a noble monument erected to his memory, and if more is needed, it shall be forthcoming. I received the first, or one of the first, TRUTH SEEKERS that was published in Illinois, and hav taken the paper ever since. I hav taken quite a number of papers, and I consider THE TRUTH SEEKER one of the best.

It used to do me good to sit down and hav a good talk with an orthodox minister, but I don't hav that chance any more, for they giv me a wide berth. They call me an Infidel, but hard names don't hurt very much. If the Freethinkers and Liberals wish to build a hall to the memory of the lamented Bennett, we say all right, and the necessary cash on my part shall be forthcoming.

I do no not know what some men are made of, or where they hav lived all their lives, to sit and hear preachers tell the people that the present floods at Cincinnati and along the Ohio River were sent by God to cause the people to think about him instead of attending to their every-day business.

I hav read somewhere that it is the fool that saith there is no God, and I think I can safely say it is a fool that cannot see that those floods were truly in harmony with the great laws and principles of nature, for when the rains came and the snow melted, the water would try and find its level. What simpletons! to tell us in one breath that their God and his laws are immutable, and in the next hav their God rendering special blessings and sending floods on the people to let them know that he is God, and that his children had better attend to their knitting before they raise his ire; but there is none so blind as those that won't see. ABRAM CANNARK.

MR. EDITOR: I confess to be a delinquent in the Bennett monument Fund contribution, and hence accept the prompting of the chairman. He is exceedingly modest in his invitation to take stock in such a laudable enterprise. It is greatly to be hoped that it will be "the expression of a popular sentiment," and that no Liberal (who can afford it) will fail to take stock—at least one share while the books are open, and not afterward regret that their names are not in the long list of stock-holders. This will be a sort of index to all Liberals, an introduction when meeting as strangers in every town and city, if Liberals are disposed to advertise in this way. A thing that can be done at any time is too apt to be postponed. Would it not be well to fix a time for closing the subscription, and insert that notice in every issue till the time expires? Inclosed you will find my contribution ($5). ELIJAH MYRICK.

ALLIANCE, March 18, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 50 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I cannot well do without it, and I hope to be able to lend a helping hand to keep up the good work that THE TRUTH SEEKER is so ably doing. Much as we mourn the loss of our lamented Bennett, we feel that the paper is is in good hands and will be conducted on the same broad principles that he intended it to be. I feel that we are very fortunate to hav it left in the hands of one who has so ably taken care of its interests in the past when its founder was in prison, and when he was absent to Europe, and on his round-the-world voyage. Taking all in all, I think the outlook is very encouraging. So let every true Liberal stand by THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am sorry to see that a few are so narrow as to be fault-finding. I should scorn to be the first enter a complaint against the paper that metes out through its columns, to all sides, more justice than any other paper in the land. Yours truly, CARRIE E. WEIR.

CHICAGO, March 16, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: As one of those who mourn the early taking off of our much-esteemed friend and your beloved husband, I hav thus long been silent so far as transmitting to you the realization of our loss, simply because it could be but a repetition of the sympathetic grief that was pouring in upon you from all quarters; whilst in each and all of these I've seen no word of appreciation stronger than could be my own; no expression of grief in which I did not fully share. Still, not only hope and faith, but knowledge, comes to assure us that this great change called death is but the spirit-birth, as those gone before do often come with words of cheer and facts which cannot be thrust aside. Therefore let us trust that the time is not distant when opportunity will be given for D. M. Bennett to reveal his identity from over the mystic river.

I inclose herewith but $2—$1 for the Monument Fund and $1 to apply on subscription.

Yours truly, MRS. P. LILLIBRIDGE.

LIGHT, MORE LIGHT.

WEST FARMINGTON, O., March 11, M S. 35.

MR. EDITOR: I feel just like pitching into somebody this morning, and it might as well be Brother Ridenger, as anybody else. In his article in reply to Brother Hale he opened up a live, practical question which I wish to notice briefly.

Brother Ridenger asks: "Does our government hang persons for revenge?" I answer emphatically, Yes! We are not an enlightened nation yet. "Capital punishment" is a relic of barbarism, and the execution of the law but satisfies a blood-thirsty, revengeful spirit. Now see here, brother, if you are a logical man, it will take but two minutes to convince you that hanging is wrong. The object of law is to protect the innocent, not to punish the offender; oh, no! not at all. A person has committed murder, he is jailed, and manacled, if need be; and, when thus secured, the innocent are safe, as far as he is concerned; then, sir, the object of the law is fulfilled; and, whenever the government hangs that individual, it is guilty of wilful, cold-blooded murder. To kill is murder. To deliberately hang a man is as much of a murder as to shoot him the dead hour of night. Again, what good does it do? It does not restore the murdered man, nor benefit his family. What is it, then, but revenge? When he is in a dungeon the innocent are safe. Oh! well, its living Judaism over again. An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, and blood for blood. That's it. In this respect we hav not advanced a whit beyond the days of Moses. Let those liv back there who wish to, but they shall not take me with them. You ask of Brother Hale "how that God of his can right the wrongs of the outraged hereafter." As to Brother Hale's God doing it, I can't say. I hav not got any God. Brother Ridenger, I am a Spiritualist, but there is none of the orthodox Calvinistic doctrin about me, I assure you. Now it's like this. Suppose I steal your horse, sell him, use the money, then die (as it's called) without making restitution. Well, sir, that will hav to be righted in the next sphere of life. You must be made whole. I may not pay you in cash when you come over, but is there no way I can help you, only to pay you in dollars? I think so. I would hav to help you until you were fully compensated. That would not be revenge, but simple justice. Eternal justice must be done.

BOURBONNAIS GROVE, March 14, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Why are Liberals so slow about adopting the new calendar? I think it is the most important move ever made by Freethinkers. And I for one would like to see it at the head of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I was very much interested in Mr. James Hale's God, not as a being of great intrinsic value, but as a curiosity; it has few if any equals. I would like to ask some of our Spiritualist friends a question or two. Perhaps they hav been asked before, but I hav not seen them. If the Darwin theory is true (which most intelligent Freethinkers admit) at what time in man's development did he become a spiritual animal? If spirits advance in knowledge after leaving the body, why do they not tell us something that no one knows? Why don't they make us acquainted with some fact in science? It seems to me that some of those spirits forty-five or fifty-thousand years old ought to be pretty well posted. I believe that ghosts and gods are alike, neither better or wiser than their makers. WM. H. KNOX.

GRAND ISLAND, March 16, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: It givs me much pleasure to read the kind letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER from our friends in all parts of the country, and to know that we hav so many truth seekers ready to do honor to our beloved brother, in furnishing the means to raise a monument and hall that shall be dedicated to the memory of our departed friend. I never met our gallant truth-seeker hero, but, from reading his many letters, I came to look upon him as almost a part of myself, if I may be allowed to use the expression; or, to be better understood, he always seemed to utter my sentiments, and I got to look upon him (though always separated by distance) as truly a brother. Language can't express the disgust I feel for those base characters that hastened his death by their diabolism, their malignity, and fiendish brutality. Can I ever respect that old monstrosity (called the church) that stamps out intellect, gets in the way of science, denies the right of free speech, tortures great men, sends philosophers to prison because she is not allowed to send them to the stake or to the scaffold, and allies herself with the worst forms of despotism to be found upon the face of the earth? No! May my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I ever cease to expose her weakness. How long! oh, how long, must we be obliged to sacrifice our Bennetts upon her blood-stained altars?

Truth seekers, let us bury the hatchet, and tolerate each other's short-comings. Don't let Spiritualism, Materialism, prohibition, or anything else divide us, but send our shots faster and heavier into that monster that denies us the right to use the brains that nature has given us.

Circumstances forbid me sending my mite just now, but will do so when the shaft gets started.

Yours truly, WALTER SIMONDS.

WOODHULL, March 25, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: It is evident from the discussion on the Prohibition question great men differ, and greater the men the more they differ. "What," says one, "is prohibition?" Please giv me space to make a few remarks upon this interesting question.

First, I will say prohibition is the foundation of all just laws, To prohibit and prevent that which is injurious to community is the essence of law; when applied to the drinking of intoxicating liquors it means the abolishing of its use as now indulged.

When applied to the small-pox, yellow-fever, and and other contagious diseases, these pests are prohibited from injuring the community by quarantine laws by which infected vessels are prohibited from landing, the life and health of the community being in danger, and the right and privilege of the crew to come ashore is by law prohibited. Here lies the justice and necessity of prohibitory laws—the interest of communities are protected at the expense of individual rights.

If the result of drinking intoxicating drinks is not injurious to communities, a prohibitory law would be wrong and unjust. If injurious, it would be just and right, and of necessity should exist.

"But who shall decide?" This depends upon the kind of government we liv under. In republican governments, where the ruling power is vested in the people, the necessity of all laws is determined by the majority. To claim individually the rights and privileges of the minority over the rights and privileges of the majority is opposed to our government.

As for the arguments of the two parties boiled down to their logical essence, it is this: Shall men be prohibited from getting drunk to their own injury and to the injury of community? The prohibitionist says yes, and his opponent no, and givs his reasons, claiming by taking away a man's privilege to get drunk he is robbed and swindled out of the sacred right to select his own drink, and this sacred right is the same as the right and privilege to drink tea or coffee.

If the privilege to get drunk were not inseparably connected with the privilege of drinking intoxicating drinks, the anti-prohibitionist would hav an argument. But inasmuch as he cannot sustain the right of drinking intoxicating drinks without sustaining the privilege of getting drunk, logically he advocates drunkenness; yet he abhors drunkenness. In this drunkards do the same, and we ask where the difference is—he advocates the right to drink and the drunkard drinks?

Where is the consistency in abhorring drunkenness and at the same time advocating that which produces it? The prohibitionist bases his argument upon the rights of community upon the same principle an individual is prohibited from burning his own house if there is a probability of endangering the rights of community. The anti-prohibitionist bases his argument upon individual rights, Which party is the more consistent?

As for prohibition in towns, cities, and states, it amounts to but little. So long as our government grants the right to import, make, buy, sell, and drink liquor and use it to raise national revenue out of, we will be cursed with drunkenness and all the evils arising therefrom.

To prevent drunkenness by advocating temperate drinking has been practiced since the days of Noah —some 4,000 years—and what has it accomplished? The people in the nineteenth century hav just commenced to see the necessity of prohibition, and I propose this as the main point at issue, Is prohibition necessary for the welfare and good of our nation, morally, physically, and financially? Giv the use of intoxicating drink credit for all the good and benefit arising from its use where no substitute can fill its place, and charge it with all the evils arising from its use, morally, physically, and financially; open up the facts in the case, and present our true condition as a people so that the necessity can be seen. Let the point of reform be national prohibition, the same as the abolishing of slavery and the prohibition of polygamy. The people in whom the power of rule is vested are responsible on all these questions, and this generation is responsible for the welfare of the next. Yours, ISAAC PADEN.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Language cannot express our profound grief and sorrow for your irreparable loss, but tears of sympathy giv us some relief. Like Brother Monroe, we trust that "coming suns mav soften the anguish of your lonely spirit, and dispel the dark clouds that shut from your weeping eyes the prospect of better days."

As our loss is his infinit gain, let us try to be resigned and prepared to meet him where the weary are forever at rest, and the storms of life all terminate in an everlasting calm.

Please accept the following token of sympathy:

MARY'S ADDRESS TO HER DEPARTED HERO.

Pledge of a love as pure and deep
As ever thrilled in mortal breast,
I would not, could I, break thy sleep,
Recall thee from the couch of rest,
Where thou art now in peace reclining,
A stranger to the world's repining.

Noble and grand was thy career,
'Mid life's events—hopes, joys, and gloom;
And much as I could wish thee here,
My soul's dark sorrow to illume,
In loneliness I'd rather languish,
Than hav thee partner in my anguish.

If kindred spirits would allow
Thy advent to this world again,
That boon to thee were cruel now,
For persecution's dreadful train
Would cross thy peaceful path of life,
And stir thy loving thoughts to strife.

My faithful partner's life is past,
And brokenly my heart livs on;
But this will soothe me to the last,
Whate're betide to dwell upon;
'Twere better far that thou shouldst be
Where now thou art than here with me.

Yet, looking on this little tress
Unlocks the source of dried up tears,
And thoughts intense will ever press
On my hot brain; nor hopes nor fears
Since thou, my true affianced, perished,
May never more be felt or cherished.

My life, my hope—yes, on my mind,
Strange and unusual feelings rush,
The floodgates of my heart unbind,
And bid its waters wildly gush,
As gazing on thy works I see
The all that now remains of thee.

Dear Bennett mine, farewell, farewell,
I join the busy noisy throng;
But in my heart's deep haunted cell
Thoughts that to thee alone belong
Shall ever bloom as fresh and fair
As if they'd just been planted there.

If silent tears of woe can nourish
The flowers of memory in the breast,
Then these of mine shall surely flourish,
And each succeeding hour invest
Their stems with charms unknown before,
Till we shall meet to part no more.

Fraternally and sympathetically yours,
E. N. KINGSLEY.

QUINCY, MASS., N E 107.

Hail! to those of every land and name;
All who prefer the word Fraternity to fame,
And those conflictings dire that cover man with shame
Unworthy most, and cruel!
One brotherhood forever hence is mine;
From this living center here the truth shall ever shine,
For the highest good of all, the human and divine—
The purest, brightest jewel.

One origin, one nature, and one destiny! One humanity, one life, and one hope—in humanity's lap to rest! As the future is better to one, so it must be to each one and to all. Has not Nature "made of one blood all nations of men, to dwell upon all the face of the earth, and determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitation?" And is there any "church," any society, any clique or ring more "sacred," more "holy," or divine than a human family? Is there, or can there be, a greater "miracle" than man is himself? Or, if you say that gods work the miracles, I reply that the "God idea" is human, and the miracle of living human brains. No ideas of gods or ghosts were ever known until there were human brains for their evolution. In all we know, therefore, of the whole of things, man is himself the greatest wonder, and of miracles he is at the head of the list. Motion and chemism are perfected in manhood. He is the only living organism we know that evolves ideas.

The social relations of humanity are the living foundation and the only source of virtue (justice, goodness, and truthfulness), and its practice does not depend upon books, nor creeds, nor alleged revelations from myths in the sky. From the fraternal element in humanity comes all we know of justice, equity, and individual sovereignty. "But," says one, "if the elements of fraternity and virtue are innate in humanity, how is it to be accounted for that the human race has become so much divided and broken up into belligerent parties?" It is not any fault in virtue that the race has become divided into nations. But it may be for a want of the fraternal when the nations fight and devour one another. And there is another cause more potent for discords and persecutions, and that is found in false ideas. I hav in other articles attempted to show that the human mind is controled by false ideas, that hold it to any given course of conduct with equal power as if they were true. And to this state of things it is owing that Christians fail to yield to humanity any credit for the good that humanity has down for itself. It is for this reason that Christians persecute those that never persecuted them. Nay, more, for they persecute and make war upon each other. Uncounted millions of Christian men, and women, and children hav been slain by Christian hands! It is appalling to contemplate the immense numbers murdered by Christians for alleged witchcraft. And this, too, when science shows that for Christianity itself there is no better or more appropriate term than this one of witchcraft. And how many ignorant and silly people hav those mountebanks, Moody and Sankey, bewitched? Hence, in all preceding ages, both Protestant and Popish Christians hav persecuted not only one another, but "all the rest of mankind."

And here I am reminded of a recent case of persecution, that seemed to me as black and infamous as that in former ages, when Christians were less informed, and put the objects of their hatred to a cruel death. I allude to that hard-hearted bigot, Joseph Cook, in his having followed and persecuted D. M. Bennett in a foreign country. Was there ever in popery a more unfraternal deed than that? It was not enough, it seems, for this Christian harpy, Cook, to perambulate over these United States uttering his slanders where Mr. Bennett was far better known, and a thousand times more appreciated for his moral worth, than this Cook ever was or ever will be; but, true to the persecuting instincts of Christianity, he followed Mr. Bennett into a foreign country, where he may hav supposed that they were both of them unknown. And there, in India, this Cook embraced the first chance he had for reaching the public ear for charging India's guest as having been convicted of some crime in America for which he had been fined and imprisoned! Could anything be meaner and less fraternal? And that is Christianity, that form of faith in mysticism which for two thousand years has persistently proclaimed hell-fire and eternal damnation for a vast majority of the human race! The Christian admits no one as a brother who is not bamboozled and victimized by the same delusion. Hence it is an enemy to humanity. Nor is it possible to conceive how the human race could hav a greater foe. It is false in its inception, false in its foundation, false in its theory, and deserves everlasting execration from the good and true everywhere upon the face of this globe.

We never hear of persecution from Freethinkers and Liberals. Infidels never slay their own children to secure their immediate admission to paradise. Nor is it the fault of Liberals that they do not recognize in Joseph Cook "a friend and a brother."

And you may hav heard of that English philanthropist and brother to the human race, George Thompson, who twice visited this country in behalf of universal emancipation. Well, I hav a picture of a poor slave that Mr. Thompson gave me fifty years ago, now on my table; and with the chains of slavery, it bears this motto: "Am I not a friend and a brother?" LAROY SUNDERLAND.

CAPE BRETON CITY, Jan. 31, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I propose that we should form an order and alliance, be it even in professional acknowledgment of the title only of Truth Seekers, and thus, and worthily, may we hav for our all-time president, the gentle, noble truth seeker, D. M. Bennett. There is, and always must be, truth to be searched for, as long as there is continual change and development in organisms—as long as intelligence presides in the universe, and as long as we individually develop through its transmitted functions. Through everlasting ages, and in all stages, there must always be the young and undeveloped, the proud and superstitious in some degree, and every advancing world of beings will forever require their truth seekers.

In our little time, then, in the little time of even the race itself, may we not arm the truth seeker with a legitimate badge of independence—a badge that can never be dishonored but in the wearer—a badge with a title that will hav the same meaning in every language. Strength and courage are afforded by sympathy and unity, and when we can get neither it is time enough to act and develop without. A truth is only dawning that the race of man is yet in its puling infancy. We hav vaguely looked back for precedent and the ideal, in perfect man gods—abortions created by the yet undeveloped mind of man—when we should look forward with the inspiration of truth. The possibilities of man on earth with an organism developed through the higher functions of his nature, present a hopeful future for the race.

The gradual development through these functions is seen in the advancement of material science, and the gradual dissipation of barbarous theologies. But how clogged! I hav worn the fetters, and the marks are there!

Production made easy by applied science, and division equitable through wise legislation, an effect of the religion of humanity, will develop a posterity to us with higher, finer, and mayhap other and grander senses, and with grander souls; for truth and loving kindness will be there still in higher estate, when the enslaver, direful necessity, is held off by united effort.

Truth seekers, we owe this progress to ourselvs, and to that posterity! Forward, then, truth seekers, always! All must be honored by the title, and their badge and armor must then turn aside through their innate brightness and luster, the cruel shafts of malignity and terrorism inflicted upon the honest Infidel, brave in his martyrdom, but unfortunate in his name—a name which he has a right to cast off as he would cast off any other unclean thing thrust upon him through the venom of superstition, ignorance, and bigotry.

Organization and order are always desirable wherever possible, and a simple assertion of the title would be one step, and simple registration of name would lead to further organization, which, however, should be carefully guarded as fee simple, as the title itself, although it will be its own best guard for the truth seeker, cannot be a truth seeker when he is aught else. In many places on this continent the only record of births is kept in the different churches, as it was in England not long ago, which from a legal as well as a domestic point of view is awkward for the Infidel's family. May we not institute a a register, too?

I dare say you, Mr. Editor, will consider these propositions, and, should you and your readers approve, will, I trust, take a step in advance to centralize as truth seekers, which is necessary, for it must be remembered that we are so scattered, often not being in sufficient numbers to form Leagues. For instance, I cannot count more than two here, myself included—perhaps I may say three—bold enough to assert ourselvs in this large county. It would work in perfect harmony with all existing Liberal Leagues, under whatever names they labor. It would be a living monument to its immortal president, and a living, ever-growing power of progress to arm the pioneers of our race in the path of happiness and truth.

As a stranger I am perhaps bold in my propositions, but it is my duty and pleasure to search for the truth, and if possible bring it to view.

TRUTH SEEKER PRYSE PROTHEROE.

GAHANNA, March, 19, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber to your paper for four years. I like it on account of its liberality. It was through Spiritualism, or Spiritualistic publications, that I became a Liberalist. Yet I should hate to hav your paper filled with nothing but Spiritualism; and were I a Materialist I should hate to hav THE TRUTH SEEKER forever voicing my sentiments, and thereby giving me no chance to learn the opinions of others, whose education and environments had caused them to hold different views. I should like to hav some representativ Catholic write an article in your paper in defense of his creed, also an article in defense of Mormonism, as well as articles from all other sources, the editor to follow each article with a vigorous reply. It seems to me that such a course would make THE TRUTH SEEKER the greatest educator in the land, as well as keeping its readers abreast of the times.

There are but few Liberals in this locality other than Spiritualists. But we hav plenty of Christians; and I can safely say that out of two hundred church-members of my acquaintance there could not be found over a half dozen individuals that ever heard the name of Herbert Spencer. Yet we will struggle on, for truth will come uppermost at last.

Yours truly, WALLACE MOORE.

Poetry.

The Little White Hearse.

As the little white hearse went glimmering by—
The man on his coal-cart jerked his lines,
And smutted the lid of either eye,
And turned and stared at the business signs;
And the street-car driver stopped and beat
His hands on his shoulders, and gazed up-street
Till his eye on the long track reached the sky—
As the little white hearse went glimmering by.

As the little white hearse went glimmering by—
A stranger petted a ragged child
In the crowded walk, and she knew not why,
But he gave her a coin for the way she smiled;
And a bootblack thrilled with a pleasure strange,
As a customer put back his change
With a kindly hand and a grateful sigh—
As the little white hearse went glimmering by.

As the little white hearse went glimmering by—
A man looked out of a window dim,
And his cheeks were wet and his heart was dry—
For a dead child even was dear to him!
And he thought of his empty life and said:
"Loveless alive and loveless dead—
Nor wife nor child in earth or sky!"
As the little white hearse went glimmering by.

Religious Phantoms.

[To a friend who sent a poem, "I Need Thee, Precious Jesus."]

BY ELMINA & CO.

Thy "precious Jesus" is a dream—
A phantasy of faith so blind
That reason fails to shed her light
Upon thy dark, distempered mind.

No blood of beast, or man, or God,
Can ever wash one sin away,
For every wicked deed thou doest
Thyself the penalty must pay.

Trust then no more on Jesus Christ,
He cannot dissipate a doubt
Nor mitigate thy childish fears;
Let reason drive such nonsense out,

A God of wrath, and yet of love!
'Tis stultifying blasphemy.
How can a being who is good
Become a vengeful deity?

But God and Christ, and heaven and hell
Are priestly phantoms—childish dreams.
Regard them not, nor waste thy time
In brooding o'er such idle themes.

There is no other heaven nor hell
Than what we here ourselves create;
Science our only savior is,
And earth our first and last estate.

The Bad Girl at Sunday-School.

From the Boston Globe.

The freckle-faced little girl was sent to Sabbath-school last Sunday to counteract the effect of her remarks to the parson, and show that the family was not quite as wicked as she had made it appear. The teacher told the class about Jonah, and offered to answer any questions the children wanted to ask about the surprising adventures of the man who was thrown overboard for luck and swallowed for a sprat. The little girl stopped making faces at the boy with large ears in the next class and wanted to know if the whale story was in the Common Council. The lady smiled at the question, and taking special pride in her peculiar knack of "drawing out" children and analyzing the operations of their immature minds, she inquired the reason of the question.

"I didn't know," said the freckle-faced girl. "Your husband is in the Common Council, 'n my pa says he's got a nap'tite like the whale what ate up Mr. Jones. Pa says he seen a bill for a lunch over at Parker's 'n said your husband ate twenty dollar's worth at one sitting. Pa said 'twas 'sprisin' what appetites some whales 'n most politishuns did hav."

"Well, it's high time your mother sent you to Sabbath-school," replied the teacher severely. "The influences around you at home are perfectly awful for a child of your age and naturally wicked disposition. Where do you suppose you will go to if you learn to talk such scandal about your neighbors?"

"I dunno. Over to Miss Sliderback's, I guess. Ma says that's where you 'n Miss Magruder go to talk about the neighbors, 'n I s'pose I can go, too, when I get big 'nuff. I'd rather go to dancing-school though, 'n ma says I can when pa gets the money Deacon Sliderback cheated him out of that time they swapped horses."

The teacher told the freckle-faced girl to stop talking and learn two verses, and the little heathen hid her face behind a book and whispered to the next little girl, whose father is the superintendent, "Say, don't your pa talk through his nose funny. My pa says if your pa would stay at home from prayer-meetin' to mix a little more sugar with the sand he sells for fourteen cents a pound p'raps he might not need a fire-proof coffin when he dies."

Then she devoted herself to making faces at the boy with large ears and giggling at the way the teacher twisted her mouth trying to sing a hymn.

The Battle of the Ministers.

From the Arkansaw Traveler.

It was decided that young Mulkittle should accompany his father on his journey to a distant city to preach the funeral sermon of a well-known minister. Immediately the youngster flew into an enthusiastic flutter of excitement. A ride on a railway train had ever been an aim of his young life, and all day before the evening of departure he played locomotiv, puffing and running around the house to the infinit delight of his little sister.

The travelers boarded the train late in the evening, and deposited themselvs among the luxuriant cushions of a sleeping-car. When the reverend gentleman and his son stretched themselvs on the berth assigned them, the boy, restless in his anxiety to investigate everything, would lie down, sit up, put his feet where his head had been, "fumble" at the window, and upon the whole make himself unnecessarily "useful."

"Pa," he said, when he seemed to hav finally settled himself, "did Paul and Peter travel on the railroad?"

"No," replied the preacher, whose mind was filled with the thoughts that he wished to express during the sacred ceremony awaiting him, "there were no railroads in those days."

"If there had been, and the man what makes people pay had come around and Peter and John had been on the train, and the man had asked them for money, they would'er said 'gold and silver we hav none,' wouldn't they?"

"I suppose so," replied the clergic gentleman, attempting to "plump" his cotton pillow.

"And if Peter and John had said that they didn't hav any money, would the man'er let 'em go, anyhow?"

"No, I think not."

"But if the Lord had said, 'Peter and John, you must go,' an' they had got on the train an' the man had told them to get off, what would they've done if they didn't hav any money? Would they've got off?"

"Yes, I think so."

"But the Lord would'er killed the man what takes the money, wouldn't he?"

"I don't know."

"But when the Lord says that a man must go, an' somebody keeps him from goin', the Lord will punish the man, won't he?"

"Hush, now, I must go to sleep," and the good man turned over and soon snored. The boy, though, thoroughly alive to the importance of such a vital issue, asked several other questions, when a hoarse, fat man, occupying a berth just across the aisle, drew aside the curtains and exclaimed, "Why don't you go to sleep, you young rooster?"

"I ain't no young rooster," replied the boy, pulling aside the curtain and leaning over his father. "If I'm a young rooster you are a old rooster, and you can't crow, either."

"I want to go to sleep, and I want you to hush. I'd rather hear the roaring of a cataract than your ceaseless gab."

"What's a cataract?"

"A rush of water, that's what."

"Was the water that Moses made run out'en the rock a cataract?"

"Confound Moses. I havn't had any sleep for three nights, and I am tired. Do you hear?"

"You want me to render unto Robinson Crusoe the things that are—"

"I want you to hush, that's what I want."

"You're talkin' as much as I am. I didn't say anything to you. I was talkin' to my pa."

"Blame your pa; I want to sleep."

"Well, why don't you sleep?"

"Because you, confounded kid, won't let me."

"Are you a goat?"

"If you don't hush I'll spank the hide off you."

"Spank who?" exclaimed Mr. Mulkittle, arising and looking at the fat man.

"I say if that boy don't hush and go to sleep, I'll spank him."

"You don't know who you are talking to, sir. Don't let me hear you say that you will spank my son," indignantly exclaimed Mr. Mulkittle.

"I'm talking to an impertinent boy," replied the fat man, "and if he don't hush I'll tan his hide. Do you hear?"

"You are a cowardly beast," vociferated Mr. Mulkittle.

"You are a liar," exclaimed the fat man, "hustling" from his birth. Mr. Mulkittle sprang out like a piece of whalebone, and met the fat man, who struck him on the shoulder. The minister seized his adversary and began to choke him, and then grappled with him and began an old-time wrestle. "I am a minister," panted Mr. Mulkittle, "and I'll wollop the eternal nation out of you!"

"So am I a minister," blew the fat man, "and nobody shall impose on me."

"Of what denomination?" asked Mr. Mulkittle, disentangling himself, and with an action that could not be restrained, striking his fat competitor on the jaw.

"Presbyterian, you fool," howled the fat man, returning the blow. "What denomination are you?"

"Methodist, you scoundrel," and Mulkittle hit him between the eyes.

"I don't care if you were a Baptist; you couldn't run over me," and the fat man struck from the shoulder.

"It takes two Presbyterians to whip me," panted Mr. Mulkittle, "churning" the fat preacher in a violent jolt. Young Mulkittle now sprang from the birth, seized the fat preacher and buried his teeth in the calf of his leg.

"Ow!" howled the fat man. "Take the young hyena away. Ow! He's killing me!"

Night-capped heads were thrust from behind curtains, and the porter, who rushed in to investigate, was asked by a rumpled old maid what was the matter, and replied, "Nothing, madam. Only a couple of preachers getting ready for sleep."

After everything became quiet, young Mulkittle remarked to his father: "And we smote 'em hip an' thigh, didn't we?" Mr. Mulkittle passed his arm around his son and slept again.

A Coon-Hunter's Wife.

A minister laboring in the mountain districts of Fayette county, W. Va., givs the following conversation he had with a woman there recently:

"Is your husband at home?"

"No; he is 'coon hunting. He killed two whopping big 'coons last Sunday."

"Does he fear the Lord?"

"I guess he does, 'cause he always takes his gun with him."

"Hav you any Presbyterians around here?"

"I don't know if he has killed any or not. You can go behind the house and look at the pile of hides to see if you can find any of their skins."

"I see that you are living in the dark."

"Yes, but my husband is going to cut out a winder soon."

OUR PLANET; ITS PAST AND FUTURE. By William Denton. Price, $1.50. For sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

"Much dearer be the things which come through hard distress."—Spenser.

The unfoldment of the mysterious past is a stepping-stone to the demonstrations of the future. This volume givs a geological description of the earth, from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, and traces the natural development of rocks, vegetable and animal life. The fossiliferous periods of the earth are treated at length, and in a terse and graphic manner. This work was written for the many. Hear Aristotle: "He who would be a leader must think as wise people do, but speak as common people do." This will truly apply to our author, Prof. William Denton. Many who hav been nursed by poverty hav become our greatest and most noted men and women. Reared by poor but honest parents, Mr. Denton has earned for himself a fame that but few attain. He is a self-made man. D. M. Bennett, in his "Sages," says: "He has established a reputation as a geologist, and is reckoned among the ablest advocates of the Spiritualistic philosophy." His geological fame probably rests within the volume under consideration. I will not here attempt to describe the many points therein treated upon, but those who desire to know more of the various elements upon which they walk, I would advise to get a copy of this work and thoroughly peruse it. Mr. Bennett further says: "Wm. Denton has done much to break the shackles of orthodoxy and popular prejudice. His life has been a series of battles with want and hardships, but, patient, persevering, and valiant as Hannibal, he has fought and fainted not. His life of self-sacrifice, endurance, and moral worth, offers a series of valuable lessons to others who need the inspiration of living examples of heroism, nobility, and manhood."

Such a man is Mr. Denton. Long may he liv to pursue his studies!

MORAL EDUCATION. By J. R. Buchanan, M.D. Price, $1.50. For sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

"Better to be unborn than untaught; for ignorance is the root of misfortune."—Plato.

This is a systematic treatis upon moral education, being an attempt toward revolutionizing the present system of education. Moral and intellectual education are logically discussed, and both shown to be of paramount importance. The author strenuously maintains, and very conclusivly demonstrates, that the moral education is of the greatest importance. He says: "Ignorance is a trivial matter in comparison to crime; and intellectual shrewdness is no compensation for the loss of virtue and happiness. I claim, therefore, that moral education, in its highest sense, is incomparably more important than intellectual education."

Moral wisdom is "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," as Bentham would say. The author has handled the subject with consummate ability. Overwhelming demonstrations are everywhere recognizable to convince the reader that the author has scanned the educational problem from a scientific standpoint. The work ought to be read by M.D.'s, teachers of schools of all grades, architects, in short, by all thinking people. Most valuable hints are given for the preservation of health; also as to the care of children.

Let the people study the science of the preservation of health, and in a few generations the inhabitants of the globe will be strong and robust in body and mind compared to the present. When the science of heredity rules supreme, and moral and intellectual education are universally adopted, we shall hav a grander and more noble race of human beings, with a greater intellectual development, a better conception of justice and moral rectitude. The author of this work, Professor J. R. Buchanan, ranks among the highest of the world as a student of the sciences of anthropology, neurology, and craniology. He is the discoverer of cerebral impressibility, and also of psychometry and sarcognomy. In a word, he is undoubtedly the best-informed man on matters appertaining to the brain, of American birth.

"Room! For the men of mind make way,
Ye priests and tyrants! Pause no longer;
Ye cannot stay the opening day;
The world rolls on; the light grows stronger!"

No medicine taken. It has never been known to fail!

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in cut. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.

Gems of Thought.

NOT a system of religion the world has yet believed in has been free from errors; not one that has been true. All were based upon mistaken notions of gods and devils; all originated in fallacies and absurdities, or which were copied and adopted by one system from another.—D. M. Bennett.

YE see your state wi' theirs compared,
And shudder at the niffer [exchange],
But cast a moment's fair regard,
What makes the mighty differ [difference].
Discount what scant occasion gave—
That purity you pride in—
And (what's aft mair than a' the love
Your better art o' hidin').

Think when your castigated pulse
Gies now and then a wallop,
What raging must his views convulse
That still eternal gallop;
Wi' wind and tide fair i' your tail,
Right on ye scud your sea-way;
But in the teeth o' baith to sail,
It makes an unco leeway.

—Burns to the Unco Guid.

ON the whole we make too much of faults; the details of the business hide the real center of it. Faults? The greatest of faults, I should say, is to be conscious of none. Readers of the Bible above all, one would think, might know better. Who is called there "the man after God's own heart?" David, the Hebrew king, had fallen into sins enough; blackest crimes; there was no want of sins. . . . What are faults, what are the outward details of a life if the inner secret of it, the remorse, temptations, true, often-baffled, never-ending struggle of it, be forgotten? Of all acts, is not for a man repentance the most divine? The deadliest sin, I say, were that same supercilious consciousness of no sin; that is death; the heart so conscious is divorced from sincerity, humility, and fact; it is dead; it is pure, as dead, dry sand is pure.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

HEAVEN and hell are antithetical terms here or hereafter, and, while I would teach man to be honest and true and brave and loving, that they might liv in heaven here, I would also say in regard to the future, "I know nothing." Let me quote the corroborating language of Bishop Foster, of the Methodist Episcopal church, who says: "However it may awaken surprise, truth demands that we should make the confession that we do not know that death does not end all. . . . We hav neither sense nor mental vision of man after he dies. He does not appear again within the range of our faculties. We do not find him. Where he is, or that he is at all, is absolutely unknown to us. Our consciousness is silent on the subject. The dead do not come back to us, and we are not able to go to them. This without doubt is the common experience of humanity."—Miln's Farewell Discourse.

[NOTE.—Three cheers for Bishop Foster. I never heard of his reverence before, and I may never hear of him again; but he has spoken one wise word if he should never speak another. In the matter of personal, individual immortality he speaks like a man of sense and modesty, who knows that he knows no more of the unknowable than does his wife or his washer-woman. Pity it is that other bishops and archbishops, and all up to the pope of Rome, do not know and realize the limited nature of the mental faculties! If those same bishops could see themselvs as men of sense see them, they would abhor themselvs and repent in dust and ashes. Let them repeat daily the words of the Scottish bard:

"Oh, would some power the giftie gie us
To see ourselvs as others see us!
It wad frae many a blunder free us,
And foolish notion;
What airs in dress and gait wad leave us,
And even devotion!" —Hylax.]

A CRITICISM of the New Testament shows that of the life of Christ we know very little; that the tale of Christ's life is woven with miracles and legends; that the real points are few, and those going to show that his was a noble and loveable nature, but by no means one that was free from the frailties that hav been the portion of every child of man from time immemorial. But men cling to Christianity still, and are unwilling to forego its social advantages. They will not leave the camp of the majority and stand solitary with the few. If you press them hard they say, "We are Christians in a historical sense." That has a plausible sound, but no meaning. Christian in a historical sense means Christian in the sense of Christian parentage, Christian in the sense that your father or grandfather was a Christian, but Christian in the sense that somebody else was a Christian is a manifest absurdity. Christian in a historical sense, therefore, means Christian in no sense at all.—Adler's Radical Pulpit.

IF the Spaniards had not been ignorant, proud, and timid they would hav throttled Philip II. before he had got one Spanish finger in a thumbscrew, before he had burnt one Jewish maiden. If the people of New England had not been stricken with terror they would hav laughed Jonathan Edwards out of his pulpit and out of his nightmare. Wesley would hav had no career in England, nor Whitfield in America, nor Cartright in Kentucky, nor Moody and Sankey anywhere, if beer and rum and vice had not gone before them, debauching ignorant minds to the point of imbecility.—James Parton's Coming Man's Religion.

WE'RE the sons of sires that baffled
Crowned and mitred tyranny;
They defied the field and scaffold
For their birthright. So will we!

—Campbell.

WHAT the earliest philosophic historian among the Greeks complained of is still prevalent; men are very "unpainstaking" in their research of truth in history. The simplicity which is amiable in children who readily accept as true whatever they are told, and never criticise, is predominant with the vast mass of adults. Moreover men, like children, love wonderful stories, and most reluctantly unlearn belief of marvels which they hav been taught from childhood, whether in Roman or in Hebrew history. —Newman's Religion Not History.

Odds and Ends.

THE course of true love is often blocked by an onion.

IT seems natural that when a man's business gets run down he winds it up.

WHEN the short man begged the tall woman for a kiss she stooped to concur.

PAT (to traveler): "An' it's the next train to Dublin ye want? Faith, that went an hour ago, sorr."

"YES," said the landlord, pointing to his block of new houses, "they're all full, 'cept the one at the end. That's last, but not leased."

THE idea of having your house connected with the church by telephone is utterly absurd. How's your wife to see bonnets by telephone?

WHEN the hen with chickens attacked the small boy in his mother's yard, the hen informed him she had been laying for him for some time.

CLARA asks: "What disease is most frequently transmitted by kissing?" A wise editor replies: "Palpitation of the heart, we believe."

IT is a terrible shock to one's feelings, after singing "Salvation's Free," to hear the announcement that "the collection will now be taken."

ONE cannot be too careful this weather. A swell exchanged his heavy winter cane for a light bamboo, and caught a severe cold that laid him up for a week.

ALEXANDER GUN, an officer in Scotland, being dismissed from his employment for misconduct, an entry was made in a book kept for the purpose, as follows: "A. Gun discharged for making a false report."

POET: "But, my dear sir, it is now four years since you accepted my epic, and no steps hav yet been taken to publish it." Publisher: "Don't be in a hurry, young man. Homer had to wait more than three thousand years before he got into print, and you will hardly claim that your poem is an Iliad."

THERE was a young lady in Worcester
Who could crow quite as well as a rorcester.
She could whistle and sing—
Do most anything
That boys can, except
That she wasn't adept
At climbing with no one to borcester.

"NOW, Sam," said an Austin millionaire and a prominent church-member, to his colored porter, "this getting drunk on Sunday must cease. Why is it that you desecrate Sunday continually by becoming intoxicated?"

"Bekase, boss, whisky costs so much I hasn't got any money left ober to get drunk wid on Monday. Ef I had de money I would desecrate Monday, too."

THERE is a German family in Galena who in daily conversation use the English language, but the mother teaches her children the same German prayers she used to repeat in her childhood, away back on the Rhine. One night as little Ernest, a precocious chap of four, was quietly going through his devotion, he suddenly electrified his mother by exclaiming, "Ma, why do we always talk Yankee and pray German? Is God a Dutchman?"

A FEW REFLECTIONS UPON NIGHT.

It is night. A policeman awakes with a sudden start and moves around the corner, having a secret fear at his heart that he had slept through all that night, all next day, and far into to-morrow night. It is night in a great city. The poker and faro rooms are in full blast, 10,000 loafers are holding down street corners, and here and there an intoxicated alderman can be seen making his way to a policy shop or a gathering of the pavement ring. Under cover of darkness, first manufactured over 6,000 years ago, the hotel beat lowers his duds from the fourth-story window; all who hav dead-head tickets start for the opera houses; hundreds of young men set out to spark; reporters look forward to fires, robberies, and murders, and church choirs meet to rehearse and wrangle and lay up clubs for each other.

'Tis night in the country. The stock has been fed, the squeal of the pig is hushed, and the tired horse munches at his corn and wonders why his master throws in so many cobs without a kernel on them. The watch dog sits at the gate, perfectly willing to chew up any of the neighbors for a cent, and within the farm-house all is serene—or would be if John Henry could find the grease for his boots, Mary Ann could find her novel, the old man discover the hiding place of the bootjack, and the mother solve the mystery of how some of her neighbors managed to get a dress costing two shillings per yard while she had nothing but calico.

'Tis night on the ocean. The proud steamer sails gallantly on and on, the captain snoring in his berth, the mates playing eucher, the lookouts asleep, and everything in readiness to swear, in case of collision, that it was all the other vessel's fault. Nothing is heard but the steady beat of the propeller, the groans of the immigrants, and the voices of men and women declaring that anybody who plans an ocean voyage for pleasure ought to be shot to death with codfish balls. The sportiv dolphin gambols away his hard earnings, the whale rolls over for another nap, and the business-like shark follows in the wake to pick up any opportunities which may tumble overboard.

'Tis night on the prairie. The red men gather about the camp-fire to count the scalps they hav taken within the last week, and to grumble at the government for not furnishing them port wine and repeating rifles. The white hunter and trapper curls himself up to wonder where he can find old bones for breakfast, and to realize what a fool he has made of himself, and the gaunt wolf shoulders his empty stomach and sets out in search of something to make life worth living for.

Night grows apace. In the city the weary wife takes her place in the hall with club in hand. In the country the old folks fall into bed aweary with the work of the day, and the young people spark and chew pop-corn. On the ocean the sea-sickers continue to grow worse, and the songs of the mermaids fall flat. On the prairie the Indians finally decide to make war in the spring, the hunter falls asleep to dream of eating his boots for dinner, and the wolf meets a wildcat and offers to toss up to see which shall eat the other.—Detroit Free Press.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,
WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

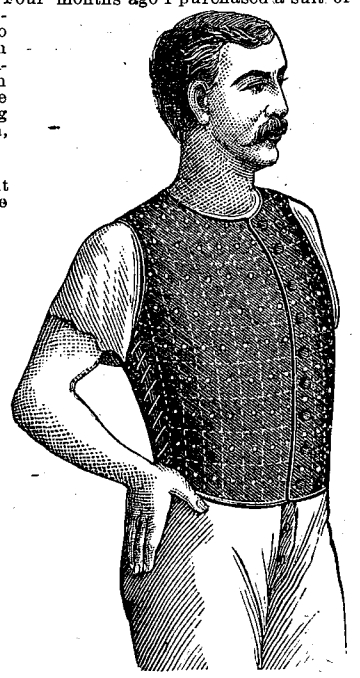
Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain
Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.



DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,
Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Any of the above garments sent to any address upon receipt of price, and we will return the money if they are not as represented in every respect. If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case, send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselvs. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them at about

ONE-THIRD THE PRICE HERETOFORE CHARGED,

So that we can say with truth, None are so poor that they cannot procure them, being but a trifle higher than ordinary clothing.

Remember that we are offering you the cheapest and best magnetic appliances in the market, and if upon receiving the garments they do not meet your expectation, return them at our expense and we will refund your money.

Ladies' Abdominal Jackets and Gentlemen's Vests are made to order, and a fit guaranteed.

THE Prussian Reichstag, in the name of the nation, return thanks to those who sent aid to the flood sufferers, the most of which, the president said, was from America.

A QUEER trinity: The Grocers' Company, London, uses before its feast this prayer: "God preserve the Church, the Queen, and the Worshipful Company of Grocers."

THE Supreme Court of Indiana has decided that the publication of a notice of a sheriff's sale in a Sunday newspaper is void. The decision makes the publication of any advertisment or any newspaper on Sunday an unlawful act.

A YOUNG woman in Missouri, crazed by religion, imagins herself an angel. She had probably, says the World, been called one so often during her sanity by her beaus that the impression became fixed in her shattered mind.

THE Rev. George T. Spencer, in charge of the Methodist churches at Corinth and South Corinth, Saratoga county, has been expelled the ministry, and has left town in time to avoid a coat of tar and feathers. He is accused of outrageous conduct.

PRESIDENT PORTER, of Yale, told a legislativ committee on temperance that he did not believe in prohibition, for it was impracticable in cities. He looked forward to the time when rum would be felt to be as dangerous as dynamite and its sale restricted.

EXTRACT from a dictionary for the use of congregations: "Bandit (see also Brigand, Riff-Raff, Scoundrel, Assassin, Thief, Leper, Highwayman, Horse-thief, Ruffian, Traitor, Spy, Perjurer, Scalawag, Pickpocket, Vulture, Wild-Beast, Ghoul, Vampire, etc.)—a man who is not of the minister's way of thinking."

AT a meeting of the trustees of the Pennsylvania University a committee report was presented setting forth a plan for the education of women by which they will receive the same course of instruction as the male students, but at a different time and place. The female students will also receive degrees on the same terms as the males.

A COMMISSION was sent by Japan to giv a report of the influence of Christianity upon morals in England. After eighteen months of London life the decision was that Christianity had less restraint over crime, and especially drunkenness, than Buddhism or the religion of Shinto, so the public religion of Japan will remain unchanged.

THE Rev. B. F. Decosta says that the preparations for an examination into the orthodoxy of the Rev. R. Heber Newton, of All Souls' Protestant Episcopal Church, are being pushed as fast as is practicable. The court of inquiry had not yet been appointed. Cases of this kind require the greatest care in order that no injustice be done. As soon as the arrangements can be completed Mr. Newton will undoubtedly be brought to trial.

A LONDON clergyman is said to hav told his congregation that there was still many a one who, while engaged in singing apparently with all his heart the lines—

> "Were the whole realm of nature mine,
> That were an offering far too small,"

was diligently engaged with one hand in his pocket scraping the edge of a three-penny piece to make sure it was not a four-penny piece.

AT a recent meeting of the school board of Wick Burgh, Scotland, a member proposed that Henry George's work on "Progress and Poverty" should be introduced as a text book in the schools, arguing that the rising generation ought to be instructed on the subject of their relation to the soil and on other matters affecting their independence and self-reliance. After some debate it was discovered that the member who offered the motion was the only one who knew anything about the book, and the question was postponed until the next meeting in order that the other members might inform themselvs to its contents.

IT was very wrong in little "Tommy's" uncle to teach him that Sunday-school verse wrong. "Tommy" brought it home printed on a blue card, and was to learn and repeat it alone the next Sunday. So he stood up before the class and the minister and the visitors, and remembered it—the cunning little fellow—just as his uncle had told him. Holding the card-verse in his hand, pretending that he could read, he piped up in his clear shrill voice: "Good at the bar for one beer."

THE question whether St. Patrick was a Roman Catholic or not comes up annually. The Guardian givs us historical evidence that he was not, owing to his disbelief in the leading doctrins of the church of Rome of to-day. He did not believe in the worship of the Virgin Mary, purgatory, the celibacy of the clergy, the elevation of the Host, or the propitiatory sacrifice of the mass. It will be a revelation to Catholics to know they hav for so many years annually celebrated the birth of a heretic.

THE Boston youngster is evidently putting himself in training for a newspaper paragrapher. The Journal tells the story: A little dweller on the Black Bay, who for four years held the position of baby to the family, was recently dispossessed by a sister. He was standing by a day or two ago watching the progress of the infantile toilet, when his mother said: "See baby's downy hair; she is mother's little sparrow, isn't she?" "I don't know about that," was the reply; "but I think we could very well spare her."

DR. DAY, of Boston, says "there is no danger in stopping a man's alcohol abruptly." But the Norristown Herald proves the fallacy of Dr. Day's assertion by relating the true story of a man who went into a Norristown saloon the other day and who, when the barkeeper told him he couldn't hav another drop of whisky until he had paid off the old score, picked up a porter bottle and struck the dispenser of alcoholic fluids on the head, from the effects of which he was laid up four weeks. This shows that there is danger in stopping a man's alcohol abruptly.

IN some reminiscences of Daniel Boone by a writer in the Denver Tribune the following story is told: "When he went back to his family in Virginia after roaming around for two or three years, he found a baby in the house. Mrs. Boone, who had given him up for dead, hastened to explain that it belonged to his brother, who had been left in charge while Daniel went on his long hunt, and Daniel, glad to see them all, made no fuss about it, since it was 'a Boone anyhow,' and he gathered up the family, brother and all, and went on to Kentucky."

A CORRESPONDENT writes that out in the wilderness beyond Cheyenne dwells a hermit whose business it is to take care of relays of horses for the stage. Nothing grows nor is water to be found for miles and miles around his desolate cabin, and yet he endeavors to make life cheerful. His humor expresses itself in the following illuminated signs, posted conspicuously on his shanty: "Hotel de la Starvation," "Fifteen miles to water," "Twenty-five miles to wood," "Seven inches to hell," "Wanted—A neat and tidy girl to do general housework," "God bless our home!" This man never sees any living being except once a day when the coach dashes into sight, and he is jovial and happy.

A "SOMERSETSHIRE RECTOR" writes to the London Times: "I observe it is stated that those attending the enthronization of the archbishop of Canterbury on the 29th inst., are requested to wear lilies of the valley in honor of Thomas a Becket. Before denuding their conservatories for that purpose, it might be as well that they should read Mr. J. A. Froude's masterly essay on the life and times of that turbulent prelate. Perhaps they would then come to the conclusion that sweetness and purity were hardly the characteristics of Becket's person, or humility and unobtrusivness of his disposition, and that instead of the lily of the valley, the tiger lily (though, unfortunately, not now in bloom) would be the more appropriate flower."

BANKRUPTS hav a hard time in China. The North China Herald of Jan. 24th says that the broker of the silk firm of the Red Peacock shop of Shanghai, which has suspended payment, was walking on the street when he was set upon by a crowd of bankers, creditors of the firm, who carried him off to a house, where they hung him up by the queue so that his feet were off the ground, and otherwise maltreated him. A foreigner heard the disturbance, and informed the police, some of whom were sent to the house, where they found the man still hanging. He was taken to the police station for protection, after which a number of bankers repaired there and clamored for him to be given up to them. As appears to be usual in such cases, the bankers stated their intention, if the man came into their power, of biting him to death and eating him afterward, and there is no doubt they would hav bitten their debtor's servant severely had he been given into their hands.

MRS. BAXTER TELLS ALL ABOUT IT.

"The sermon—ah! and by the way,
I smiled when Mrs. Brown
Came sailing down the aisle to-day
In her new Easter gown;
The ugly thing! she's got a waist
As big as three of mine,
And yet she has the vulgar taste
To say her figure's fine!
The text—oh, do you like my hat
And terra cotta dress?
Now don't you dare to sneer like that—
Come, Baxter, tell me yes!
I know you're sick and couldn't go
To church with me to-day,
But you'd be very proud, I know,
If you had seen the way
I took the other women down
With all my Easter gear;
And as for that old Mrs. Brown—
She's horrid—ain't she, dear?"

—Denver Tribune.

POLITICS are out of season, and so the St. Louis Republican finds room and time to consider the question "Whether it was a fish or a whale that got sick of indigestible Jonah." An extract sufficient to show the Republican's position on this great and ever-interesting topic is here given. "The subject involves a question of natural history which might as well be stated at this stage of the controversy. The popular idea is that a whale is a fish. This is a fallacy. Fish belong to the lowest order of vertebrata, and are cold-blooded, while whales belong to the highest order of vertebrata—are warm-blooded mammals like the human race. Between fish and whales come reptils and then birds—a wide separation in the scale of creation. The two orders of animals cannot be classed together or confounded at all. Besides, a whale's throat is very small, and could not possibly hav taken in Jonah. Evidently it was not a whale." Whatever fish or animal it may hav been that took Jonah in out of the dampness, it was without doubt, in the matter of openness of countenance, the Talmage of its day.

THE Congregationalist, a religious paper, says: "It is reported upon apparently good authority that a certain London society for the suppression of blasphemous literature has announced its purpose of prosecuting Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, John Morley, and the publishers of the works of the late John Stuart Mill for having 'sown widespread unbelief, and in some cases rank Atheism.' This society could not do a more foolish thing. That its criticism upon the works in question has some force is true, but even if it could prove that these authors had intended to teach unbelief and Atheism, as such, which may not be easy in every case, and had violated law in so doing, it could not direct world-wide attention to these gentlemen and their books in any other way so effectivly. If it really desires to diminish their influence it should not force them into the position of martyrs. Doubtless they would be more amused than annoyed by such a persecution, while the only probable result to the society is the ridiculous failure of its action. We do not wish to see professed Christians recklessly defy the dictates of common sense."

News of the Week.

A TUNNEL under Niagara Falls is talked of.

GEN. GRANT will be present at the Decoration Day services in New York.

THE Socialist Congress at Copenhagen last week was broken up by the police.

LOUIS VEUILLOT, the celebrated French author, journalist, and occasional duelist, is dead.

JUDGE WALTER A. GRESHAM has been chosen to be postmaster-general in place of the late Timothy O. Howe.

A FIRE in a Swiss town near Geneva on the 7th destroyed 145 houses and left twelve hundred persons homeless.

FOURTEEN persons perished in the burning of a hotel at Greenville, Hunt Co., Texas, on the morning of the 7th.

VERONA BALDWIN, tried for the shooting of "Lucky" Baldwin, who she claimed had ruined her, has been acquitted.

GOV. BUTLER was generally assailed by the ministers of Massachusetts on Fast Day. This does not speak badly for the general.

THOMAS H. CORBETT, of Brooklyn, has sued the Rev. J. Hyatt Smith for $1,128, which he loaned that reverend politician for the latter's election expenses.

PRESIDENT ARTHUR is in Florida. He took his fishing tackle along when he went there, and the southern breezes are laden with stories of his skill as an angler.

THE count thus far of the cash in the national treasury shows that everything is in a satisfactory condition. Two weeks more will be required to complete the count.

THE dynamite scare still continues to agitate England. The discovery of dynamite factories, plots for assassinating somebody, and Fenian outrages are of daily report.

POSTS for electric lights are being put in place on the Brooklyn bridge. The crowds who collect to look at the structure are worked industriously by bunko steerers.

ADIRONDACK MURRAY is again in New York. He denies the reports which hav been circulated respecting his flight from Texas and his relations with his young lady amanuensis.

THE viciousness of Barnum's big $10,000 elephant Pilot made it necessary for him to be killed last week. Two bullets through the heart and one in the brain effected his demise.

THE French Reformed church held services in Salmi Morse's Passion Hall last Sunday. Mr. Morse's scheme for running the Passion Play for the benefit of charity has been interfered with by the police and the play stopped.

PETER COOPER, founder of the Cooper Institute, died in New York on Wednesday, the 4th, of pneumonia. He was ninety-two years old. The funeral took place on Saturday last, and was attended by more than 15,000 persons.

THE Augustinian Society (Roman Catholic), of Lawrence, Mass., has given notice that it will file a petition of insolvency, with the intention of abandoning all effort to repay its creditors. Its debts amount to $567,000, most of which is due in small amounts to working women.

TRYING to enforce the Sunday law lost Moses de Puy, a church-member, the presidency of the town corporation of Port Jervis, N. Y., in the recent election at that place. A man who did not believe in the "sacred" character of the Sabbath was elected in his place by a combination of church-goers and non-worshipers.

IN the House of Lords, in the case of Clarke vs. Bradlaugh, Lord High Chancellor Shelborne declared that Mr. Clarke, as a common informer, was unable to sue Mr. Bradlaugh for sitting and voting in the House of Commons without taking the oath of allegiance. The judgment against Mr. Bradlaugh was therefore reversed, with costs. Justice Blackburn was the only dissentient from the judgment.

Christianity, Mythical and Historical.

The views and ideas regarding Christianity are still greatly obscured by prejudices. Not alone the believers, but even a larger part of unbelievers, share these prejudices. While the former see in Christianity a supernatural power, beyond the reach of every human criticism and research, to the latter it only appears as a monstrous lie, a deceptiv invention of priestcraft, and a school for the mental enslavement of the people. The passionate fervor with which one party defend their belief is offset by the passionate attacks made on it by the other side, and fanaticism is almost equally divided on both sides.

Many people who hav long since relinquished their belief in Christianity are still made uneasy by it. They become enraged when it is mentioned in their presence, and seem to regard it as a heinous crime to speak of a Christian God. And yet this Christian God is one of the most interesting phenomena in history, and Christianity a mighty historical fact, which presents both to the historian and the philosopher questions of the greatest importance.

Our century is mentally and morally sufficiently far advanced to allow Christianity to be contemplated and criticised with historical impartiality. Christianity is everywhere nothing more than a grand ruin, an historical reminiscence, and we to-day are too far removed from it to be troubled or angered by its existence.

We are in a position to render it justice in every respect, to enjoy all its beauties, and to acknowledge all its beneficent results, if we place ourselvs upon the impartial standpoint of historical research. This point of view at the same time will serve best the purpose of banishing the melancholy reminiscences of Christianity, which cast their shadows even upon the pages of contemporaneous history. Every fanaticism directed against Christianity only excites the fanaticism of its adherents, and neither reasonable nor happy results can be gained by a struggle between both extremes.

At the time of the apostles the foundation of Christianity no doubt was as timely and justifiable as any great reform which the world has witnessed since then. It constituted a great advance in the history of human civilization; it was the result of many harmonious causes, and the cause of many vast changes and revolutions.

The metaphysics of Christianity are of Greek origin. The Greek school of philosophy originally developed the general categories upon which Christianity is founded, and in Plato's writings the philosophical basis of Christianity is plainly discernible. Whether Christ himself studied Greek philosophy in the school of the Essenes, as is maintained by some theologians of the rationalistic school, appears to be of minor importance. The Greek philosophy was the dominant school of those times. It formed in many respects the mental atmosphere of the educated classes, and of necessity ruled and shaped the ideas of every thinker and scholar.

The fundamental principle of Christianity is purely human; it is the principle of love and of the universal fraternization of individuals and nations. Christianity taught for the first time the idea of a universal humanity, which was never dreamt of in antichristian times.

Formerly every nation considered itself a unit existing only in and for itself, and possessing advantages and privileges which other nations had no claim to. The Egyptians excluded themselvs, caste-like, from other nations. The Jews were the chosen people of the Lord. The Greeks claimed to be the only civilized nation, calling all the rest of the world barbarians. The different nations had their own laws, their own arts, religion, and deities. The gods of the ancients were national, yea, even local. In Greece every grove and every spring had a separate deity. The Christian God, on the other hand, was a universal God—the divinity of the whole human family. This was a mighty step in the advancement of civilization, which necessarily lent a different character to the whole history.

The historical relations of that epoch made it possible for this idea of a universal humanity to be very quickly disseminated. The Roman empire comprised at the time in which Christianity became popular, i. e., about three hundred years after Christ, almost the whole civilized world, and Rome's supremacy was the initiatory to the supremacy of Christianity. The new religion united in itself oriental culture with Roman power and the Germanic idea of a union of the whole human race. This universal union is the basis of the Christian moral. It is based on love, the principle of all social ideas and reforms. Christianity originated in communism, which even in our times forms the well-intended but often misguided introduction to many social reforms.

Even in France, not so many years ago, during the social-democratic banquets, it was deemed expedient to offer an apology to Citizen Jesus Christ as well as to Citizen Robespierre. However ridiculous such a farce may appear in our times, it had at least a true meaning. When once the history of human civilization, the revolutions and struggles for liberty, and the history of their heroes is written, the man of Golgotha must be assigned one of the foremost places in its pages.

The unprecedented success which accompanied the spread of Christianity in rearing upon the old world a new civilization, a new political system, and new states, served to envelop the true substance of Christianity with a cloud of myths and tales.

Every great event in history excites the poetical imagination of the people, who entwine it with a never-fading wreath of tales and romances. The siege of Troy formed the center of a brilliant cycle of romantic tales, of which Homer's poem has been handed down to posterity. The founding of Rome has been adorned with the most marvelous adventures. Innumerable tales and mysterious prophecies predicted the future greatness and military glory of the infant city. Romulus, this mythical personage, like all the prominent characters of the classic ages, could be nothing less than the offspring of a god, and Numa found it the easiest way to popularize his excellent laws among the untamed Roman inhabitants by ascribing them to the direct inspiration of the apocryphal nymph Egeria.

But even more than the classic times were the middle ages the period of miracles and tales. The old and redoubtable hero, Charlemagne, gathered around him an endless chapter of fables, and the adventures of the battle of Ronceval are still popular with old and young. In England poets immortalized the round table of King Arthur by the most pleasing romances.

Even after Protestantism had begun to stretch its bony hands for the miracles and myths of medieval times, the German people still adhered to their belief in the supernatural. We find the person of Wallenstein robed in an almost impenetrable veil of fiction, in which his well-known astrological experiments play an important part.

Not only the remote ages, but even our own skeptical century presents enough examples to demonstrate how deeply the belief in and the love for the supernatural are rooted in the people, and the country of Diderot and Voltaire, more than any other, shows how almost every day new miracles may appear before the people. The belief in Napoleon I.—of which Heine says that it forms to-day the only religion of the French people—has produced in this century more romances and mythical adventures than the siege of Troy. The historical person of the victor of Austerlitz is even now shrouded in a mist of romantic tales, which in future ages will only be successfully penetrated by the impartial eye of the historian, but which will always be accepted as historical facts by the people.

As we witness everywhere in history that the great historical events and personages hav been the cause of innumerable fictions and tales, we find this especially the case with Christianity. Its Iliad and Odyssey are the four gospels, which, according to the best and most erudite critics, were written about two hundred years after Christ. The miracles related in the gospels are certainly not the inventions of designing priests and deceiving monks, but are purely the outgrowth of a pious folk-lore which adorned and beautified the graves of the great martyrs to liberty with the immortal wreaths of romance and fiction. To the uneducated and simple-minded it always appears impossible to explain great and extraordinary events in a common and natural way—every weird and majestic natural phenomenon, both in this and the Old World, bears witness to this; how, then, could we expect the Hebrew, the Roman, and the Germanic races of those times to offer any other explanation for the sudden and enormous achievements of Christianity than the direct intervention of God himself?

It is a beautiful and honorable trait of humanity, seen everywhere in history, that the powerful and great ones were exalted to the rank of gods by their grateful people. This poetical idea, peculiar to all civilized races, manifested itself especially in the case of Christianity, as here the flowery imagination of the orient blended with the simple and natural faith of the Germanic and other western aborigines. The latter no doubt had more part in the formation and dissemination of Christianity than the Hebrews, and probably as much as the Romans.

While Christianity gradually developed more and more in the realm of myth and fiction, degenerating eventually into the most abstruse prodigies of medieval legend and traditions, this religion acquired a concrete historical shape in Roman Catholicism, the Greek church, and the thousand and one different sects, of which every single one claimed to possess the only true and unadulterated Christianity. All these different forms of belief and confessions which in the Christian religion are more numerous than in any other, are equally related to the original, and each different form develops a new phase of the parent religion. Christianity is responsible for all its historical consequences; responsible alike for the funeral pile of Huss and the burning of Servetus; for the Crusades and the Thirty Years' war; for the revolting cruelties of Torquemada and his successors; for Gregory the Seventh, as well as for Luther, Melancthon, Wesley, and Knox.

For us there exists but one Christianity—that one which is embodied in history; and whoever searches for any other kind of Christianity—a moral, symbolic, and philosophical one, or for an original Christianity—forgets that in the history of humanity, as in natural history, causes and effects, reasons and consequences, motivs and results, are only two different sides of one and the same power.

The contradictions between the original principles of Christianity and its historical results and outgrowths hav often misled and perplexed the profoundest thinkers. They recognized the grand and noble aim and principle of Christianity, but failed to find them realized in its historical consequences, and therefore believed that the genuin and true Christian religion had yet to be born.

If we may quote an old and well-known anecdote as an example, these people resemble the man who, after accepting the wager to eat an entire calf, received it served up in a variety of small dishes, and, after having finished the meal, still impatiently asked, "But where then is the calf?" The various forms of Christianity hav long since surfeited their stomachs, but still they keep asking for the true and genuin religion.

It is the essence of all religions, as the great philosopher Feuerbach said, that they accomplish just the reverse of that which they promis. The dualism between heaven and earth, spirit and body, God and man, which forms the groundwork of all religions, necessarily produces these contradictions. Christianity promises to assist all human beings to everlasting bliss, but only in another world; in this world it has done its best to bring the greatest misery among men.

It proclaims the equality of all men in the world beyond, but here it has served to create the greatest inequalities among men. It promises us everlasting liberty in another sphere, while in this world it banishes every kind of liberty, and cannot even tolerate freedom of thought. Its teaches us that love is the supreme law, and yet no other event in history has ever had to answer for so much bloodshed, so many cruelties, and such terrible wars, as Christianity.

The pope, in his religious language, calls himself the servant of servants; but, translated into our mundane tongue, he is called the prince of princes, the tyrant of tyrants.

Schiller says: "Man portrays himself in his gods." The different religions are therefore only the reflections of the respectiv human conditions, and, like all mirages, show us merely the reverse of the picture held before them.

Instead of comtemplating Christianity from a religious point of view, we should analyze it in a practical sense. The ideas of Christianity must not be symbolized any more in religious pictures, but should be realized in practical facts; this would be the only way to successfully dispose of it. Miracles only exist as long as man has not learned to understand the natural phenomena. Only beyond the realm of knowledge is still room for belief in the supernatural; only in so much and so far religion has still its sway, as the religious ideas hav not incorporated themselvs with the people and become a living reality, fact, and practice.

From the advanced standpoint of the present time, we may address the same words to Christianity which Christ used regarding the Hebrew religion and the Old Testament—"We are not come to destroy, but to fulfil."

We only intend to deprive Christianity of its religious form. After having once become a reality, it will disappear from the world as well as Hegel's or Kant's philosophy disappeared after their principles had once taken possession of science and become the common property of the people.

When the essence of the Greek religion, the worship of the beautiful, the true, and the pure, had become embodied in the Greek people; when the sculptors had immortalized it in marble, and the great dramatists in their tragedies; when the religion had become the character of the people and realized itself in all the spheres of Greek life—upon this altitude of Hellenic culture the ancient and pious belief vanished, the mysteries paled before the more beautiful reality, the unknown revealed itself before the more potent reason. Never before was Apollo so powerful and so real among the Greeks as at the moment when Socrates forever destroyed the belief in him.

But when is the Pericleian age to arrive? when will the Socrates of Christianity appear? Slowly, and after many struggles, the world is preparing for the advent. Inventions of many kinds, new ways of traffic and communication, common interests and convictions, even now unite the different nations in one great alliance, which is daily growing mightier and stronger than any union of states the world has ever known before. The mental liberation of the whole human family and the spiritual union of all nations hav become the watchword of our times. In this we see the original ideas of Christianity—liberty, equality, and brotherhood—verified and become the mighty lever in the history of our times.

They smoulder in the heart of every patriot; they are emblazoned on the banners of every revolution, and are the ruling thoughts in every great movement of the age. When at last we see these words become a living truth, Christianity, like the sphynx whose conundrums had been solved, will hav been revealed to the whole world, and will hav ceased to be a mystery!

CARL E. OCKELMANN.

Infidel Philosophy.

Mosheim says: "It was an act of virtue to deceive and lie for the church when by that means its interests might be promoted" (vol. i, p. 382).

This doctrin is plainly taught in the New Testament (Rom. iii, 7): "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged a sinner?"

Though centuries hav rolled by, the times hav not changed in this regard. I will giv the half of my income while writing this article for a well-authenticated case of a Christian being called to judgment by another Christian for lying in the interest of the church. I ask any man to ask himself if he knows a single Christian—one who is a real thoroughbred—who will not lie when the interests of the church demand it.

Do they not all join in traducing the characters of Voltaire, Thomas Paine, Robert G. Ingersoll, and every other outspoken Infidel of any note? Is there an outspoken Freethinker who would consider his character safe in their keeping? Look at some of their reports of our conventions. One would be led to suppose that there was not one decent person in attendance. Only a short time ago, in my presence, a prominent Christian referred to the Hornellsville Convention as a place where only lewd women congregated. If a Christian can be found who stands up squarely and impartially between the church and the outside world, or will award an Infidel his just dues on all occasions, let him stand up and claim the chromo.

The late imprisonment of Mr. Bennett is a case directly in point. Under a strict construction he violated no law either of the state in which he lived or of the United States. His offense was against the church and not against society. The church demanded his imprisonment and he was imprisoned for the protection of the church, not for the protection of society. Members of the church, and even ministers, hav been guilty of real and atrocious crimes, and by and through the influence of the church hav escaped the meshes of the law. Any system that thus warps and distorts the minds and judgment of men cannot emanate from an impartial God.

Robert G. Ingersoll is the giant of the nineteenth century. Compliments from an enemy are always to be credited; those from friends may sometimes be reasonably questioned. Ecclesiastical giants all over the land hav engaged him, and in every engagement the slaves of superstition hav claimed that he has been annihilated at every encounter. If all these claims are to be allowed, then there remains not so much of Mr. Ingersoll as the two Kilkenny cats could boast of. These claimants know not the high compliment they pay to him; it is equal to that paid to the military prowess and genius of Napoleon, when all Europe was on his track. From Judge Black and Talmage down to the lowest country minister who pounds a school-house desk for cold victuals, Col. Ingersoll has received attacks, and each has claimed a victory. But the truth is, no victory has been won. The fact that they are still pounding away at the solid walls of his arguments shows that they themselvs are aware of the hollow pretense. If the walls had been breached and the city captured, their attacks would hav ceased long ago. Mr. Ingersoll is too great a man not, in a measure, to be aware of his own greatness. When his arguments are met and he is fairly driven to the wall he will know it—the whole country will know it—and there will be an end of the contest. Fools only would belabor a dead lion. This constant firing from the celestial battery, rightly interpreted, is the highest compliment ever paid to any man since the days of Thomas Paine.

Analyze the average Christian and he does not differ materially from a Yankee pedler. The pedler drives the best bargain he can with his customer, and the Christian drives the best bargain he possibly can with his God. He does not offer any more prayers or giv any more to the church than he thinks will barely be sufficient to obtain a through ticket to the New Jerusalem. He does not giv to the church because he is liberal or generous, nor does he pray because his soul goes out in gratitude to a being whom he regards as the source of every blessing. He would neither pray nor giv if he thought he could get to heaven without it. He is anxious to get to heaven because he has heard of golden crowns and harps. If ever he should obtain such valuable prizes he would ransack the holy city in search of a heavenly broker in order to realize on his venture. Then again he has smelt brimstone in his sleep, and dreamt of boiling caldrons and sooty devils. Though there is not enough of his little soul to make much of a fizzle, yet to be "done brown" in a brimstone fire and shaken up on a red-hot, three-pronged fork, is so awful to his cowardly mind that he would willingly giv to Old Clootie the privilege of roasting the whole human family, including the mother who bore him, the wife of his bosom—yea, even his own children—if he could obtain a through ticket on the celestial railroad. All the bank defaulters who belong to the church, Guiteau who went from the gallows right home to his "lordy," Comstock who carries his smutty soul in his satchel, the ministers whose true inwardness is read and known by many sisters in the church, ten thousand murderers who hav leaped from the scaffold clear over the walls of the New Jerusalem, are to be his companions. Now, I hav studied the celestial map closely, taken into consideration the character of the inhabitants, and hav made up my mind that I do not want to emigrate to that country. From the best information I hav been able to obtain, all the little, narrow-minded church sneaks are going to inhabit heaven, while all the noble, generous, heroic thinkers will inhabit hell. I prefer the latter as companions, even though the climate might be disagreeably warm.

When a man becomes afraid that something will be found out which he would anxiously conceal from the public, from that moment he becomes a slave and loses his manhood. He foolishly supposes that every honest man is on his track, and half believes that his guilt is as well known to others as it is to himself. His hang-dog look will be read and known of all men. He who would preserve his manhood and boldness must beware of dark corners and unclean places in his mental chamber, living day by day in such manner that if every act were exposed to public gaze no blush would be brought to the cheek. This constitutes real manhood—true greatness. When a man's mind is constantly tortured with fear that some wrong act will be made public, he can only act as a sneak and a coward. When the young hav been taught that they inherit a moral taint from our first parents, that they are infected with guilt, the germ of true manhood has been poisoned. From the moment this feeling of guilt is made to rest upon the mind, the road to true greatness is hedged in. Lofty aims are not the natural outgrowth of a guilty mind. To gather in nine-tenths of the youth of our land and teach them that in some mysterious way they are under a cloud of guilt, superinduced by an act committed nearly six thousand years ago, as is done in our Sunday-schools, is the blackness of wickedness. The practice of the flat-head Indian mother does not leave a worse impression upon the head of her child than this Sunday-school teaching leaves upon the mind. To imbue the young mind with a sense of guilt has a tendency to transform the noblest specimens of the human family into sneaks, and load them with dead weight when they start in the race of life. The amount of mental mischief which the church has wrought can never be estimated. Every well-wisher of his race should set his face against this kind of teaching.

A word in regard to Spiritualists is now in order. I hav been pained to see a disposition manifested on the part of some to fire solid shot into the Spiritualistic camp. So long as no man can be positivly sure that he has received all the truth, should he not be tolerant and forbearing? Though my mind has never been convinced of the truth of Spiritualism, yet I am compelled to say that positivly I do not know but it may be true. While it might be difficult for the Spiritualist to demonstrate the truth of his theory, it would equally puzzle the unbeliever to disprove many things claimed by the Spiritualist. This being the case, is not this cross-firing bad policy? Does it not tend to weaken us and giv the common enemy aid and comfort? It must be admitted that the liberal Spiritualists hav done much to open the eyes of the superstitious. The fall of man, the plan of salvation, and most of the superstitions of the church they hav fought as manfully as we hav. In this they hav done our work; for this we owe them something besides, and better than, Greek fire and shot and shell. Would it not be better to strive to cultivate fraternal feeling than to make them feel that we are their enemies? We are still wearing the manacles of the church; its burden we are still compelled to carry. Let us unite and charge the foe, and settle our little differences when we are free.

A FEW WORDS WITH J. W. BRANN.

I stated that "there never was a soul or mind or thought without a physical organization—a nervous system and a nerve center."

Mr. Brann says "reverse this." That is, he claims that there is "a soul, mind, etc., without a nerve center," etc. Will Mr. Brann be kind enough to giv an instance?

I further stated that there may be brain without mind, as in the case of idiots, but never mind without brain." This, Mr. Brann says, is a "positivism;" in other words, he takes issue.

"Some idiots are mere automata, exhibiting scarcely any sensibility so external impressions" (National Encyclopedia).

This is authority that brain exists without mind. Let Mr. Brann show that mind can exist without brain. Mind without brain is too much like motion without matter.

Many years ago I was kicked by a horse. I was alone, and there is evidence that I lay some hours in an unconscious state. These hours were blotted out of my existence—it was a perfect blank. There was no light, no darkness, no past, no future, no heat, no cold, no suffering, no enjoyment. I neither heard, felt, saw, nor realized anything. There was no mind. Why? Because the brain, which alone can produce mind, had been injured and could not perform its proper function—the "fiddle" was unstrung and could not produce the music of thought. Will Mr. Brann tell where the mind was during the disability of the brain, and for whose benefit it was acting? Now, if "the brain develops only as the mind impels it," why did not the mind impel the brain to work notwithstanding the injury? It would seem that if the mind can "impel" the brain to develop, it ought to be sufficiently potent to keep it in action, or even to cause a dead brain to act, if "there is a principle of mind or thought which produces organisms." According to Mr. Brann's philosophy, in order to stop the working of the brain the mind should hav been kicked. There is almost an immeasurable difference between the mind of Herbert Spencer and that of a South Sea Islander, but no more than there is between the two brains. Why is it that these powerful minds are always the result of the finest brain organizations? If mind can "produce organisms," why are not Herbert Spencers found among the South Sea Islanders?

E.M. 283, 56th day.

JOHN PECK.

What is Prohibition?

I am sure all Liberals will pardon me for yielding to my inclination to enter the discussion upon prohibition so far as to express my views upon the subject from a woman's standpoint.

It strikes me that the word prohibition ought to hav no especial terror, nor fall with ominous heaviness upon the ears of Liberals. We never had a more direct prohibitory law than the one that says, "Thou shalt not kill," and yet Liberals hav not been slow to accept its teaching. In fact, it has woven itself into our very nature, until we not only prohibit killing the body, but even prohibit killing the thought until it has run its course and proven its merits. Even then we do not kill it, but if meritorious it livs on, a part of our common riches; if otherwise, it dies from lack of this essential element.

Now, if it is right to prohibit murder, right to protect liberty of thought and conscience, how can it be wrong to prohibit any evil that has proven itself an enemy, not only to life, but murderous to thought and stupefying to conscience?

The cry against prohibition upon the ground of interference in self-government is but the voice of the evil and not the individual, and reminds me of the great outcry in reference to constitutional rights some twenty years ago, when the effort was being made to prohibit slavery of another type. We all know that the person who has formed the habit of using alcoholic drinks is incapable of self-government. He is in the hands of a merciless ruler, and must yield whenever the means to gratify the demands of habit are within his reach.

Then why talk of the right of the individual to govern himself? It is nonsensical.

For the sake of argument, a person who has not formed the taste for drink may say that by prohibition his rights to govern himself are tampered with; the absence of temptation doing away with the necessity of the effort of self-control. But when we come down to the truth in the case we find that aside from strong drink there is occasion for stronger effort in order to arrive at a perfect self-control than is usually met with.

It seems to me that the very fact that inebriates do vote for prohibition should teach us the necessity for prohibitory laws, and make us ashamed to class prohibition and slavery as brother evils. It would do to call slavery and the rum traffic brothers, because the march of the two evils leave like miseries in their pathway.

Would you know the origin of prohibition and what it is? It is the, as yet, unachieved result of woman's prayers and children's tears. It is the effort of love to save its offspring from a pitiless monster. Talk of it being the child of coercion! It originated in sighs and groans and breaking hearts. It is on an errand of mercy and will never cease its efforts until its object is attained. Never!

CARRIE MOORE.

THE first volume of "Songs of the Morning" has been compiled by Caleb S. Weeks, who is also author of much of the collection. This is by far the best hymn-book we hav yet seen offered to the Liberal public. Mr. Weeks has executed his task with care and skill, and has given an index of subjects, a table of first lines, and a very good index of suitable tunes. This volume contains original songs; the next will consist of selections. The book is well printed on good paper.—This World.

Does Anybody Know Him?

We hav received the following inquiry from our Canadian friend Meikle:

ROCKLAND, ONT., April 4, 1883.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Do you know anything about the man Ploomberg? The Christians are using him as a handle here, and so much so as almost to lead one to infer the whole affair is a put-up job.

GEO. G. MEIKLE.

With the above letter came this slip, cut from the Montreal Star of the 30th ult., which explains the cause of the inquiry:

"Last Friday night a lecture on 'Voltaire and Paine' was advertised to be delivered in the Mechanics' Hall, by one Ploomberg, who had been extensivly billed around the city as 'The Great Infidel.' The affair proved a failure in every way, and it was supposed the lecturer had betaken himself elsewhere in order to find a more appreciativ public. Such, however, was not the case, and to-day it was reported among his friends and acquaintances that he had abandoned his Atheistical doctrin and joined the ranks of the Young Men's Christian Association.

"In order to verify this report, a representativ of the Star called upon Mr. Ploomberg this morning at the New York House, where he resides, and interviewed him on the subject. Mr. Ploomberg, who is a tall fair young man of somewhat foreign aspect, declared himself as not only willing but anxious to make public what might be styled his instantaneous conversion, and the extraordinary and novel sensations that accompanied it. The convert began by stating that he was a man who had thoroughly studied the subject, and, as it were, built up a wall of facts and circumstances between himself and religion, so much so that life was hardly worth living. Since his unsuccessful lecture he had pored over the matter to the utter exclusion of everything else. On last Sunday evening, Mr. Ploomberg says, he was writing a letter to his father, who had for the last two years been unsuccessfully endeavoring to convert him to Christianity, when he came to the word 'Infidel' and paused to reflect on the exact meaning of the word. As he realized that it meant a total denial of the existence of a god, a feeling of dread came over him, accompanied by a sudden chill. The feeling of despondency increased so that he could not continue writing. It seemed as if he could see into his own brain, and the sight was a hideous one. It was as if the soul was trying to overleap the barriers of the brain's imagination. Dark thoughts of suicide entered his mind. 'It seemed to me,' said Mr. Ploomberg, earnestly, 'as if my soul had just been awakened from a long sleep, as if it had been hidden where the light of God could not shine upon it.'

"Mr. Ploomberg then went on to describe the tempest of passion that swept over him. He threw himself on his bed, but it seemed as if he was suffocating. He threw open the window and gazed on the pale stars just beginning to peep forth. Seizing his hat he rushed forth into the streets, and, hardly knowing whither he was going, took his way to the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association. It being about half-past seven at this time, he found no one there. Unable to rest, he again sought the streets and strode blindly on, his mind full of maddening thoughts. Finding himself in front of the Notre Dame cathedral, he went in there, and plunged his hands into the holy-water fonts, in the hope of finding relief from his sufferings. Emerging from the sacred edifice, he next wended his way to the St. James street Methodist church, and entering there, stayed about twenty minutes listening to the services. Mr. Ploomberg asseverates that he found his mind somewhat eased by these religious surroundings, but yet he could not stay there; and issuing forth, he again sought the Young Men's Christian Association. There he met with some of the officers, to whom he stated who he was and the cause of his trouble. He was cordially received and everything done that could suggest itself to ease his tortured mind. Prayers were said over him, and he was received as a member of the association.

"'The moment I entered the building,' said Mr. Ploomberg, 'my suffering ceased. I felt that I was a believer in Christ, and that I had redeemed the past.'

"Mr. Ploomberg said that he was anxious to hav every one know of his sudden conversion. Before concluding, he informed the reporter that his name was Peter Ploomberg, that he was twenty-five years of age, and a canvasser of photographic albums. He was born in Stockholm, Sweden, and had come out to this country some fourteen years ago. His father resides in Pleasant Hill, Ky. It has only been for the past four or five years that he has been a professed Infidel. Previous to that he had tried all religious sects; been a Quaker, Shaker, Swedenborgian, Freethinker, etc. He had also delivered lectures on Infidelity in Wisconsin. Mr. Ploomberg said as his visitor took his leave that he expected to leave the city on Monday next.

"The reporter visited the Y. M. C. A. rooms and was informed by the secretary that the facts above stated were perfectly true, and that Mr. Ploomberg was now a zealous member of the association."

We never heard of Mr. Ploomberg before, and very much doubt if any one else, outside of the Y. M. C. A., ever did. We incline strongly to the theory of friend Meikle that it is a "put-up job" by the dishonest Christians of Canada to make capital. Either that or Ploomberg is some escaped lunatic who should be looked after by his friends and rescued from the disreputable people he has fallen among. Any one knowing the exact circumstances of this case will greatly oblige by sending us the facts.

An Intimation from Mr. Charles Watts.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: On the eve of my departure for England permit me to express my sincere thanks to the many American and Canadian friends who, during my brief sojourn in this country, hav shown me so much kindness. Their hearty recognition of a humble but earnest English worker in the great cause of Liberalism will long be remembered by me as being amongst the most pleasing incidents of my public career. The great success of my lectures in every northern and western city I hav visited affords me unqualified satisfaction and most gratifying remembrances. I much regret that at the last moment I hav been unable to accept several invitations to lecture for Liberal associations on account of being compelled to return to England. However, it is my intention to revisit the States at no distant date, when I hope to make a more extensiv tour through the north and west districts. In the mean time all communications for me should be sent to 17 Johnson's Court, Fleet street, London, E. C., England.

CHARLES WATTS.

[Mr. Watts sailed from New York on Thursday April 5th.—ED.]

Farewell to Charles Watts.

Fair was the day—Spring's glory in the air,
The wide horizon with rich promis gemmed,
The waters gleaming while the vessels rode Laden with many a hope for lands remote;
Oh, how the glorious banners swept the breeze,
Tossing with light effulgent, blending rays
Of England and Columbia's happy flags,
Mingling like streams of fire, disclosing still
The splendor of the power that binds the world
So that the ocean is a jeweled link,
A liquid chain that makes all nations kin.
Amid this beautiful and glowing scene,
Good friends, we sent our wishes home with you,
And many a signal from our heart went forth
To make your pathway o'er the changing sea
As sunny as the skies that smiled that hour;
For we were bound by thoughts sublime and great,
The new and radiant visions of the soul,
That make the future like a golden morn.
We had been close with nature and her truth,
And reveled in the light that still but few
Hav caught from her fair face; we had beheld
What yet may be of beautiful and grand
When superstition's chains are flung aside,
And man's free thought is regnant, and his heart
Can pour its riches like the chainless sea;
We had touched hights serene and vast of hope
And joy, and communed where the light of science bursts
In golden wonder, and from the reckless crowd
Had passed with choice and noble spirits to the seat
Where reason shines with cloudless and keen beams;
And thus the glory of that royal day
When spring's sweet earnest flooded sea and sky,
Dropping unbounded treasures at our feet,
Was a fit symbol of our friendship's zest,
Which all the rolling waters cannot quench.
Farewell, we say, and fare ye well again,
Brave hearts, and may old England's snowy cliffs
Be warm with welcome to your pilgrim feet;
But not a warmer welcome there is your's
Than what shall greet you from Columbia's shore—
'Tis farewell now, but it is greeting still;
The battle is not o'er; we must join hands,
And the deep thought that sweeps the world around,
Mightier than oceans or the flaming sun,
Shall bring us face to face, and glowing words
Must be thy gift again to freedom here.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Peter Cooper's Religious Belief.

The Rev. M. B. Schermerhorn, pastor of the new Theistic church which meets in Agricultural Hall, prefaced his sermon last Sunday evening with the following remarks upon the religious convictions of Peter Cooper:

Peter Cooper was for years a prominent advocate and representativ of this broad and reverent faith which this church stands for; the basis of this church more nearly than that of any other religious organization of this city, and, so far as I know of, in this country, represents the convictions of religious truths which to him were most dear and sacred. The last religious communication from him to the public was made from this platform three Sunday evenings ago. On this occasion he took special care to send me selections from his published writings which bore most directly upon his favorit theologic belief. He sent me to read to the congregation of that evening and also to disseminate as widely as I could to the public his favorit ideas of one only God the universal father, revealed by nature, revealed by science, revealed by all the great religious teachers of the world, whom alone men should worship, not presuming in the act of worship even to name any other name in connection with that of the Heavenly Father. He took pains also to send for me to read his "Conversation with an Episcopalian Bishop," who visited him evidently to try and convert him in his old age to trinitarian views—wherein he (Mr. Cooper) firmly replied that he was, and should doubtless continue to be, a believer in one God the Father, and intimated that, so far from being ashamed to die a Theist and to let it be so recorded in history, it was his great desire that this might be the case. These, then may be proclaimed as his last words—words, as it were, from his deathbed to the religious world. The religious belief of Peter Cooper, as thus outlined, he with great earnestness restated to me in two brief conversations which during the past three months I was permitted to hav with him. In both of these conversation he expressed much impatience with—to use his own language—"those idolaters who worship Jesus in the place of or in connection with Almighty God." And in his last conversation he expressed—as he did to me ten years ago—dissatisfac- with this conservativ form of Unitarianism, which, as he said, "approaches or seems to approach, this idolatry by saying in prayers, hymns, and sermons, 'Lord!' 'Lord!' to Jesus and Almighty God interchangably." In brief, his latest words to me, also his last words to the public, were—only with increased fervor of conviction—the same which for many years he had taken every favorable opportunity to utter, both publicly and privately—"There is one only God, the universal father, revealed by nature, by science, by all the great religions of the world, and worship belongs to him alone."

Professor Adler said, in the course of his lecture at Chickering Hall: Here was one man in this city who understood the magnitude and the grandeur of the interests of education, and who in a long and beneficent life put into practice the humane convictions with which his soul was filled. Let this audience rise from its seats while I speak with reverence and admiration the name of Peter Cooper. Who demanded in his case of what creed he was or to what party he belonged? He himself declared of his religion that if must be freed from creeds and human devices in order that it might become a true science and rule for the guidance and conduct of men. He was an American through and through; but more than all in his magnificent sympathies for the laboring classes. Of the composer Wagner we hear that he built himself a mausoleum during his life-time, but this man built himself a monument of useful influence, not of cold, barren marble; a monument that will not pass away.

Theology and Development.

From Beecher's Sermon Last Sunday.

I think it may be said that the difference between the school of advanced thinkers in theology and the school of conservativ, orthodox thinkers in theology is the struggle between the spirit of hatred and the spirit of love. The orthodoxy, with all the great work that it has done, has yet conceived its notions of justice as a punitiv power. Such systems of theology as that, which centers on violent, cruel, destroying justice, is dissatisfying. There is a section of men that see and feel that love is god and that it is the marrow of the great religious system that is to prevail finally. The whole civilized Christianity of the world hitherto has been based upon the doctrin of the fall of the whole human family in Adam. They never did fall. They never could, for they were born at zero. And yet it is the absolute foundation upon which the current theologies and the theologies of the past hav been based.

I do not denounce the theologians who hold to the old views. We are never going to be saved by denouncing or cursing each other. But I can denounce theologies, and I take great pleasure in doing so, because they are not going to be saved anyhow. I think if I had somebody to teach me a little more logic and let me teach him a little more liberty we would both be better off. If I had alongside of me a man who believed in hell fire and damnation, and let me giv him my views of eternity and salvation, possibly he might be better off.

Two Clear-headed Judges.

From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Judges McCrary and Treat are not disposed to handle the cases in the Federal Court involving the circulation of indecent matter through the mails. Judge McCrary this morning delivered a verbal opinion in the case of Dr. Wood, alias Kaltmeyer, who was indicted for sending circulars of an improper character through the mails in violation of section 3893 of United States statutes. The evidence against the doctor was procured by means of the decoy letter system employed by the postal inspector's department, aided by the Society for the Suppression of Vice. The question of admitting such testimony is ruled adversely to the government in cases of sending obscene literature through the mails. No conviction can be had in a case where it rests upon testimony of that character. In cases of mail-robbery and counterfeiting, evidence established by the decoy system may be used. On another point the court held that the indictment should set out the offensiv letter verbatim.

Mr. Bliss: In view of your positiv rulings, which go beyond the question raised, and, I take it, very properly, an intimation is given the district attorney that cases of this sort cannot be successfully prosecuted under this statute, and, of course, it would be folly to proceed further with this or any other case of this nature. Therefore I ask leave to withdraw a juror and let a mistrial be entered. I take occasion to say, without desiring to manifest any disrespect to the rules of the court, that from my own experience the detection of crimes under the act is impossible except by the use of what are known as decoy letters.

The Court: They can prosecute him under the state law. You may detect him in it by this means under the state law.

Mr. Bliss: I am not speaking for the Society for the Suppression of Vice, but only for myself, as the prosecuting officer of the government. It is hardly to be supposed that persons sending for indecent books in good faith will come forward and proclaim their own infamy by prosecuting the offender. Therefore it is impossible to prosecute, because no postal official has the right to stop or open any packet coming through the mails and thus detect them, except by means of decoy letters. I take it this stops this class of cases. I am glad your Honor has been so free to pursue the question and settle it. For a long time it has been a question of doubt and dissension in the court.

Editorial.

Questions Answered.

CROTON, April 5, 283.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please answer a few questions in your paper.

1. Did Joseph Barker, after his discussion with Dr. Berg, turn Christian, as I hav been told by a Christian?

2. Did one of Col. Ingersoll's daughters join the church?

3. How was it about Ethan Allen's daughter asking her father whose belief was the best—his or her mother's, and his replying, "Your mother's?" BENJAMIN CARPENTER.

1. In reference to Mr. Joseph Barker professing Christianity after his discussion with Dr. Berg, the facts in the case constrain us to say that he did. But it was many years after the discussion. Mr. Barker's personal friends, we are credibly informed, hav ever denied the sincerity of his Christian professions, and claim that poverty and the helplessness of old age obliged the old man to accept the comforts of a good living at the hands of the church rather than die on the streets a decrepit Infidel beggar. He spent the most of his long life in an arduous warfare against the church, and when too old and weak to fight it longer, and Infidels unable to support him, he consented to a suspension of hostilities and a pretended renunciation of his Infidel doctrins for the sake of a home in his old age, and died in peaceful comfort at Omaha, a few years ago, we believe.

2. No. This story is a baseless lie.

3. This is another Sunday-school story with no foundation. It is in accord with the settled policy of the church to lie about every unbeliever, and in pursuance of that policy this yarn was invented for the edification of the young.

THERE are a considerable number of our subscribers whose date upon their wrapper indicates that they hav not sent us any remittance for their TRUTH SEEKER since January, 1882—some fifteen months—and a larger number whose time expired sometime during that year. To these, and especially the former, we would say that we need the money to pay the running expenses of the paper, and we ask them to remit without delay. We dislike exceedingly to be constantly dunning subscribers, but the necessity for it is not of our creation. The individual sums are not large, and will not inconvenience any one to send, but in the aggregate they foot up hundreds of dollars and are just what we depend upon to pay bills. Those in arrears will oblige us greatly by paying attention to this at once.

Notes.

MR. W. W. GRAVES, an old friend and supporter of THE TRUTH SEEKER, is now representing one of the most populous districts of Texas in the legislature of that state.

THE Advocate judges that the Rev. Mr. Schermerhorn's Theistic church will prove "a vein soon worked out." The mining technicality here introduced would better hav been omitted. It is liable to call to the mind of the reader recollections of infelicitous transactions in Isabella mining stock, which while it lasted was worked for all it was worth by the reverend editors of the Advocate.

THEY hav a TRUTH SEEKER in Leicester, England, in the form of a monthly magazine, edited by the Rev. John P. Hopps. Mr. Hopps appears to be a very liberal theological thinker, though not radical. But as we contemplate sending him THE TRUTH SEEKER in response to his request to exchange he will perhaps in a short time open his eyes to see the whole truth concerning the monstrous iniquity of the church.

THE Salvation Army has been driven away from Switzerland by the police. The Presbyterians of Geneva regarded them as heretical in practice, although their doctrins of hell and heaven were strictly orthodox. The army has retired to Ferney-Voltaire, a place Voltaire made free. The Salvationists abuse the heretic Voltaire without mercy, but had it not been for him they would seek in vain for places in Europe to conduct their fantastic services.

THE Christian Advocate says that those holding trust funds should never use them in their own business, and instances a recent case of a pious man who ruined a whole family in this way. This is correct and commendable, but how about religious editors who use their positions to puff bogus mines to their own profit? The Advocate is discreetly silent upon this sin. But it puffs Ocean Grove, N. J., a religious resort, and the question now arises, Do the editors own any property down there?

THE Jews of New York appear to be growing less religious. The rapid growth of the Jewish population of the metropolis, and the well-known wealth of many Israelites, ought, according to the Jewish Messenger, to result in the establishing of new synagogs from time to time; but the modern Jeremiah who edits that paper feels obliged to chronicle the fact that no such result appears. Holidays, when temporarily large congregations are organized, make it possible to form some idea of the masses of Hebrews who are not attached to regular shrines; and it is not cheering for the Messenger to contemplate the circumstance that so many, from choice, keep aloof from synagog influences. The trouble is that the synagog rituals are antiquated and unattractiv. Some of their rites are barbarous. Judaism is a drag on the minds of modern Jews, and it is a natural consequence that this religion, with its cargo of antique absurdities, should be left behind by those who are inclined to follow the current of the age.

SOMETHING like three hundred clergymen are at present gathered in New York to attend the East Methodist Episcopal Conference. Two or three black sheep in the form of confidence men hav been among them, and a Long Island brother was intercepted by a New York brother as he was about to sign a check for $175 in favor of a man who represented himself as a brother-in-law of a presiding elder. With clerical mining swindlers on one side, and non-clerical bunko steerers on the other, ministers visiting New York should keep a close grip on their pocket-books.

THE campaign instituted by the bigoted Christians of Germany against their neighbors, the Jews, has ended most happily for the latter, several of their prominent men being elected to Parliament, which is a guarantee against further governmental oppression. The great mass of the German people are rationalists, and deplored and vigorously opposed the fanatical crusade of the Christians. Persecutions usually lead to a more rapid spread of the persecuted cause, and this has been no exception. The imprisonment of Freethinkers in London will undoubtedly make two Infidels where there was one before, and Mr. Foote and his fellow-sufferers hav this thought to console them as they bend over the hard labor imposed upon them by the modern Jeffreys of England.

PROFESSOR FELIX ADLER now comes in for his turn among the objects of pulpit blackguardism. The Rev. J. P. Newman has said of him:

"He is an ecclesiastical robber; he has stolen from Christianity its great thoughts to elevate himself, and, with the meanness of an apostate Jew, he rejects the authority of his guide. Away with such Jews. We hav no room for them among the teachers of religion in this great city."

It is enough to say of the Rev. J. P. Newman that he has been seen on the platform of the Vice Society with Anthony Comstock and Joseph Cook, and has always lifted his voice in opposition to liberty. He is a sensationalist like Talmage, with no more regard for decency and truth. Professor Adler is a gentleman and a scholar, and it is almost an injustice to put his name in the same type with that of J. P. Newman, who is neither the one nor the other.

THE latest religious news that comes from Vienna, Austria, is to the effect that Spiritualism is spreading so rapidly through Bohemia that the bishop of that province has declared a belief in it equivalent to heresy. It is well known that among Catholics there is a somewhat general belief that the spirits of departed persons may in some way, supposed to be by the assistance of the Evil One, hold communion with former associates on earth. The belief is not much talked of by Romanists, but still it exists; and as it is so closely connected with the convictions of that large class of Freethinkers known as Spiritualists, it is perhaps not to be wondered at that dignitaries of the church look upon its growth as inimical to the "true faith." It is a form of progress, and progress is incongruous with Catholicism. Therefore it is heresy. Along with this news it may be mentioned that two hundred members of the Roman Catholic churches in Cincinnati hav become devotees of the spiritual philosophy.

BROOKLYN has an "apostolic healer." His name is Monck, and he has been known to relieve one hundred and one cases of disease in thirty-six minutes. He lays his hands on the patient, says a little prayer, and the business is done. He then pockets all the money the person cured can be induced to giv him, and he is making hundreds of dollars per day. The New York Tribune intimates that this heavenly healer is a humbug who plays upon the imagination of sufferers. It thinks that if people can be cured at about the rate of three a minute, there should be a visible decrease of mortality among the citizens of Brooklyn, but no such decrease appears. It is charged that Dr. Monck gets the patient's attention off from his pain, givs his brain a quick action for a moment, and says, "You feel better, don't you?" The patient, of course, answers yes. This trick, says the Tribune, is three thousand years old. Perhaps it was practiced in Palestine some eighteen hundred and fifty years ago by the person in whose name the apostolic Monck professes to work his marvels, and the Brooklyn charlatan may be as genuin a healer as his more talked of predecessor, and still be a humbug.

A GOOD specimen of the men who travel heavenward by hemp is Alexander Jefferson, now under sentence of death for a very brutal and unprovoked murder of two persons, both colored associates of himself. A few days ago a Mercury reporter called to see him, when he delivered himself of the following religious clap-trap:

"'When people see me they wonder how well I bear up and cheerful I am. Tell the public that it's not Jefferson's strength that keeps him up, but the strength of one higher in power and mind,' and he turned his eyes heavenward. 'The same man that keeps me up now will keep me up on the scaffold. I don't care what men may say, for they talked about the savior, and why not talk about me? No, no, I hav no fear of the future, and am ready to die and go to the Lord at this moment. I am a Presbyterian, but I believe that all men will be saved if they repent and seek Jesus.

"'This trouble of mine was a sad affair,
And now has left me in despair;
Though friendless and alone,
God will all my sins condone;
And when I mount the gallows high.
My soul he will take to his home in the sky.'"

It is a great pity these brutal wretches don't get to moralizing a little sooner in their worthless careers. It requires but little calculation to estimate the worth of a religion which has not the least tendency to restrain murderers, but once the murder committed permits them to get wings with the same facility accorded the Sunday-school boy who dies young. Gallows repentance and tears may be very acceptable to the Nazarene, who may from his associations be supposed to sympathize with criminals, but the victims of these snivelers would hav preferred more works and fewer words.

OUT in Marion, Ohio, they hav a revivalist named Weber who is making himself rather more conspicuous than ornamental. He is said to hav been graduated from the variety stage. The fact that his abler brethren of the cloth hav discarded hell does not in the least diminish his belief in that institution. He is given to pulpit pyrotechnics of the most lurid order, and the hearer possessed of a vivid imagination can almost see the coruscations of endless fire fall from the altar where he preaches. Such, at least, is the description which a correspondent resident in Marion givs of the Rev. Mr. Weber. At an evening meeting not long ago, a small boy, amused at the contortions of the reverend gentleman, smiled audibly with inward satisfaction at the thought that he was being entertained with a circus at the price of a prayer-meeting. The boy was ejected with great promptness, and the preacher returned to his prayer flushed with victory and eager for other small boys to conquer; but when a gentleman nearer the size of Mr. Weber ventured to smile also, the revivalist hesitated about grappling him, although a disinterested party offered to "keep the flies off" the belligerants during the exercises. He contented himself with mounting the mourner's bench which encircles the pulpit, and denouncing levity with the utmost vehemence. The devil wasn't going to run that church—not if he knew it. It did not take long for him to convince the members of the church that they had made a mistake in calling him to their community, and the regular pastor's embarrassment and humiliation were visible to all. The slang and violently abusiv language of Weber created a revulsion on all sides, and a Liberal element is making itself distinctly visible. Our correspondent surmises that now would be a good time for a Liberal lecturer to introduce himself into Marion.

THE Rev. Samuel Charlesworth, of Clapham Common, England, is afflicted with a daughter Maud, aged seventeen, blessed with rather more piety and brazen impudence than modesty or good sense. She is described as "nervous and devout," which is a cant phrase for what the world would call religious lunacy. This girl became interested in the Salvation Army movement, and determined to join that band of rowdies. Her father refused to allow her to leave home, and wrote to the leaders of the "army" pleading with them not to interfere with his child. Those individuals disregarded his wishes, and replied that the "service of Jesus" was paramount to all family ties. The old man tried to interest his daughter in less disreputable religious work, but all to no purpose. She must be a wanton in piety or in morals, perhaps in both. She donned the uniform of the army, went with Miss Booth to Geneva, and was summarily arrested for disorderly conduct. Nothing could hav suited her better, and she now poses as a "Christian" martyr. The worst feature of the case is that some people in England accredited with good sense uphold this crazy embodiment of unhealthy religious devotion, and even attempt to encourage other girls to follow her ill-advised example. It is about time that the Salvation Army should inaugurate a movement for the suppression of itself. Its methods lead to the degradation of its members, and it accomplishes no good purpose except to make its cause disreputable. Its women must abandon whatever sense of modesty or decency they may sometime hav been endowed with, and become the butt of public ridicule. Their "uniform" is grotesque and unbecoming, and their associations giv them the free-and-easy air of the dives. If there is anything from which women with that female weakness called piety need to be saved, it is the Salvation Army.

The Lecture Field.

W. S. BELL'S address during April will be Boulder, Col.

J. E. REMSBURG'S appointments for the next two weeks are as follows: Palmer, Kan., April 12th, 13th, and 14th; Seneca, 16th; Sabetha, 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th; Morrill, 21st and 22d; Rombinson, 23d; Leona, 24th, 25th, and 26th.

W. F. JAMIESON is engaged by the Chicago Liberal League to deliver his lecture, "The Clergy a Source of Danger to the American Republic." Mr. Jamieson can be engaged to deliver lectures throughout the spring and summer. His address is Lake City, Minn.

MR. E. C. WALKER writes: "You gave my address as Norway, Iowa. Other parties assert that it is Cedar Rapids, Iowa, while some correspondents still write to me at Florence, the old name of the office that is now known as Norway, Iowa. Permit me to say to your readers that my permanent address is Valley Falls, Kansas."

Indispensable.

From Man of April 1st.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, 21 Clinton place, New York, is more indispensable than ever. It is so various and interesting that it covers the whole ground. We started, for instance, to write an article about Dr. Dix and his fatal admissions, but found that this paper's editorial of March 24th, on "The Drift of the Times," had disposed of the whole matter, so that it is only needful to refer to it.

The account of Mr. Charles Watts and his farewell lecture and reception in New York will interest every Liberal. Joseph Cook receives another broiling, which it is shown that he deserves.

Man is a little paper with a big heart and two long heads on him. He has a kind word and cheerful greeting for everyone. We are sorry we hav to take the wind out of his sails so frequently, but until he shakes out his reefs, we shall be obliged to leave him hull-down on the horizon.

Translation.

The Tomb of Fanaticism.

[An examination of Lord Bolingbroke's doctrines. Written by Voltaire in 1767 and translated from the French by Avery Meriwether.]

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE CHILDREN OF COSTANTINE, AND OF JULIAN THE PHILOSOPHER, SURNAMED THE APOSTATE BY THE CHRISTIANS.

The children of Constantine were as Christian-like, as ambitious, and as cruel as their father. There were three who divided the empire, Constantine II., Constantius, and Constant. The Emperor Constantine I. had left a brother named Julius, and two nephews, to whom he had given some lands. They commenced by killing their father to increase the shares of the new emperors. At first they were united by their common crime, but soon separated. Constant caused Constantine, his oldest brother, to be assassinated, and afterward was killed himself.

Constantius, left the sole master of the empire, had exterminated almost all the rest of the imperial family. This Julius, whom he had put to death, left two children, one named Gallus, and the other the celebrated Julian. Gallus was killed and Julian was spared because, the latter having a taste for private life and for study, it was thought he would not be dangerous.

If there is anything true in history, it is that these first two Christian emperors, Constantine and Constantius, his son, were monsters of despotism and cruelty. It may be, as we have already insinuated, that in the bottom of their hearts they believed in no God; and that, scorning equally pagan superstitions and Christian fanaticism, they unhappily persuaded themselvs that divinity does not exist, because neither Jupiter the Cretan, nor Hercules the Theban, nor Jesus the Jew, are gods. It is possible, also, that tyrants, who generally unite cowardice and barbarism, may have been seduced and led into crime by the belief in which all Christians, without exception, then agreed, that three immersions in a vessel of water before death effaced all crimes and took the place of every virtue. This unfortunate belief has been more baneful to the human race than the blackest passions.

However it may be, Constantius declared himself orthodox, that is to say Arian, for Arianism then prevailed all over the East, as opposed to the Athanasian sect, and the Arians, previously persecuted, in turn became the persecutors.

Athanasius was condemned by a council at Sardis, by another held in the city of Arles, by a third held at Milan; he traveled all over the Roman empire, sometimes followed by his partisans, sometimes exiled, and sometimes recalled. The trouble in all these cities was about a single word—Consubstantiation. It was a scourge which had never, until then, been known in the history of the world. The ancient religion of the empire, which still survived with a certain splendor, derived a great advantage over Christianity from all these divisions. However, Julian, whose brother and all of whose family Constantius had assassinated, was forced to embrace the forms of Christianity, just as Queen Elizabeth for a while was obliged to dissimulate in her religion under the tyrannical reign of the infamous Mary, and just as in France Charles IX. compelled the great Henry IV. to go to mass after the massacre of Saint Bartholomew. Julian was a Stoic, of that sect both philosophic and religious which produced so many great men and never a wicked one—a sect more divine than human, in which the severity of the Brahmans and a few monks, without their superstition, was to be seen; in a word, the sect of Cato, of Marcus Aurelius, and of Epictetus.

It was a shameful and deplorable thing that this great man should be forced to conceal all his talents behind Constantius, just as Brutus was served by the Tarquins. He pretended to be a Christian, and almost affected imbecility in order to save his life. He was compelled at the same time to enter into a monastic form of life. At last Constantius, who had no children, declared Julian Cæsar, but sent him into Gaul, which was equivalent to exile. Then Julian remained without troops and money, surrounded by spies, and with very little authority.

The various German races very often crossed the Rhine for the purpose of raiding Gaul, just as they had done before the time of Cæsar and as they had often done since, until finally they subjugated them, and even that very small nation, the Franks, conquered all these provinces without trouble.

Julian organized an army, disciplined them, and compelled their admiration. He led them as far as Strasbourg, crossed the Rhine upon a bridge of boats, and at the head of an army weak in numbers, but animated by his courage, he defied a horde of barbarians, took their chief a prisoner, pursued them to the Hercinian forest, took from them their captives, both Roman and those of Gaul, the spoils the barbarians had captured, and imposed a tribute upon them.

To the ability of Cæsar he joined the virtue of Titus and of Trajan. He gathered, from all parts of the land, wheat for the support of his men in their exhausting campaigns, rebuilt villages, gave encouragement to the people, to their arts, talents, and privileges. Forgetting self, he worked day and night for the happiness of mankind.

Constantius, in reward, wished to remove him from Gaul, where he was too dearly beloved. He at first demanded the two legions which Julian had formed. The army was indignant and opposed it. The soldiers proclaimed Julian emperor in spite of his protests. The world was at this time luckily delivered of Constantius while marching against the Persians.

Julian the Stoic, foolishly called the apostate by the priests, was chosen without dissent by the people of the East and West as emperor.

The force of truth is such that Christian historians have been obliged to admit that he lived while emperor as he did in Gaul. Never did his philosophy madden him. He began in the palace at Constantinople by reforming the luxurious practices of Constantine and Constantius. The emperors at their coronation received weighty crowns of gold from all the villages. He reduced this onerous tribute to almost nothing. The frugal simplicity of the philosopher detracted in no respect from the majesty and uprightness of the sovereign. All the abuses and burdens of the court were reformed; and he had only two extortionate tax gatherers publicly executed.

He renounced his baptism, it is true, but he never renounced his virtues. Some have reproached him with superstition, but these reproaches admit he had religion. Why should he not have chosen the religion of the Roman empire? Why should he have been blamed for adopting the religion of Scipio and Cæsar rather than that of Gregory of Nazianzen and of Theodorus? He preferred the sect to which his father belonged, and with good reason, since under the old religion Rome had triumphed over half the earth, and under the new she had fallen into decay.

Far from persecuting the Christians, Julian wished to assuage their unseemly quarrels. His sixty-second letter proves that "under my predecessors many Christians were tormented, imprisoned, persecuted. A large number of those we called heretics were slain at Samos, in Paphlogonia, in Bithynia, Galatia, and in many other provinces. Their towns were pillaged and then destroyed. Under my rule, on the contrary, those who were banished were recalled; their confiscated goods returned. But to such a hight did their madness reach that they bedeviled each other, when they were not permitted to be cruel, and tyrannized over one another."

This letter alone is sufficient to expose the calumnies with which the Christian priests burden themselves.

There was a bishop in Alexandria, named George, one of the most seditious and passionate of Christians. He surrounded himself with his followers; he beat the pagans with his own hands; he demolished their temples. The people of Alexandria killed him, whereupon Julian in his tenth letter wrote to the Alexandrians as follows: "Alas! instead of keeping from me the knowledge of your outrages, you have permitted yourselves to be carried away by anger. You have committed the same excesses with which you reproached your enemies. George deserved death, but it was not for you to be the executioners. You have laws which were sufficient to dispose of such with justice," etc.

I shall not attempt to repeat or refute here all that is written in ecclesiastical history, for party spirit and faction hav always colored it. I shall pass on to the death of Julian, who lived too short a time for the glory and happiness of the empire. He was killed in the midst of a victorious campaign against the Persians, after his passage over the Tigris and Euphrates, at the age of thirty-one. He died as he lived, with the resignation of a Stoic, thanking the being of beings that he was about to mingle his soul with the divine and all-pervading spirit.

We are seized with indignation when we read in Gregory of Nazianzen, and in Theodoret, that Julian cast some of his blood toward heaven saying: "O Galilean, you have conquered." What stuff! What absurdity! Did Julian oppose Jesus? And was Jesus the god of the Persians?

We cannot read without disgust the discourse of that ill-tempered man, Gregory of Nazianzen, fulminated against Julian after his death. It is true, had Julian lived, Christianity ran the risk of being abolished. It is certain that Julian was a greater man than Mohammed, who exterminated Christianity in all of Asia and Africa. But everything must yield to destiny, and an unlettered Arabian destroyed a sect of unlettered Jews, that which a great emperor and philosopher was unable to do. But Mohammed lived long enough, and Julian lived too short a time.

The followers of Christ have ventured to say that Julian lived only thirty-one years, a short time in punishment for his impiety. They forget that their pretended divinity did not live longer than that.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

It is a brave and good man who pursues the right course, and who performs his duty faithfully.—D. M. Bennett.

Religious Experience.

It is customary for members in some churches on occasions to relate to each other their religious experience, which proves very beneficial in keeping the weaker brethren and sisters strong in the faith. I propose to imitate them by relating some of my personal religious experience, drawing afterward some anti-religious conclusions. I was born a Presbyterian, baptized a Presbyterian, given the bluest of the blue Presbyterian-hell-and-damnation doctrin in allopathic doses. I could believe nothing else, as I was taught nothing else. However, while believing it, I did not take kindly to it, for such terrible pictures of torment will repel, rather than draw, almost any child. Fortunately for me, when I was about ten years of age, a quarrel arose between the pastor and one of his flock, the brother accusing the pastor of fleecing him in a horse trade. The church took sides, some with the cheated brother and others with the pastor. The consequence was the church was so weakened by dissensions, quarreling, and bickering, that for a long time there was no Presbyterian preaching in the neighborhood.

This condition of things gave the Methodist church more room, and they waxed strong and grew mightily, offering "free grace" to all who would "come to Jesus just now." The change from the old Calvinist "decrees" to "grace freely offered," was to me a wondrous relief. I naturally like to see an equal chance for all, and here it was from the same old book: Free salvation to all who will embrace Jesus as a savior.

Young as I was, I breathed freer. It was one step toward the light, and I began to hope there was a chance for me at least equal with my fellows. From the Presbyterian pulpit I had been taught that if God chose or selected I would be damned, and must praise his very name even for that. The change was very great; and in the course of a few years I embraced the Methodist system of religion, and for six years poured my joys and sorrows, hopes, fears, and desires, into the ear of Jesus and Jehovah, sometimes imagining they were heard, and sometimes doubting. Occasionally I caught a stray beam of light from the ever-bright eyes of science. I learned that law pervades the universe, that nothing takes place without being caused. I discovered that I was under the necessity of making the conditions which brought about an answer to my prayers. I tried without the prayer; the result was the same. I was forced to the painful conclusion that all my prayers had been a useless wear and tear on the knees of my pants, as well as a waste of time.

At that time it was a painful conclusion. Now I reckon it as an era of the dawn, another grand stride toward the light. I now look upon all religions as the lower steps on the ladder which leads up from low mental conditions. If man owes anything to his fellows, or has any duty to perform toward them, it is to lift them as fast as possible out of the debasing condition in which religion holds them.

I am of opinion that we are retarded greatly in reaching the people with scientific knowledge because of the almost universal belief in a continued existence after death. Witness the holy horror on the countenance of the advocates of this idea if you do but hint at its fallacy. An advocate almost invariably ceases to be a truth seeker, and that fact ought to make us more careful to question at every step, especially since we hav been so confoundedly duped in the past. The idea of immortality without doubt arose from the innate desire to liv on. The most advanced, by teaching it, soon discovered the mighty hold it gave them upon the people. Then began the disposition to fix conditions for the poor dupes whereby they might enjoy the greatest happiness in that imagined hereafter. Hence the hells and torments for those who fail to follow the advocates, and heavens for those who did. It is easy to see how, step by step, the human race has been led into this interminable and unreasonable muddle of a future condition, either happy or unhappy. How complete and abject has been the sacerdotal bondage we all know. He who reads carefully and candidly the history of religion can never doubt the fraudulent position which all religions occupy. I hav no disposition to find fault with persons who believe they will play on golden harps, or with those who are sure there is a summer-land awaiting them in the beyond. I am as willing to giv respectful attention to their reasoning as to those who write in accord with my own views. I must, however, hav better reasons than I hav yet seen to compel me to climb down the ladder to the old step called "immortality." I am pretty thoroughly convinced that just so long as honest dupes are induced to believe that there is a grand concert composed exclusivly of harps away up above the clouds, or an immense floral display amid Elysian fields of perpetual summer, with no musketoes, just so long will they be imposed upon by the advocates as they hav been in the past. With that idea out of the minds of the people, how many of the "sacred" class would liv in ease and luxury on the hard earnings of the poor? How many men with dark cabinets would dupe the people by pretending to show the faces of dear departed friends?

The true friend of humanity is the person who givs them knowledge, and as nothing can be known of what there is after death, we hav left the far greater happiness of learning of the things around us here and now before death. I do not pretend to say that all the frauds would cease at once upon giving up the idea of a future continued identity, but it becomes apparent that the greatest fraud the world has known would hav no footing, leaving the people free to deal with problems of real importance. It is worth more to know the laws of health than to believe we are personally acquainted with Jesus, the Holy Ghost, or God Almighty himself. It is worth more to discover the best method of association, politically and socially, than to attend divine service three times every Sunday, and prayer-meeting five nights during the week. It is worth more to invent a better method of ventilation than to pray and shout in a revival meeting in a superheated room till twelve o'clock at night, even if sinners are flocking by the score to the blood-stained banner of King Emanuel. It is better to render an honest reason than to sit, night after night, in a darkened room, in front of a cabinet watching for glimpses of the shadowy forms and faces of dear departed ancestry. It is a well-known fact that as man gains knowledge credulity givs way.

Where science spreads her white wings darkness, fraud, and superstition slink away. Science, accurate, carefully classified information, givs us faith in ourselvs and helps to dispel the constant anxiety, fear, and dread which hang about the ghost worshiper. We owe more to the teacher of bugs and worms than to the teacher of a future life.

The man who shows me a stone, givs me its classification, mineral composition, and tells me the part of the world it comes from, is worth more to me than the man who promises to show me my grandmother's ghost "just as soon as conditions are favorable." The writings of George Eliot are of infinitly more value to the world than the incoherent slush of Swedenborg or John the revelator. I do not think that a ghost, holy or unholy, ever existed, and until I hav better evidence I must continue of that opinion.

Bishop Gilmour and Gov. St. John.

Leaving Linesville Friday, Feb 2d, I went to Cleveland. On board the Lake Shore train which brought me to this city was Bishop Gilmour, just returning from his six months' sojourn at Rome. The greatest demonstrations of joy were everywhere expressed at his safe return. At Ashtabula and other points along the route immense crowds were gathered and salutes fired. As we entered Cleveland a salute of twelve guns was fired, and as we rolled into the depot such a surging, excited mass of humanity I hav seldom seen. It seemed as if Cleveland's two hundred thousand inhabitants had all turned out to welcome the returning prelate.

The recipient of all this homage is a plain-looking old man of undoubted ability and great influence, and probably the most bitter foe to popular liberty in America. I closely scanned these Christian slaves who greeted him. Ignorance was stamped upon the faces of nearly all of them, brutality upon not a few.

And this vast multitude, filling the streets of Cleveland for a mile, was but a handful compared with the whole number of Catholic adherents in our land, the larger portion of whom are as subservient to the church's will as any despot's subjects ever were. With these great hordes of Catholics the battle for mental liberty must ultimately be fought. The Falstaffian brigades of Protestantism are being routed on every hand; but the disciplined legions of Rome are yet to be encountered, and deluded must he be who prophesies an easy victory.

While in Cleveland I went to hear our Kansas temperance orator, ex-Gov. St. John. He spoke in the Tabernacle, and his address was in many respects able and eloquent. But Gov. St. John is not a true reformer. If he were he would appeal more to the reason of intelligent men and women, and less to the passions and prejudices of Sunday-school children, clerical hypocrits, and feeble-minded old women who delight to do their bidding.

At our last state convention I had the honor to be one of the seventy-six who protested against his nomination. At the election which followed I was one of the thirty thousand Republicans who stepped out of the ranks, resolved that his nomination should not be ratified at the polls. I did this, not because he was a Christian and a Prohibitionist, but because he was a bigot and a demagog; not because he would keep whisky out of men, but because he would put superstition into them; not because he was instrumental in securing a temperance amendment to our state constitution, but because he favored a religious amendment to our national constitution; in short, because I knew him to be the sworn enemy of human liberty. Friends of temperance may deplore his defeat, but that defeat was a blow to priestcraft and a triumph for Freethought in Kansas.

We all recognize the need of a temperance reformation. But will the church bring about this desired reform? I am afraid not. Her methods are rather calculated to excite the disgust than secure the support of sensible people. The "Christian temperance reform," as developed in the West, is for the most part but another name for Christian intolererance. Falsehood, slander, social ostracism, and brute force are the reformatory instruments most used. John E. Remsburg.

Personal Right.

In the discussion of the question of prohibition that has been occupying some space in the columns of The Truth Seeker lately—a discussion, by the way, which is quite gratifying to us, as it will lead Liberals to a consideration of the question, and this consideration will lead them to take their position on the question upon principle and not upon prejudice—in the discussion of this question, a use has been made of "personal right" that, to me, is not in harmony with a logical or candid consideration of the question of prohibition.

The ability to do wrong is mistaken for a "personal right" to do wrong; an inclination, the result of an imperfect physical or moral development, is a "personal right;" the desire to indulge a debasing appetite is a "personal right" to such indulgence; a wish to degrade my manhood is a "personal right" to such degradation; a choice to brutalize myself is a "personal right" to become a brute; and so on, and on, till "personal right" spreads its protecting wings over all wrong, over all that is debasing, over all that is unmanly in man, till "personal right" takes its stand in the pathway of human progress and, with the authority of the Galilean god, orders mankind to fling at its feet, as trash, all the sacred principles of eternal right. And my brother Liberals call this "argument" against the prohibition of the liquor traffic.

I must confess a total incapacity to make such application of this sophistry about "personal right." Lest I appear ungenerous in calling the terminology of opponents "sophistry," let us examin it.

'Tis affirmed that "I hav the right to indulge in any debasing practice I may elect;" "a right to violate the most fundamental and comprehensiv principles of abstract right;" in short, "the right to do wrong. If this is not sophistry, it is, to say the least, an attempt to disprove a fact by the use of erroneous affirmation. The first thing wanted is proof that what you are pleased to term "personal right" is right. To do this, it must be shown to harmonize with the principles of sacred or eternal right; and this harmony the champions of individual sovereignty negativ by their own statement.

It appears to me they mistake personal potentiality for "personal right." Right is not affected by individual inclination, desire, power, or choice. I may desire to do wrong, but that desire is certainly not a personal right to do wrong; nor can my inclinations be tortured into rights but by giving to words an unfare, illogical, and unintelligent meaning. Wrong is wrong, and any amount of personal power, inclination, desire, choice, or privilege, restrained or unrestrained, cannot make it right.

It is my privilege, if unrestrained, to practice any personal indulgence, but it is not my right unless the indulgence be right.

But, "Nonsense, Brother Gantz," you will say; "we hav already admitted the indulgence of this debasing appetite is not right on principle." Certainly you hav; and it is to the logical animus of that admission that I wish to hold you in your discussion of prohibition, as applied to the liquor traffic; and further, it is this admission on your part that assures me your conception of right harmonizes with my statement in The Truth Seeker of Feb. 17th, that "man has the 'natural right' to so control his person as to fulfil the useful, ennobling, and elevating conditions of life; but he has no right, either natural or unnatural, to the control of his person in an abuse of the conditions of life which prostitutes all the nobler elements of his nature."

If this, then, is the true interpretation of right, it is certainly sophistical, in the discussion of prohibition, as it is understood generally, to talk about a personal right to do wrong.

The only question of right involved is the interference of one or more individuals with the personal wrong-doing of another individual. If what I choose to do in the exercise of my personality is right, then interference is barred by every principle of eternal right; but, if I choose to do that which is wrong, is interference barred by the same principles? I answer, No.

Here rests the question of prohibiting the liquor traffic, considered as to its primary effects. When the "secondary" effects of the traffic are taken into account, the pernicious character of which you also admit, the affirmation that it is right to interfere with this wrong, assumes a weight of truth that cannot be shaken by language that elevates personal desire, choice, and inclination to the dignity of personal right.

Let me make a few affirmations—they seem to form chief element of the discussion thus far; they occupy so little space, you know, and necessitate the the use by your opponent of lengthy arguments to refute the principles involved. The spirit of fairness by which you are actuated will, of course, allow us to use the same weapons you hav used so vigorously.

I affirm (1) That enforced statutory enactment, while in many cases pernicious, has been and is one of the chief factors in the civilization and elevation of man; (2) Prohibition is the very essence of law, and there is no law, however salutary its effect upon mankind in general, but can be tortured into a trespass upon the personal proclivities of some depraved human nature; (3) Each man or woman is the "proper" and "sole" judge of the "extent" and "legitimacy" of his or her wants only so far as a knowledge of these wants is comprehended by his or her intelligence. Outside of these limits human progress demands that deference be shown the judgment of superior intelligence.

The above affirmations are based upon these: (1) There can be no personal crime the influence of which does not extend beyond the corporeal limits of the personality committing the crime; (2) As, la jure divine naturæ, there can be no mental crime, as thought or opinion cannot become criminal till crystallized by action.

Universal mental liberty is the personal right of all created intelligence, and the attempt to identify prohibition of the liquor traffic with prohibition of thought and its expression, as has been done by some parties to this discussion, is an attempt to create a unity of a duality, which, to my mind, is equaled for absurdity only by the Christians' effort to erect a unity of their trinity.

Trusting I hav said nothing barred by the rules of gentlemanly discussion, and most earnestly wishing that in the further discussion of this question, or any other question the columns of The Truth Seeker are generously given to, nothing will be said personally wounding to the feelings of any one, I will make my bow. W. H. Gantz.

The Pension Law.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In The Truth Seeker of March 24th "C. I." seems to be worried over the pension law granting gratuities long after the end of the service. Now, as I understand the principle of pensions, they are for disabilities incurred while in the service, and the act of 1878 only carries out the contract, granting the pension from the date of discharge. If "C. I." had served three years in the army he probably would be a used-up community, for any person of ordinary judgment knows that no person could violate the laws of nature as the soldier was compelled to during the different campaigns without incurring the penalty, and to-day the war veterans as a class look at least ten years older than the men that stayed at home, and very few of them that served three years in the field without receiving a wound are sound physically to-day. I admit that the pension law is wrong, but not in the way that he claims. As the law now stands it is almost impossible for a man that served his country faithfully and went through every battle with his regiment to obtain a pension, the fact of his continued service being presumptiv evidence that he was not disabled, while those that were in hospital most of the time, and of no use to the service, hav a clean record. Now let us look at the law as it stood at the end of the service in regard to those who risked their dollars to save their dear country. The first act signed by President Grant was the credit-strengthening act, pledging the payment of the bonds in coin or its equivalent. This was a gratuity of between six and seven hundred million dollars to a class that had already received fifty per cent on their investment. I never heard a murmur from the press of the country about the change of contract in favor of the creditor. I will ask a few questions of "C. I." and then close. If it is right to exempt the dollar that was risked when our institutions were in danger from taxation, is it not right to exempt the man that risked his life? If it is right to remove all taxes from the national banks, that waited until the battles of Gettysburg and Vicksburg broke the backbone of the rebellion before they came to the front and invested in our bonds, should not the soldier's widow and children be exempt also? If it is right to pension the widows of our late presidents, Mrs. Lincoln, Tyler, Polk, and Garfield, at the rate of $5,000 per year, is it not right to pension every soldier's widow at $500 per year? If it was right when the war closed to pay the officers of the army three months' additional pay, should not the privates hav received the same amount?—as the three months' pay of the average officer amounted to nearly as much as three years' pay of a private. Has a republican government a right to lay hands upon the laboring class and compel them to shed their blood to preserve it, and exempt the wealthy upon the payment of money, and then compel the survivors to return and labor their lifetime, and their posterity after them, to pay from five to twenty pounds of hard-tack for each one that they consumed while in the field? No, "C. I.," there is no limit to the right of Congress to dispose of the public money, as long as it pops into the pockets of the favored few. Volunteer of 1861.

And Still It Is the Word of God!

The old King James translation of the New Testament has been compared with the revised version, and the result is announced as thirty-six thousand changes. That means that there are thirty-six thousand errors in the commonly accepted testament of the Christians, for the new version is not generally adopted. The church prefers to believe error in preference to truth, and is consistent in this rejection of the new version. Probably when the revised version is still further revised several thousand more errors will be found.

What a transformation God's word has undergone in the past fifteen hundred years! In the first place the title page of every testament is a lie. The Bible Society puts it forth that it is "translated out of the original Greek," when every member of that society knows there is no original Greek, and it is very certain that there never was of many of the books. Modern times can only show transcripts from transcripts of transcripts, and no manuscript can be traced back to within several hundred years of the time of the alleged events described. Everyone knows of the councils which deliberated upon the New Testament canon, how they were composed of ignorant and in some cases of brutal and drunken bishops, and that books were inserted by one council only to be rejected by another, and that there is no evidence beyond the decrees of these councils for asserting that the gospels are other than the work of incompetent and one-idead and one-sided men.

Still it is said that it is the infallible word of an infallible god, and that the changes are of no account, and do not alter the sense or meaning. We will instance only one of the changes in the new version, and every one can see whether there is a material difference in the sense or not. In 2 Tim. iii, 16, we read, in the old version, "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrin," etc. The new version says, "Every scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching," etc. This is very different sense from the first reading. The first asserts that all scripture came direct by inspiration from God, while the latter reading omits this assertion, and means simply that all scripture which came from God is profitable. Any scripture coming from God ought to be profitable, the only questions being, (1) Is there a God? and, (2) Did this scripture proceed from him?

The change noted is a fair example of the changes made, and it is wonderful how the church has the effrontery to say that the book is still the same. When Bishops Zenison and Lloyd examined and corrected the King James translation, 1712 or thereabouts, they found many thousands of errors. After them came the declaration of the British Bible Society, that "a faithful examination of it [the whole Bible] givs serious doubts whether it can truthfully be called God's word." The advocates of the re-revision, which in the case of the New Testament has recently been completed, asserted that there were at least 150,000 errors in the whole book, and judging from the 36,000 found in the New Testament, their estimate was not far out of the way.

Immediately preceding the King James translation there were in Europe several hundred different versions of the Bible, all claiming to be the correct one. All were of course full of verbal and transcribers' errors, and marginal notes crept into the text, so that what some mere human reader noted as he read was transformed by the copyists into the veritable word of God! It is easy to make scripture in this way. As, according to Dr. Lardner, the people, which means the priests, so late as the middle of the sixth century felt themselvs competent to judge each one for himself as to the genuinness of the gospels, it is no cause for wonder that there were so many "gospels" in existence. The only wonder is that there were no more of them. The priests of the early centuries collected the reports current among the people of their time and set them down as certain truth. Tradition passed on from one writer to another without examination until fable became fact and old legends were transformed into religious and scholastic lore. Even had the collectors of these stories possessed the desire to investigate them they were destitute of the ability to do so. It is very certain that the nineteenth century knows more about the gospels than any century preceding. The early fathers were ignorant, credulous men, and the claim that they could decide as to the genuinness of any book alleged to be a gospel must be indignantly rejected by anyone who knows their worth.

The revision of the New Testament has done a great deal of good by calling the attention of the world to the fact that there is no reliable basis for the work, and that Christianity is subject to the law of evolution as well as more material things. It is quite a step to come down from the assertion that all scripture is given by God to saying that every scripture that is given by God is profitable. These errors are gradually creeping to the light, and the glamour of superstitious reverence for a book is being dispelled. Putting men in jail for blasphemy will not stay the tide of irreverence, and theologians contending that revision does not vitiate the integrity and sacredness of the gospels will not prevent the people from seeing with their own eyes that it does. Two absolutely contradictory statements cannot both be true, and a volume with 36,000 different renderings cannot possibly be the same as the unchanged one. Both cannot be the reliable word of the infallible God. One or the other is an imposition. The theologians must decide which it is very soon, or the people will decide that both are sacred shams.

Peter Cooper.

The death of Peter Cooper deprives New York of its best beloved and most highly venerated citizen, and the world of one of its greatest benefactors. He held a place in the popular estimation which was never occupied by any man before, and which will probably remain forever unfilled. He lived to an unusually great age, and the end was peaceful and without pain.

The life of Peter Cooper had been one of industry and invention. He was in turn a hatter, a brewer, a coach-maker, a manufacturer of a cloth-shearing machine, a grocer, a glue and isinglass maker, and an iron-founder. The first successful locomotiv used in this country was constructed by him, and he encouraged with financial aid the establishing of telegraphic communication throughout the country, and the laying of the Atlantic cable.

The great work of Mr. Cooper's life, which has endeared him to the city of his birth, is his gift to the people of the Cooper Union for the Advancement of Science and Art. His avowed object in making that munificent gift was to supply to the industrious poor of New York what he had felt the need of himself—the opportunity for instruction in the industrial arts free of cost. He had attended school only half of each day in a single year, and he knew all the disadvantages under which the children of the poor are placed when they are kept out of school to assist in the support of the family by their labor. His plan, therefore, was to hav an institution where most of the teaching should be done at night. He began the work when he was over sixty-four years old, and he lived to see many thousands of people filled with gratitude for his philanthropic efforts in their behalf. These efforts cost him about a million and a half of dollars.

The corner-stone of the Cooper Institute was laid in 1857 at the junction of Third avenue, Eighth street, and Fourth avenue, New York city. The cost of the building was $630,000. The total cost of building and education has been about 2,000,000. Mr. Cooper's donations hav been constant and sufficient to keep the institution out of debt. His last gift was the erection of another story at a cost of $60,000.

The work of this institution comprises regular courses of instruction at night, free to all who choose to attend, on social and political science, on the application of science to the useful occupations of life, and on such other branches of knowledge as tend to improve and elevate the working classes. It includes, also, a school of design for females, a free reading room and library, galleries of art, collections of models of inventions, and a polytechnic school. In the reading room all kinds of literature are accessible to the student. D. M. Bennett presented the library with a handsome copy of the works of Thomas Paine, and received in return an autograph letter from Mr. Cooper, accepting the gift with thanks. The evening schools are attended by thousands of young men, who are mostly mechanics. They study engineering, mining, metallurgy, analytic and synthetic chemistry, architecture, drawing, and practical building. The institution includes a school of telegraphy for women, a school of wood engraving, and a school of photography, all of which are free. In his letter accompanying the trust deed Peter Cooper said:

"I require by this instrument and expression of my will that neither my own religious opinions nor the religious opinions of any sect or party whatever shall be made a test or requirement in any manner or form for admission to or continuance to enjoy the benefits of this institution. Fearing the possibility that my own religious opinions may be called in question, and by some misunderstood or misrepresented, I feel it to be my duty, in all plainness and simplicity, to state the religious opinions that hav taken an irresistible possession of my mind."

These opinions he states at length. Substantially they are a belief in a God of love, who governs the world by immutable laws; that these laws, as fast and as far as they are comprehended by us with the faculties that he has given us, will be seen to be perfectly consistent and harmonious. He was not a member of any church, but believed in immortal life.

In politics he was originally a Democrat, but afterward adopted the views of the Greenback party, and in 1876 stood as candidate for president on that platform. Though he received less than one hundred thousand popular votes, he lost none of his enthusiasm in the cause of financial reform. A synopsis of his political views and methods is thus set forth by the New York Sun:

"He generally carried with him a plentiful supply of documents for distribution. He never tired of saying that he never trusted the banks, and that he considered them as quite unnecessary for conducting sound business. He was particularly opposed to the National Currency act, and could never see why the national banks should receive such immense sums in the way of interest, which, he thought, could be saved for the people. He believed that it was a dire calamity that Congress refused to make the national money receivable as interest on the public debt and for duties on imports. He also opposed the contraction of the currency as an act of financial suicide. He predicted that the resumption of specie payments would prove a failure, and did not fall into the error of giving John Sherman the credit for the good crops that made resumption possible. He believed it to be the duty of Congress to furnish all the inhabitants of the United States a redeemable, uniform, and unfluctuating national currency. He was not in favor of an unlimited issue of paper money, but believed that if the government should issue money without discrediting it by refusing to take it for taxes, the danger of financial fluctuations would be largely diminished. His idea was that such a currency would be self-regulating, and that the natural laws of trade would keep enough of it in circulation and prevent the use of too much of it. He believed in placing the whole power of coining money or issuing money entirely in the hands of the government. He would require the government to make this currency at all times and at the option of the individual, convertible into interest-bearing government bonds. These views he advanced in letters to the press, to public officers, to public meetings, in speeches, and in conversation. He repudiated the idea that his ideal currency was like the Continental currency in any other respect than in its power to save the nation.

"Mr. Cooper believed that the triumph of his ideas upon the subject of government would prove a greater benefaction to his country than any of his material gifts. One of his latest works was the publication during the present year of a volume of four hundred pages entitled, 'Ideas for a Science of Good Government, in addresses, letters, and articles on a strictly national currency, tariff, and civil service.' In the preface to it he said: 'As this compilation of my ideas from my intercourse and correspondence with statesmen, divines, scholars, artists, inventors, merchants, manufacturers, and laborers may contribute to a science of good government based on a strictly national currency, tariff, and civil service, I consider it my duty to transmit them to posterity in book form. In our young country these three topics are of the greatest importance, and must be regarded as the foundation for all governmental superstructures. When this nation, now numbering fifty millions, can realize that before these three topics all others must dwindle into insignificance, she will hav attained the highest degree of political wisdom.'"

The charities of Mr. Cooper were as world-wide as his name, and his benefactions were enormous. He gave away millions to his relativs besides the millions given to Cooper Institute. The letters he received each day asking for money or urging him to invest in some enterprise or other would hav employed the whole time of one person to read and answer, and many went unanswered. But many met with success, and the amount he thus gave away will never be known.

Much like the late D. M. Bennett, Mr. Cooper was a man of unaffected simplicity, a toiler, not afraid to soil his hands by actual contact with labor, and, without being blessed with a robust constitution, by temperate habits able to accomplish a vast amount of work. In religion he was a Deist without superstition. When he went to church he usually attended that of Dr. Bellows (Unitarian), until the latter's death, and afterward the church presided over by the radical preacher, the Rev. Robert Collyer. Curator Zachos, of Cooper Institute, said of him, "His ecclesiasticism ends with simple respect for all churches." It is not reported that any church has been the object of his benefactions, and it is generally supposed that he took but a passing interest in religious matters of any kind.

The main object of this man's life was to elevate and instruct those who, like himself in youth, hav no opportunity for self-improvement. His charities extended, not to the churches—for he saw that they had enough and to spare, and made but poor use of money—but to the working-classes. No church nor theological college bears his name. With characteristic foresight he saw that those institutions are not destined to endure. He saw that the churches do not provide for the needs of this life. He lived to see creeds pass away one by one, and disappear forever from the minds of men. He saw that the religion of childhood was the superstition of old age. He saw civilization sweep on by the milestones of belief and dogma, and amid all the changes of opinions and theologies he saw progress hold its irresistible sway. He associated his name with science and art because he knew they were not for a day but for all time; and, dedicated to these twin eternals, he reared his own monumental pile, the Cooper Union. Opposit this temple of knowledge stands the Bible House, dedicated to the maintenance of a myth. These two structures front each other like the opposing champions of light and darkness—Day holding the torch for Night, the living present rebuking the dead past. Time will tell which is built upon the rock and which upon the sand.

So farewell, good Peter Cooper. As you had wealth, you used it for the benefit of those who were poor. As you had genius, you applied it to the arts of peace. As you had the wisdom of age, you imparted it to youth. You go down to the grave full of honor and of years, and ungrateful indeed will be the children of men that do not rise up and call you blessed.

The Mayor and the Passion.

Speaking of the Passion Play to a representativ of a newspaper, Mayor Edson of New York said: "I wish the public to understand that I hav done all that I can to prevent this outrage on the feelings of a Christian community, and shall continue to do so as long as there is any hope of stopping the play."

"A Christian community" is truly to be commiserated! In New York city there are something more than a million of people, who are supposed to form the aforesaid Christian community. Passion Hall, where the play in question is intended to be presented, holds but a thousand persons, and every person who witnesses the piece must pay one hundred cents. It will therefore take about three years for the whole community to be effectually shocked, and will cost over a million dollars. Is the desire to be shocked strong enough among the members of this Christian community to induce them to pay a million dollars for the privilege and to wait three years, as some will be obliged to do, for an opportunity to experience that sensation?

It is not held that the play is immoral—merely shocking. But no one is expected to witness it who does not desire to do so, and who is not willing to pay a dollar for the opportunity; in fact, all such persons are especially encouraged to keep away. It cannot possibly shock those who do not see it, and of course those whom it would thus affect will not encourage the diabolical enterprise by paying their money into its treasury.

Mayor Edson has not probed this matter to the bottom. He evidently believes that the members of this community are just boiling over with a desire to pay a dollar apiece to be shocked and to hav their feelings outraged. Having by some hocus-pocus working of the political machine been elected mayor of this city, and not having a very clear idea as to what constitute the duties of a mayor, he imagins himself the heaven-appointed custus morum of Manhattan Island. In this position he has the support of that insufferable bigot, Dr. Howard Crosby—first in war, never in peace, and always nose and ears in the private affairs of those whom accident of birth has forced to be his countrymen. Even Elbridge T. Gerry, president of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, feels called upon to brace up the mayor; but as the children made use of in Prof. Morse's representation of the slaughter of the innocents are of plaster of paris, he does not think he can consistently interfere.

The fact that he has no control over the religious liberties of the people of New York seems never to hav been brought to the notice of Mayor Edson. He is achieving for himself an unenviable reputation as an abettor of ecclesiastical bigotry, and is abusing his power to stamp out religious freedom. He is a servitor of superstition, and the garments of a mayor are too large for him.

The Clergy Still at Work.

The Puritanical clergy are still at work at Albany lobbying a more stringent Sunday law through the legislature. As the Penal Code now stands, the judges of the courts hav held that lectures and entertainments are not prohibited. The amendment which the pharisaical ministers are endeavoring to put through, after specifying certain performances to be forbidden, says: "Or any other entertainment or exercise on or off the stage." This would preclude everything, and make unlawful every lecture, concert, or other amusement, and we do not see why it would not, if impartially enforced, forbid the pulpit performances usually indulged in by the very ministers who are working for the passage of the law.

How the people of the state can supinely see these ecclesiastical chains forged tighter upon their necks and not make a protest that should hurl their clerical custodians into the street, is beyond our comprehension. They deserve to be locked up in a church and hav hell-fire and damnation preached to them without respite for six months. The assumptions of the clergy are intolerable, and if no more vigorous protest is made, this country will hav an ecclesiastical despotism as odious as the political despotism of Russia.

The Colloquium.

I know that the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be interested in every new thing, and as the Colloquium is about the newest thing on this planet, I will endeavor to giv some idea of it. It is, I hope, the starting-point of a noble university yet to be, wherein all the aspects of things, inside and outside, will be thoroughly studied. Stephen Pearl Andrews is the presiding spirit of this remarkable effort to seek unity in the widest divergency, and I presume he needs no introduction. His fame is co-extensiv with Liberalism. He is one of our greatest thinkers. He is perhaps the only man in the country who makes philosophy a business, who is really expert in it and knows what it all means. He is a worthy successor of Emerson. He has the same breadth of outlook, the same thorough sympathy with every possible phase of existence, and the same readiness to admit the truthfulness of every thought, no matter how opposit. Mr. Andrews is not at all afraid of contradictions. He takes them all in, and, more than that, he believes in their absolute necessity. According to his philosophy, life itself is the outcome of contradictions; if there were no contradictions there would be no life. It is the union of opposits that makes the reality of things; and that which is logically impossible is that which is constantly happening.

Such a comprehensiv thinker as Mr. Andrews is needed among the thousand brilliant specialists of the day. This is eminently an age that observes phenomena. Every possible variety of life is dwelt upon. All sorts of facts are studied with increasing interest. Analysis is the pervading tendency. Hence the need of an all-embracing synthesis, and the strenuous endeavor by one supreme genius at least to discover and emphasize the unity that lies within all this immense variety. This is the task to which Mr. Andrews has set himself, and for which he is splendidly equipped. His learning and genius are undeniable. His analysis is most keen, so that he reaches to the ultimate principle of unity. His philosophy is not that of charity or toleration, but of the absolute worthiness of every thought and every phase of thought that has existed in human history. In his "world building" he discards nothing; there is no rejected stone. Mr. Andrews has established the Colloquium in this spirit of universal acceptance. He does not desire to smooth over differences, but to insist upon differences, to put them forth with all power and eloquence, to make them stand against each other in undying oppugnancy; not one yeilding to the other, but each being forever established, and then recognizing, in their utter contradiction, the harmonious inward truth of each. This, it will be seen, is an entirely new method, and of this method Mr. Andrews is the author; at least he is the most brilliant, the most learned, and the most strenuous exponent of it in all human history, and it must be, I think, the method of the future.

The old method was for a certain set of triumphant opinions to overthrow another, or all others, by the power of the sword. This having proved very unsatisfactory, the next method was to appeal to human reason and hav that decide which opinion is correct, and rule all others out of court. The universological method is to giv every opinion a legal status, and acknowledge that it is, and must be, a part of human philosophy. This is the only method by which the manifold expression of being can finally be understood.

All, therefore, are welcomed to the Colloquium, the Materialist and Spiritualist, the Deist and Atheist, the Christian and the Jew, the believer and the skeptic. It is a most musical discord.

Rabbi Gottheil, Rev. Dr. Newman, Rev. Dr. Rylance, Rev. Dr. Samson, Rev. Dr. Pullman, Prof. F. F. Cook, Rev. S. S. Seward, Edward King, and our own Wakeman, and numerous others of all schools are among the distinguished thinkers that gather in this new temple of philosophy. They are a valiant and mighty company indeed. There is no fear or favor. Each man expresses his mind. The result of years of study is made manifest. No guess, no theory, and no fact concerning the universe is omitted. I do not think the universe ever got so fair a representation before. It's "subjectiv" and "objectiv" aspects are fully vindicated.

The object of the Colloquium is to persuade the advanced clergy to adopt the scientific interpretation of the world, and to bring the church into accord with it; but I find the clergy are rather afraid of this out-and-out committal to science. They like to hedge and reserve a little. I find many of the clergy very cultured and Liberal. I find that they hav read widely, and thought deeply. They are not fools, and they are not hypocrits—some of them. They are very earnest and noble-minded men; and yet there is this intellectual backwardness. They seem to say: "Giv us all that science can giv, but when that is done, we must hav something more; there must be a supernatural annex, or there is no temple wherein the human soul can worship." But does not science reply, "I can giv no more, and what I cannot giv must remain forever unknown." There can be indeed no half-way reception of science. We can hold nothing back. Science must be king.

This is the view of Wakeman, agreeing, I think, essentially with the view of Mr. Andrews—that is, it seeks a reconciliation of differences by a profounder insight into the nature of things, and accepting every aspect, inward and outward, with a new ideal solution of the whole. Mr. Wakeman's scientific interpretation excludes nothing that is noble and beautiful in the religions of the past. It takes in all the ideal spiritual world, every hope, every aspiration, every longing, every faith of the human heart. Mr. Wakeman expresses all this with wonderful felicity and acumen and wealth of knowledge, and yet the clergy do not see how thoroughly it appropriates the best they hav, with an infinitly nobler outlook. The strange thing to me is that the most liberal-minded clergy do not seem to comprehend what science is. Their idea of it is a caricature, as Mr. Wakeman has ably and lucidly shown. In fighting science the clergy are fighting a man of straw—a thing of their own imagination. Science at its best, not as represented by a Darwin, a Spencer even, but by the combined intellect of the world in its clearest expression—this was to them a new thought; and Mr. Wakeman found it difficult to induce the clerical mind to conceive of science in this universal way.

If the clergy continue to come into this Colloquium—this university of thought—they will certainly be immensely benefited. It will show them what men are really thinking about, and the only possible philosphic remedy for the enormous differences that exist. In many respects they hav been very frank and brave, and hav presented their views and convictions with a wise and beautiful tolerance, but they must grow beyond tolerance into a thorough respect for every adverse opinion.

Mr. Andrews is to be congratulated on the success of the Colloquium. Some of the wisest, most subtle, and profound thoughts of the day hav been expressed, and I do not believe that in any other atmosphere could they hav been so vigorously and clearly expressed. Platonism, Swedenborgianism, Theism, Spiritualism, Materialism, and Positivism hav met in magnificent battle array, and each has come forth brighter from the conflict, for only that which is genuin and universal in each survives.

D. M. Bennett's Visit to Rochelle.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:. I see that the last volume of Brother Bennett's last book is nearing its completion, and I trust that it will not omit to giv an account of his flying visit to this little rural city on July 14, 1882, when on his way homeward from his last great journey around the world. You will find a short report from his pen in regard to it in The Truth Seeker following that date.

I had never met Mr. Bennett, though one of his oldest subscribers, but I had a great curiosity and longing to see this noted and most enthusiastic worker in the Liberal cause. Receiving a Dubuque paper announcing his arrival in that city, M. L. Ettinger, Esq., general passenger agent of the Chicago and Illinois R. R., residing here, and an enthusiastic Liberal, generously furnished a pass, which I sent to our distinguished brother with an urgent invitation when on his way to Chicago to pass this way and honor us with a visit. To our great disappointment the ticket was returned with a note that other engagements made it necessary that he should first visit Clinton and then proceed to Chicago. But our grievance but increased our pleasure when the next mail brought us the agreeable news that he had so arranged matters as to reach us on the 3 P.M. train and would visit with us till the next morning. I at once arranged for a reception that evening, inviting about thirty ladies and gentlemen to meet him at our house.

It being early in the afternoon, we decided that a drive through this heart of Illinois's vast prairies would most agreeably entertain our visitor for a few hours. Accordingly, a carriage and driver in waiting, my good wife and I greeted him at the depot, and I for one then enjoyed the most interesting ride it has ever been my fortune to experience. The afternoon was balmy and pleasant, and the drive over splendid roads, among the cultured and prolific prairie-farms around Rochelle, passing everywhere evidences of wealth, comfort, and success, also intensely interesting to our guest, who acknowledged that, though having seen the largest portion of this globe, his journey would hav been incomplete without beholding this grand "garden-spot" in 1882 as contrasted with its condition even twenty years ago.

We were soon acquainted and "at home" as old friends, listening with intense interest to all the many interesting things and incidents our friend had to relate, only now and then suggesting a word to "draw out" more valuable information.

I hav ever been an enthusiastic admirer of our good friend's motivs, his genius, and his enthusiasm in a grand and good cause, and hav ever indorsed and harmonized with his views and arguments, excepting one, and that is the paradoxical notion that when we are dead we are not dead! Years ago I read his splendid articles on Materialism, which, as I consider them, are final and complete. Yet I could never see the consistency of his position, or reconcile his arguments with the antithetical premises of Spiritualism. But, such being the fact, and the opportunity being favorable, I took the liberty when our conversation drifted that way, even at the risk of being considered rude, to request an explanation.

And my request was cheerfully complied with. And here, before proceeding, I must again giv our late brother credit for his calm, honest, and genial mode of argument, drawing out all the resources of our better nature and intellectuality without arousing our anger or combativness; presenting everything candidly, fairly; shunning all dogmatism or sophistry. I confess that personally I am sadly deficient in these angelic attributes, and in an argument with less cultured or more bombastic Spiritists often permit myself to get excited; but it was with keenest interest that I listened to Bennett's presentation and defense of his pet views, as well as to his valiant aggressions upon "abstract Materialism."

His explanation and theories in regard to his views of Spiritism were quiet, original, and rational, and his premises (Materialism, strange to say,) more reasonable than all others I hav ever heard presented. His faith, indeed, was not based on the supernatural or even on the spiritual, neither on manifestations nor phenomena produced in "cabinets" or "circles," but upon the fixed idea that there exists in nature another and more subtle form of matter, as yet virtually unknown to the scientist, but which in time will be revealed to the world, and then explain with scientific demonstration the truth of a Materialistic-Spiritism. His contact with Col. Olcott and Madam Blavatsky in Bombay, only a few weeks previous, had evidently made a profound impression upon his mind, and the many startling phenomena which they claimed to perform with the assistance of the mystic "Brotherhood of Thibet," convinced Brother Bennett that there existed, indeed, material forces in nature unknown to us, and also that there would be life after death for the individual, but—mark the distinction—no immortality.

Brother Bennett did not believe in immortality! He said it in private to myself and wife, and repeated this definit statement in the evening before thirty witnesses. He said that he was forced from what he had seen to acknowledge spirit existence and life after death, but as a scientist, recognizing no analogy in nature for an immortality, and knowing that whatever had a beginning of necessity must end, he could not assert, and logic and reason did not predicate, that life after death was perpetual, but simply a continuous mode of existence, positivly limited, but which might continue a hundred or even a thousand years, but that finally, all finite things being subject to identical order and laws of nature, death must ensue, and the "spirit" then cease to exist.

After this delightful ride and intellectual treat, we welcomed our distinguished guest "at home," all of us ready to refresh the "inner man" (an inner man I emphatically believe in) as well, and mine "frau," I assure you, cooking him in the best manner the best steak of the best two-year-old to be had in our best market. Brother Ettinger shared the meal with us, as well as the intellectual etceteras served by Brother Bennett. We drank in all his words with a relish, sadly reflecting on the seventy-five-cent Young Hyson imparting a flavor quite resembling that of cheap boarding-house Japan. Well, for the sake of my model housekeeper, I trust that our guest enjoyed his meal as well as we did ours.

After lounging on the porch for an hour awaiting the twilight and the arrival of the invited friends, and again accompanying D. M. Bennett to a visit to Col. Olcott and the madam in Bombay, to the nativs of China and Japan and Ceylon, entering their homes and sitting at their tables, breaking their bread and viewing their idols, etc., we assembled in our spacious parlor, giving Brother Bennett, of course, a place of honor where all could behold his genial face and listen to his pleasant voice and instructiv recitations. He talked two hours, almost uninterruptedly, when we served wine and cake, he, I believe, true reformer style, declining the former and asking for water. After refreshments, he continued his interesting "table talk" for about an hour longer, giving us the pith and essence of his remarkable experience and journey; and it was nearly midnight when the friends bade their beloved friend the last good-night and farewell, all heartily thanking him for the delightful and instructiv entertainment.

Brother Bennett was indeed a living encyclopedia of knowledge, all bubbling over with clear and sparkling information, and sound good sense. All agree that in his very simplicity and unaffectedness consisted his greatest power and fascination. As a parlor talk, his extemporaneous remarks were surely to all of us infinitly preferable to the average first-class lecturer. All his words were precious and emphatically of importance and value, and all—ladies and gentlemen—listened alike with closest attention, and admitted that they "would cheerfully hav listened an hour or two longer."

During the evening, when talking about the marvelous force known as "Akas," controled and known, according to Madam Blavatsky, only by these "brethren of Thibet," he related among other marvels, that of the instantaneous reproductions of Mrs. Holmes's brooch (vol. iii, p. 39), when I took the privilege to interrupt and criticise his remarks, by insisting that when Spiritists admitted such miracles (impossibilities) as facts they were just going one step too far, and in so doing were absolutely demonstrating to all people of good sense the absurdity and faultiness of their assertions. Spontaneous and instantaneous creation of a full-blown rose—known to require weeks of growth by natural process—of a Sevres china cup and saucer, all known to necessitate in the manufactory days of toil, and furnace-heat, and artistic skill in its decoration and enameling; and the creation of a brooch requiring the necessary melting of raw material, stamps and tools for making, fire for soldering, wheels and lathes for finishing and polishing; glass for the locket, all ground and polished by tedious labor; and pearls for its ornamentation, produced only by the oyster, or sold in the markets as other merchandise—all this being impossible except by the usual processes known to us, analogy and reason demand of rational men to reject the testimony of the madam, and denounce all such stories as frauds.

Mr. Bennett insisted that I must not be too arbitrary in my conclusions; that years ago skeptics like me were equally dogmatic in denying the results of the modern telegraph, of the telephone, etc., yet now they were all established facts. I was just going to say a very few words in reply, when an old friend and barrister (and a Spiritualist, by the way), arose and, in spite of the etiquet naturally due a host by his guest, said: "Well, you better sit down! We did not come here to listen to you, but to hear Brother Bennett."

I mention this amusing incident only as illustrating the profound interest attached by all to the words of our guest. What a pity that his career of usefulness began so late in life and that it should end so soon!

After bidding good-night to Mrs. Wettstein, my friend and I enjoyed yet a happy tete-a-tete for nearly an hour. The early train took him forever from us. Farewell!

Otto Wettstein.

Talmage and Evolution.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The great Talmage, who places D.D. at the end of his name—which means doctor of divinity, or doctoring the divine, signifying that divinity is sick, and that Talmage is one of his physicians—has been striving the two last Lord's days to make out that Darwin was mistaken in his theory of evolution in nature. It strikes me very forcibly that Talmage is either ignorant or intends to misrepresent facts as they exist. He says that the Bible denies the theory of evolution, but sticks to the ignorant theory that a person he calls God exists somewhere who created this stupendous universe — a universe far beyond Talmage's comprehension—out of nothing; a god that was as ignorant as the writers of the book. Those writers were not quite as ignorant as Talmage pretends he is, as their statement backs up Darwin's theory of evolution, even if they do refer to a personal God in telling their story. They state that God made the mineral kingdom first, then the vegetable, and then the animal, then man. That is strictly in accordance with the theory of evolution; but when God wrote the book, or dictated it, as Talmage claims to believe, he made a great mistake. He had vegetation grow to perfection before the sun was made; and as for his making something out of nothing, every school-boy in the land knows that it is a lie; and so, in my opinion, does the Rev. Talmage. The last thing that this sick God of Talmage's made was man and woman. The writer of the first chapter of Genesis says that he made them both the same day. The writer of the second chapter of Genesis says that after he made man and had all the beasts of the field pass by him he found that there was none properly organized to suit the man under the laws of reproduction, so he took one of the man's ribs and made a woman. This story is so much more silly than the theory of evolution that I pronounce it false, and a thousand time bigger lie than the Darwin theory, providing it was a lie in any sense. We see that the writer of the first chapter of Genesis had a vague idea of evolution. First the mineral was developed, then the vegetable, then the fowls and the reptils and the animal kingdom, then man. Talmage must remember that there are some facts in nature that he has overlooked, or that he is entirely ignorant of. All objects above the mineral were first developed in the torrid zone. The first vegetable nature ever produced was near the equator, and without any doubt extended clear around the earth. The first object with brain was developed near the equator, as the bottom of the ocean proves, and the animal and the first human beings were developed in the torrid zone, and without a doubt on both sides of the earth.

It is an undeniable truth that the different human species did not spring from one pair—Adam and Eve. If Adam and Eve were the first, then they were black and all their posterity would hav been black, as there is no law in nature to change their color. If every object above the mineral kingdom except Talmage were swept from the face of this earth, and he located near the equator where he might watch the movements of nature, he would find that in the torrid zone the first vegetable would be developed; then the lower animal, then man; and he would also find that the man would be black, as nature could not develop a red or a white man in the torrid zone. He would next see the germs wafted by the winds to the temperate zone, where he would see a new and higher development. Then he would again see the germs wafted to the frigid zone, where he would see a still finer condition. Then he would see that in the torrid zone all nature develops fast and coarse, and in the temperate zone slower and finer, and in the frigid zone still slower and finer. He would see that it would be impossible for nature with the help of his afflicted God to develop a negro in the frigid zone or a white man in the torrid zone, and he would find that it was impossible to develop an Arab or an Indian in either, or a polar bear in the tropics, or an elephant in the polars. Nature, with God to help, could not produce a man or woman with clear blue eyes and light hair and white skin in the torrid zone, or a negro in the frigid. But, says Talmage, where did they come from? Were I to ask him which was first, the oak or the acorn, he could not answer it; but when I say to him that the germ that produced the oak always existed, patiently awaiting a proper condition to surround itself with the proper materials to form the oak, he might grasp the idea. Stand before Talmage one of each kind of animals, including the human, and he could not tell where one species left off and the other began. Birds will mix until you hav hundreds of species. Reptils will do the same; so will the vegetables. In fact, this mixture has been going on so long that nearly everything, so to speak, is a "mule." Take a white man from Norway into Central Africa, and giv him a black woman for a wife, and the children would be neither black nor white. Nature never produced a golden-russet apple with Talmage's God's help; man had to cultivate it. Then under the laws of evolution and development we hav all the best of fruit.

We see that Talmage is very ignorant when he claims that the fifty-two different human species sprang from Adam and Eve. If they were the first two, and there never were any more, every human being would hav been black. He can see that Darwin was correct. If one link, as he says, is missing, I am afraid that friend Talmage is one of the missing links, and does not exactly know where to place himself. I like him. He is just the man to set people thinking, but he will never be able to overthrow the theory of evolution and erect upon its ruins the Bible stories and his imaginary Gods.

Talmage wants to know why it was when the orang outangs, chimpanzees, and the baboons had developed into the human they did not cease to exist. I would say, in answer to that question, that they hav not had time, but they are fast passing away, never to return. I would now ask Talmage a few questions. When did God make the Durham cattle, the Devon, the Jersey, the Berkshire hog, the China pig, the Dorking fowl, the Messenger and the Morgan horses, and hundreds of others we might mention? Did he do it before he made Adam? Talmage knows he did not, but I will close at this time, giving Talmage due notice that he will never be able to prove the doctrin of evolution to be false.

The Morals of Youth—How to Protect Them.

From the annual report of the Vice Society, just published, we extract the following remarks of Mr. Lewis L. Delafield:

"I cannot leave this topic without touching upon another—a difficult and a delicate one, upon which very false notions exist—notions too which are founded in good intentions and backed by modesty—often false modesty.

"The young find out very early that certain topics are kept from them. They soon learn the general nature of the topics, and in the absence of proper instruction their imaginations throw a false light upon the whole forbidden subject, and the light is inflamed by bad books. This is a dangerous condition to be in, and if at this time the villainous and seductiv books and suggestions I hav referred to are offered, the risk is great.

"Proper instruction, properly given, by the right person at the right time, would remove most of this danger."

"The subject is extremely delicate and must be delicately handled; but depend upon it that honesty and truth are always right, and that there is nothing wrong in the natural craving which God implanted in us, under control of reason and conscience, and which he pronounced very good."

The subject to which Mr. Delafield alludes should be neither difficult nor delicate. It should be commonplace, and should be so ordinary that people would choose to overlook it on account of its familiarity, rather than to avoid it on account of its "obscenity." That any difficulty or delicacy exists at all as an obstacle to the free discussion of sexual and physiological topics, is in a large measure due to the teachings of such impure minds as we find associated together in the Vice Society. Through such teachings a false modesty has grown upon the people, which the broader knowledge and better impulse of the present age are trying to shake off—a false modesty which betrays that which it strives to conceal, moral putridity and nastiness; a false modesty which is founded in ignorance rather than in good intention, and against which everything that is good and true and noble in humanity rebels.

Mr. Delafield is right when he describes the dangers to which youth are subject, and he points to the right remedy: "Proper instruction, properly given, by the right person at the right time." In taking this position he stands in antagonism to the Vice Society and head and shoulders above it. The Vice Society has assumed that the way to keep people virtuous is to keep them ignorant, and so it strove to suppress THE TRUTH SEEKER; but virtue must hav a stronger safeguard than ignorance of the laws of sexual physiology.

In the circular issued in 1880 by Mr. Loring Moody, calling together those interested to form the first "Society of Heredity," he says:

"On this subject the doors and windows of knowledge must be thrown wide open. Light must be let in, and the goblins of disease, and sin, and suffering, must be driven out by radical and thorough education and culture." "If we would not hav the minds of our children profaned and corrupted, our only safeguard is to impart to them all needed and desired knowledge in a pure, chaste, and elevated way. Then, their minds being filled with the true light, there will be no room or desire for that which is false. Then, there being no demand for his wares, the occupation of the obscene publisher will be gone."

Probably no class of people is more free and fearless in the general discussion of what Mr. Delafield would call "delicate" subjects than the Jews. Jewish families, as far as our observation goes, and we hav been intimate in many, throw fewer restraints around conversation, as to family matters, than others; and little girls laugh at the boys for having had to undergo the treatment of the mohel, and this without a thought of immodesty; and when the children reach that age which Mr. Delafield has described as so surrounded by danger, they are already instructed in that which it is important they should know. Their young women hav contracted none of those bad physical habits which with the return of each moon remind the daughters of prudish mothers of what they hav gained in modesty, if it be a gain, at the expense of health. Their daughters are very seldom found in brothels, and physicians will unanimously bear us witness that their sons come less frequently to be treated for venereal diseases than the sons of Christian parents. Health cannot be attained without a knowledge of the laws of our being, and this knowledge is essential to the highest human happiness; and it is the right of every child to know all that pertains to its highest well-being. Whatever deprives a child of this knowledge, swindles it out of a most priceless right and starts it on the way to vice. In the way of educating children to this knowledge, the Jews are as far ahead of us as we are ahead of the credulous wretches to whom the mountebanks of the 17th century used to sell pills warranted to preserve them from the effects of earthquakes. Indeed our Vice Society is quite as efficacious in bringing about purity of public sentiment as were the pills we speak of in preventing earthquakes. Morality and virtue are not to be attained by the passage of laws whose ultimate object and only effect are to foster ignorance and to enable shrewd villians to derive support from the credulous, while they prey upon real reformers; but they are to be attained by education and thorough knowledge of those functions which we must all exercise.

There is coming to be, day by day, a stronger and ever-growing demand for knowledge and the right kind of teaching on these "delicate" subjects, and to meet this demand "all literature is cropping out in all directions with an unwonted free-spokenness on these subjects." Fifteen or more years ago the philanthropist, Dr. E. B. Foote, published one of the most valuable books ever given to mankind, "Medical Common Sense." The amount of good which that single book accomplished cannot be over-estimated; but Dr. Foote was too far ahead of his age and was treated as men usually are "who for the advancement of their race are wiser than their time." He was tried and convicted of an offense which was really no offense before the unscrupulous Judge Benedict, and narrowly escaped imprisonment by paying an unconscionable fine. This was some of the Vice Society's mischievous work. But only recently the quest of knowledge on "delicate" subjects has become so earnest that a large medical publishing house has just issued a work, modeled upon Dr. Foote's, which it is advertising largely, and for which a large sale is expected. The discussions and publications of the Heredity Society are meeting with a reception which shows great interest in the subjects they present, and the Vice Society might as well try to dam the Nile with bulrushes as to stop these discussions so vitally important to the welfare of mankind. Above all, women are waking up to a realization of the fact that thorough knowledge of these "delicate" subjects is a matter of momentous importance, and they are beginning to inquire by what right the self-constituted censors of public morals procure laws to be enacted shutting them out from the knowledge of themselvs. The demand of the times is for knowledge; "light, more light," is the cry, and the Vice Society, which answers this cry only by pointing to the blank darkness of ignorance, must stand aside and let in the light of progress. There is nothing wrong in the natural craving under the control of knowledge. Ignorance may pervert the natural craving into bestial fury and passionate rage. Knowledge will purify the natural desires and hallow them to our refinement and development. When people learn to be, not to seem, when our ambition shall be to act rather than to appear, then will all this "delicate" prudery fade away. Nature is never ashamed of her productions; why should we be?

Such utterances as these we quote, coming from the platform of the Vice Society, are very gratifying. That as Liberal a gentleman as Mr. Delafield should elude the vigilance of the narrow-minded men who watch over that society, and actually get upon the stand and giv utterance to these sentiments, is wonderful indeed. Mr. Delafield deserves the thanks of all Liberals, but we can be pretty sure that he has made his last appearance on the platform of the Vice Society, for they certainly will never ask him to speak for them again. ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

P. S.—Since the above was written Mr. Delafield has departed this life suddenly and unexpectedly. The whole of his speech from which we make this short extract is worthy the earnest attention of every thoughtful person. It was the song of the swan, and reminds us that "The good die first,

But they whose hearts are dry as summer dust
Burn to the socket."

Around the World.

From the Universe.

The third volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," with its great wealth of knowledge, its splendid engravings, and its eventful and now sad reminiscences, is a book calculated to aid powerfully in extirpating superstition, not only in this but other lands. The present volume describes what the author saw and observed "From Bombay to Hongkong," and among the sights were many thousands of gods and goddesses of the Hindoo and Chinese type. The most admirable weakness in the character of the truth-seeker was the perfect and absolute impartiality with which he treated all the gods, and another admirable weakness was the childlike and confiding manner in which he addressed them. The truth-seeker seemed to be on terms of the greatest familiarity with all the gods and goddesses, yet wherever he wandered, whether in Europe, India, or Asia, he beheld millions of superstitious people, under the lash of priests, prostrating themselvs in the most cowarely, craven, and abject manner to those deities. The European swore by his god, the Hindoo by his, and the Mongul by his, each believing that he worshiped "the true and only god," and each in his blind superstition crying out vengeance upon the other's god as false. How sweet, fragrant, and refreshing it is to find a man who would hold fraternal relations and close communion with all these gods, knowing that they were all false. That man was D. M. Bennett, the immortal truth-seeker. His cutting and caustic dissection of the gods had done a great deal toward freeing the minds of thousands from the debasing influence of superstition, and in the future, as in the past, his works will be a real redeemer of mankind from the thraldom of the priestly castes. The third volume, now before us, contains a vast amount of practical and most valuable information, and the illustrations, beautifully executed, are histories in themselvs. Every Freethought library should contain the four remarkable volumes entitled "A Truth Seeker Around the World," D. M. Bennett, publisher, 21 Clinton place, New York. Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Liberal Notes from Illinois.

Since I wrote you last from Duquoin, on Jan. 24th, I hav canvassed all of the state south of Decatur that I expect to visit on this trip. I put in a good League in Centralia. I attended and sold books at two courses of lectures by J. E. Remsburg—one in Centralia and one in Duquoin. I wish he could giv a similar course of lectures in every town in Illinois; it would giv Liberalism such a boom as it has never received before. Notwithstanding that the church is making a desperate effort to keep a little life in the dying institution, Liberalism is increasing everywhere. I hav found but one place in all of my travels where I could not find some good, activ Liberals; that was Vandalia, once the state capital, which is now an old fossilized abode of superstition. And even there I found that many of the best men of the place were Freethinkers, but they dare not let their Liberalism be known for fear of social ostracism.

Among the most activ Liberals I hav met I will name A. Cope and wife, of Salem; C. C. Moore, of Clement, and D. W. Harwood and wife and their two daughters, of Shelbyville. These are all good, activ Liberals who are keeping the banner of Liberalism afloat in their respectiv localities.

I came to Decatur on Tuesday, March 20th, and took quarters at the Drake Hotel; and the first two evenings I attended the M. E. church to see the latest improvement on catching souls for Christ. The boy preacher, Harrison, has been holding forth there for the past four months, at a neat little salary of $100 per week and board at one of the most fashionable hotels. His performance is certainly the greatest burlesque on Christianity I ever witnessed. There is nothing that I can think of to compare it to that so aptly fits the case as a monkey-show on a large scale. But it draws good houses. As to its beneficial results, I think it is a good deal like the old saying about the devil shearing the hogs—"a great cry, but little wool." Such performances only demonstrate to what straits Christianity is being driven in order to keep up an appearance of growth. I am informed that a good many people hav come here from quite a distance to attend these meetings and get a supply of salvation for themselvs and their families. If that is the case, then it would seem as if God and Jesus had adjourned business everywhere else, and come here and settled down to a regular business of saving souls.

I hav been tendered the use of the Tabernacle for a course of lectures by Remsburg during his coming May trip East; and also to hold the next state League convention in. Since receiving a letter recently from T. C. Leland, I hav concluded to postpone the state league convention until after harvest, as he informs me that there is a prospect of organizing a series of state conventions this fall in connection with the Liberal congress in Milwaukee. Thus far I hav had no offer of a more suitable place than the Tabernacle in Decatur for our next state League convention But in order to make this meeting a success I shall need some help from the Liberals of this state. We hav now 202 life members in the state League of Illinois. We ought to hav 2,000. I hope that the Liberal friends will remember that I am devoting my entire time and giving my best efforts to this cause; and I need a little of their help. I hope that everyone who can will send me $1 and become a life member of the state League of Illinois.

The late instructions from the headquarters of the post-office department giv me a good deal of trouble in getting my mail. All letters directed to me at Bloomington, Ill., will be forwarded, but I hav to keep a deposit there to hav my papers and packages forwarded, and every postal card has to hav a three-cent stamp attached to forward it; so I hope that all of my friends will quit writing me postals. Money sent in letters has never failed to reach me thus far. Friends, please to let me hear from you.

F. F. FOLLET, Sec'y S. L. L. of Ill.

DANBURY, CONN., March 26th, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed one dollar for the Monument Fund, and put me down for $5.00 to the Bennett Memorial Hall Fund.

Yours for Rationalism, GEO. W. SCOTT.

PITTSBURGH, March 26, E.M. 283.

MR. EDITOR: Among all the Liberal papers that come to me, none can supply the place of THE TRUTH SEEKER. This world is wide enough; there's room enough for all. But still I like the old flame the best, so I remit. Fraternally, HARRY HOOVER.

NORTH WALPOLE, N. H., March 26, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Some few weeks since I sent to you and got with some other books one, the title, "Answers to Christian Questions and Arguments," by Mr. Bennett. I consider it one of the very best works that I hav ever seen, and I want you to send me three more copies of it. N. MONROE.

SUMMERTON, March 24, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I am very glad that THE TRUTH SEEKER continues to make its weekly visits, freighted with such necessary, living, and useful information. Certainly t is a delightful task to drink at this fountain of Freethought, which sparkles and bubbles for the good of all, dispensing intellectual light all around upon every important subject that demands the investigation of clear-headed and noble-minded men and women. Surely the issuing of such a periodical is among the grandest works that the human genius was ever engaged in. It is an ennobling thought to your thousands of appreciating readers that the object and aim of its editor is to elevate human nature, to bring up truth out of the darkness of religious bigotry and superstition. I say to all the readers of this true friend and instructor, let us show our appreciation of it by a prompt response to its claims upon us, and write to the publisher, "Inclosed please find $2.50 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the ensuing year." T. N. TRAVIS.

GRAND RADIDS, March 21, 283.

BROTHER MACDONALD (I suppose you will allow a Spiritualist to call you brother): I begin to think I owe you for my cherished TRUTH SEEKER. I see it but seldom, for I leave it home for my father to read, as he is as much attached to it as I am. I find it in some of our Spiritualist families, and it is my private opinion that those who read it are more liberal and intelligent than those who only look on the Spiritual side. The Spiritualists hav just formed a new state society, where the name "Liberalist" is excluded. So, you see, we are growing as exclusiv as our Christian neighbors. I am now wondering who the Liberalists will exclude when a few more years giv them power and numbers. But a platform is too narrow for me that will not hear all sides. Infidels, Christians, and Spiritualists are all alike to me, if they hav something to say worth saying, and are good men and true women. I don't enjoy the "holier-than-thou" spirit. I inclose one dollar. I don't want to get along without THE TRUTH SEEKER. Long may it flourish!

Cordially, C. FANNIE ALLYN.

COLOMBO, CEYLON, ASIA, Feb. 14, 1883.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Permit me to address this letter of condolence on the great and sad loss you hav sustained by the loss of your husband, our much-esteemed friend and brother, D. M. Bennett—a loss, not to you alone, but to the whole cause of Liberalism in general.

My brother-members of our "Paramawignanartha Bauddha Samagama," or the Buddha Theosophical Society, and myself, had the good fortune to shake hands with and giv him a hearty welcome when he arrived in Ceylon, last February, on his round-the-world trip. We are, indeed, happy to say that we found him to be an affable, an upright, an unassuming, an earnest, a candid, and an able Liberal. He delivered an excellent address, contrasting Buddhism and Christianity, which has been translated into Sinhalese, and very much appreciated by the nativs. Doubtless you will be glad to hav a few copies of the same, and to show his many friends as an additional proof of his having really done his duty in defending truth wherever he found it.

The president and the members were surprised and shocked when they read the sad notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it was unanimously resolved in our meeting to address you a letter of condolence, expressing our feelings of profoundest sorrow and sympathy with you.

I am glad that I am able to inclose a draft on the Bank of England for $32.30 in payment for THE TRUTH SEEKER, This World, Boston Investigator, and twenty-one books as per annexed list. Please send me these by return mail.

I send you by this mail a few copies of the Sinhalese translation of the lecture, and a copy of a monthly Freethought publication called Fair Play, which will show you that Freethought is extending its influence even in this far-away island.

Yours in sympathy, JOHN ROBERT DE SILVA.

MODESTO, March 20, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3.50—2.50 for renewal of my subscription. Although receiving several Liberal publications, I can't very well do without the paper of all papers—a truth seeker in fact.

Your reply to T. Winter most beautifully voices the noble Bennett, and proves yourself fully competent to carry on the noble work of your predecessor. I had supposed, and I believe that my esteemed friend Bennett also shared my supposition, that Liberalism meant that everybody had the right to express and advocate their honest convictions. I hav been a thorough-going Infidel all my life, and so long ago that I only kept myself from public assault by advocating perfect Liberalism to all sects, creeds, and denominations. Any one that receives evidence of continued life, through the Spiritual phenomena, should be highly respected, and even honored as a benefactor, from the fact that, if it is true, absolutely, why, every Materialist ought to be thankful to these benefactors for finding out that they (the Materialists) will enjoy another or continued life. No, friend Winter, you ought to praise instead of condemn Spiritualists.

Please accept my heartfelt sorrow for the great loss sustained by Mrs. Bennett in her separation from one of the great and good men of the earth.

COVENTRY CENTER, R. I., March 26, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Some time ago I noticed an advertisment of the Perry Piano and Organ Co. in your paper, calling attention to a new method of piano building and various patented improvements. I wrote to Wilkes Barre, Pa., to Mr. J. R. Perry for catalog and terms of sale, as I wished to get a piano, and I wanted the best. Mr. Perry proposed to sell me one on a contract, allowing me to unpack the instrument and giv it a fair trial by competent musicians, and I filled out the contract and ordered a piano on trial, and I am so well pleased with it, and the way Mr. Perry treated me, that I want you to place this in your paper where it will do him the most good.

The piano sent me is splendid. It is not only a nice-looking, well-made instrument, but it has a rich, sweet, musical tone. My daughter is overjoyed with it, and we are all highly pleased with it. The lady who tested it is a very competent judge of the quality of a piano, and she is also an expert player, and she could not play her first piece through on it without stopping occasionally to express her delight with the tone and fine action. She declared, after repeated trials, there was no fault to be detected anywhere. Other players hav tried it with similar results. I think the improvements in the Perry piano will force themselvs into general use. Any reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER wishing a piano can be assured that these instruments are what they claim to be, both in quality and price. JESSE MATTESON.

WAYLAND, March 14, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I was born in Germany, Bohemia, a strong Catholic country, and was baptized and sprinkled with holy water in the Catholic church. The holy water stuck to me over twenty years; then it lost power. Somebody gave me an apple out of paradise and I ate it, and knew, like Adam and Eve, the good and the bad. God did not send his angel to drive me out like Adam and Eve; he sent his devils, the priests, to throw me out. I turned my face to the West; there I saw the Star of Bethlehem, and I followed the star to America. My first stop was in Auburn, New York, a priest-ridden town, with a good many churches. I could not find a single Liberal person to speak with in the whole town, and not a single Liberal paper in America. Sometimes I did not know whether it was I that was wrong or the rest of men.

In 1864 I came to Michigan; it was the same as in New York state. I could not find one Liberal person, and no Liberal paper. About three years ago, some friend lent me one of Mr. Bennett's books, and there I saw the advertisment of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I sent for the paper, but it was in English. I was hungry for truth, and commenced to read with the dictionary at my side, and in three years I got so far that I understood nearly every word, only sometimes I cannot pronounce it right.

Since I found THE TRUTH SEEKER I am satisfied. You may count me a life subscriber. I tried one year back to get some subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I sent for four trial papers for three months, paid for them with my own money, and presented them to four different persons, some being American. Three of them did not believe in the orthodox creed; they would take the paper, but the women were against it. One of the women said: "If my man brings that paper in the house again, I will leave him." I believe I could get twenty subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER in this town if the women were not against it, and I believe it is so all over America. It is the majority of the women who put their shoulders against the wheel of progress. I believe women hav just as good a thinking brain as men. Giv women all the privilege that men hav, and they will make use of the brain just the same as men; but keep that privilege back, and women hav no use of thinking. Their brain does not get sufficiently exercised. This is the case in Germany amongst the laborers and farmers.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 10th I see you had unpleasant letters from some Materialists and Spiritualists. We would not know what Materialists and Spiritualists believe if the letters of both sides were not published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. These letters make a man think, and thinking makes a man free. I go with the Materialist and Spiritualist as far as the grave, but not a step further. If we hav a spirit world, it will be a world of progress by natural law. I wish myself spirit or mind would liv after death and join all the great Freethinkers now dead. Then we would go up all together on the ladder of nature and progress, up to the milky way, where millions of suns hav united in a kind of republic.

Vorwaerts! ist das Losungswort,
Das uns die Natur hat gegeben
Vorwaerts! tont's im Sphaerenklang
Vorwaerts! hier im Leben,
Und selbst aus der Sterne Licht.
Aus der Erde Tiefen
Ist's als ob im Donnerton
Geister! Vorwaerts riefen
Drum ihr Freunde, Hand ans Werk
Muthig fort gerungen,
Bis der Wahrheit reines Licht
Endlich durchgedrungen!

JOSEPH WENZEL.

MILL BROOK, March 8th, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Will you allow me space in your excellent paper to express my appreciation and admiration of an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 3d, from the pen of John Peck, entitled "Infidel Philosophy." I am strongly inclined to the opinion that the writer is considerable more than his name might imply, and that he is, in fact, a full, plump, and well-rounded bushel. I would like exceedingly to take him by the hand and giv it a good, hearty shake, but as that can never be, I do the next best thing, and giv him brotherly greeting through our beloved paper, and would say to him, Giv us more and often of the same sort, Brother Peck. His trumpet giveth forth no uncertain sound, and he is not trying to ride a horse and mule at the same time, like that hybrid, L. H. Town, to whom he gave such a fitting and well-merited castigation. Half-hatched Liberals, with considerable of the old shell adhering, may be useful in their place, but they are not to my taste, and should not be too hasty in dictating to the full-fledged. Ridicule is never more justifiable than when its shafts are aimed at the ridiculous and absurd system of Christianity, which is best handled without mittens. Ridicule falls flat and harmless when it is not deserved, or is not applicable, but where it hits, and fits, it cuts; so lay on, Brother Peck.

Timely words of condolence are very well, but when too often repeated may become tame and even tiresome. I will therefore merely say that although I never saw Mr. Bennett, he seemed to me like a brother, and as a brother I mourn him. His picture should be in the house of every Freethinker in the land; mine I consider invaluable.

HARVEY W. PINNEY.

ALAMAZOO, March 26, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: A kind friend lent me some of THE TRUTH SEEKERS, and I now send for a trial subscription. So far as I hav had a chance to peruse it I like it better than any Spiritualist or Liberal paper that I hav read. I had only severed the shackles of priestcraft not quite six months agone. All my life hav I fought Freethought in its varied forms, principally that of the return, or rather continued existence, of earth life. I hav been baptized three times, once each by the Disciples, Advents, and Mormons, or, as they call themselvs, Latter-day Saints. For years after I joined the church I was much exercised over my innate depravity until it culminated in obsession, from which I never fully recovered till I cast the Bible and the God of the Bible to the dogs. As before stated, all my life in public and private hav I contended against a continued existence. Some time ago, while a Mormon, I had a discussion with one of the elders of the church through the church paper, Saint Herald. The subject was: "After Death, What?" As the result, I am on the broad plane of Freethought, free from superstition and an orthodox hell. No more the pains of hell get hold on me; no more do I see a God that is liable at his slightest caprice to giv me hell, speaking in the way of the world; no more do I find a savior—a go-between—that I can fling on him all my meanness and slink out unscathed myself; but I see that I must my savior be if I need any saving. (Question: I wonder if salt would save me?) I hav had a committee call on me to save my soul, but they concluded that there was but little hope of me. A week ago one of my old elders came to labor with me and stay over Sunday. Well, we improved the time. He constantly repeated that we gave the Bible a different meaning; that we did not take it as it read. I asked him to read the fourth chapter of Ezekiel, and see what he thought of that as a bill of fare. After reading, he said: "I will not talk with you any more." On my part, I was not at any time angry; but he became so angry at one time as to call me a liar, yet I pitied him. ARTHUR C. EVERETT.

MEMPHIS, March 30, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I trust you will allow a reply to the gratuitous attack of F. A. Grove, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 13th. While claiming to speak "in the interest of truth and justice," he violates both.

I now reassert that my arraignment of Mr. and Mrs. Mott, as given in your paper, and which Dr. Grove criticises with such blind virulence, instead of exceeding, fell short of the truth of their social and moral delinquencies, as I shall show. The necessities of the case required strong and unequivocal language.

In order to set myself right before your readers, and convince Dr. Grove of his error, if he is not impervious to reason, I shall hav to refer to Mrs. Mott's effusion in the same number of your paper.

She denies that Harvey was the medium at the home of Col. Eaton in Leavenworth, on the occasion of the pretended marriage of the colonel's spirit daughter and Frank Pierce's spirit son, by a spirit priest. I was utterly astonished at that denial, as it shows in glaring colors not only her untruthfulness, but her mental obliquity as well, when she has been considered as possessing some brains. She must know that almost the entire press at the time contained the story, under sensational head-lines, and that Mott was said to be the medium. Thousands must distinctly remember that fact. And if Dr. Grove has forgotten it, let him write to Mind and Matter, Banner of Light, or any Spiritual or Leavenworth paper. I could point out another deliberate falsehood in her "piece," but let this suffice; I wish to be as brief as possible.

I had borne the slanders and falsehoods of this pair for two or three years before I "struck back." Had they maligned me to none but their neighbors, who know them as Dr. Grove does not, I should hav taken but little notice of it, but it was for the benefit of those who come here now and then, and whom they treat respectfully—as appears to be the case with my maligner from Kirksville—that they are brought up. Dr. Grove "don't know what he is talking about." He says, crankily: "Such language used, especially toward a lady, could possibly emanate from none but a crank or a fool." That may be, but I should consider him as "both rolled into one," if I thought he could see what I hav during sixteen years, and know the reputation this couple hav at home, and not hav an opinion similar to my own.

My letter was addressed to Mr. and Mrs. Mott. I previously called personally (which Mary denies), but found her in no mood to talk the matter over calmly.

I yield to no one in respect for and admiration of women—my mother was a woman—but I find quite a difference in women, and Mary is one of the "different" ones.

Dr. Grove states what is not true when he says I admit receiving 200 seances for $26. I paid that sum for my first twelve seances and board, and for two seances for my son. But I attended many more at reduced rates, of which I kept no record. I think I might hav paid $40 or more in money, and several more in time, labor, and stationery for 200 seances. I always paid whatever I was charged, and never considered it too much. Both Mary and Dr. Grove would hav the reader believe that it was the paying of a few dollars that I complain of, when that has nothing to do with the matter. It was their falsehoods—that I had never paid anything (sometimes, they said, but $3 or $4), told to strangers who might believe them—that I objected to.

This amiable pair had not admitted Mr. Pitkin to their seances for more than a year when my letter appeared, but they wilted immediately, and he has since been welcomed. I hope this will hav a further sanctifying effect.

I hereby challenge Dr. Grove to discuss through any paper that will open its columns the character of Mott's mediumship, and let our readers judge as to who is the crank or fool. In the mean time let the good doctor boast of his intimacy with this dissipated and disreputable pair. STEPHEN YOUNG.

CRYSTAL SPRINGS, March 3, 1883.

ORTHODOX "SWEET BY AND BY."

There's a land that is hotter than this,
Where all those who on reason rely
With Satan will revel in bliss,
In God's merciful sweet by and by.

CHORUS.—Oh, the bliss where they hiss,
In that land that is hotter than this (by and by),
Where they roast and they fry,
In that beautiful sweet by and by.

We will sing the "elects'" happy strain,
How a God loves his children so well
That he givs them a life full of pain;
Then nine-tenths burn forever in hell.

Oh, the bliss, etc.

God's omniscience foreknows what takes place,
Hence predestins each fate in return;
His elect he selects from our race,
And the rest he'll eternally burn.

Oh, the bliss, etc.

The example of Pharaoh proves plain
That God shapes and controls every mind.
He will harden and soften again,
Till we walk in the path he defines.

Oh, the bliss, etc.

We look down in the bottomless pit—
View with pride little babes in the fire;
While good Christians complacently sit
And adore their good Lord in his ire.

Oh, the bliss, etc.

To our bountiful father above,
Who has brimstone enough and to spare,
Here we offer our tribute of love
For the blessings he givs over there.

Oh, the bliss, etc.

If you wish for a harp when you die,
Both your father and mother despise,
And the truth of all science deny—
You'll be sure of a crown in the skies.

Oh, the bliss, etc.

There's a mansion that's not made by hand—
Built of faith somewhere up in the sky;
Its foundation is far worse than sand,
And will totter and fall by and by.

Oh, the bliss, etc.

In that mansion is offered a prize
For all wickedness under the sun.
Just repent and believe—be baptized—
You are free from the crimes you hav done.

Oh, the bliss, etc.

Let the clergy and priests dupe the mass
To believe in this old popish stuff;
That belief is to save us at last—
But of this Common Sense cries "Enough!"

Oh, the bliss, etc.

Oh, how happy the saints over there!
Looking down on the Infidel band,
Who on reason rely everywhere,
And will stand by the truth if they're damned.

Oh, the bliss, etc. J. S. M.

METARMORA, March 26, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: The following items are taken from a sermon I heard preached in a church on Easter Sunday, March 25th, and the man gets $700 salary per year for stuffing his congregation with such nonsense:

"My Christian friends, to-day we celebrate the largest feast of our Christian year, the day of the resurection of our Lord Jesus Christ. We celebrate this day because the sufferings of him had come to an end; we hav proof enough that he suffered, bled, and finally died on the cross for mankind; he was first sold for thirty pieces of silver; it is a small amount, but it looked big in the eyes of Judas Iscariot. He was then dragged through the streets to Pilate, from Pilate to Herod, from Herod to Pilate, and there given up to the Jews to crucify him, to carry a cross three times as heavy as men are able to carry; and think, the savior had to endure all this without supper the evening before, and without breakfast that morning. On the way he was shamefully misused and beaten; a woman by the name of Veronica took pity upon him, and approached him with a towel to wipe off the bloody face of Jesus, and see, he left his photograph printed on the towel. This towel has caused many a miracle; for instance, at that time, the emperor Tiberius suffered terribly with a sore; he sent for Jesus to come and heal him, but it was too late; he had been executed. So they brought Veronica to his bedside; she applied the towel to his person and the wound was healed; the emperor (Tiberius) was converted at once and believed in the power of Christ, so you see that these are strong proofs. When Christ drew his last breath, the sun darkened, the rocks split, the dead arose from their graves, and there was a terrible earthquake all over that country. There was at one time an Infidel visiting Jerusalem; a few priests were with him, who tried to prove to him the reality of the marks that Christ had left behind him, but this Infidel could not be convinced; finally they took him on the mount of Calvary and showed him the openings in the rocks; he examined them very closely and finally came to the conclusion that some higher and stronger power than nature did that, because these splits where running across the grain of the rocks, and the splits produced by earthquakes run with the grain and veins of the same; this sight converted the Infidel, and he believed in Christ and all his miracles."

The priest then went on to the resurrection, and all the rest of his sermon was just such superstitious nonsense. I think it was too thin a sermon to be delivered in this civilized country, and in this age of progression. I could not keep it by myself, and thought I would write some of it to THE TRUTH SEEKER, because we want to correct such falsifiers, and now is the time to do it through our press. If space will allow, and you think it worth noticing, please explain to us the healing of Tiberius.

V. BURG.

[The above is a very good sample of the superstitious drivel the average ministers drools out to his congregation. It is legend magnified by imagination. There was no earthquake, no Infidel, and no healing of Tiberius Cæsar. Concerning the latter the legend is that Veronica met Jesus and told him that she was going to a painter to get his portrait. She had the necessary piece of canvas in her hand. Jesus asked her for it, and, having taken it, handed it back with a true likeness of himself upon it. Tiberius at this time, so the legends runs, was ill. He had heard of Jesus and wanted him to visit him, and sent a messenger from Rome for him. When the messenger arrived at Jerusalem, Jesus had been crucified. But he met this woman, and on learning of the canvas story endeavored to purchase the picture. Veronica would not part with it, but went to Rome herself, where she cured the emperor by allowing him to gaze upon it.

This is the story as commonly told. Any one is at liberty to believe who pleases. The Catholics hav sainted Veronica for the part she played in the affair.

Another phase of the "yarn" is that Jesus, under the burden of the cross, perspired profusely and Veronica at one of these times wiped his forehead with her handkerchief, the result of which attention was that his face was photographed upon the linen. As the cross was carried by Simon, the only proof of this story is the fact that the identical and original handkerchief is preserved and is to be seen in churches in Paris, Aix-la-Chappelle, Cologne, Milan, St. Peter's at Rome, and we know not how many more places. A man must be a skeptic indeed who doubts the story when there are so many original handkerchiefs in existence!—ED. T. S.]

ST. AUGUSTINE, March 1, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: It is now nearly two months since I left my home in Michigan, with the thermometer down twenty degrees below zero, and made my way direct to this summer-land, where for more than one whole month the thermometer did not get below sixty degree above zero, save twice, when I noticed it down to fifty for a little while in the morning. I hav been South as far as the Indian River, where I spent a few days, and on the seventh of February I took a bath in the briny waters of that river, which I found warm and pleasant. From there I came back to Sanford, where I spent the most of my time until I left for this old town, said to be the oldest by a number of years of any town in the United States. It, like most other towns, has a religious and political history, and as I stood on those old fort walls that the Spaniards were sixty years in building, and before the completion of which the king of Spain had written to the governor of St. Augustine that the fort had cost almost its weight in gold, and when I had looked it all over I was not surprised that this Christian prince should get out of patience, though I apprehend there is but little to be seen now compared with what there was one hundred years ago; but there is enough to be seen yet to mark the folly of its builders. But then they were establishing Christianity on this new territory, and this fort was one of their necessary appendages. From the fort I went to visit the old Christian church, the oldest in the town. Here the visitor may notice the following inscription:

FIRST MASS IN ST. AUGUSTINE, FLORIDA, SEPT. 8, 1565, AT THE LANDING OF THE SPANIARDS UNDER PEDRO MENENDES. WITH RELIGION CAME TO OUR SHORES CIVILIZATION, ARTS, SCIENCES, AND INDUSTRY.

Now what was meant by those two last lines is that with this evangelical Christian Catholic religion came civilization, etc. Let us see what kind of civilization they really mean. The same day that this mass was performed this Christian priest writes:

"To-day as I finished the mass of our lady the admiral was informed that a Frenchman had been captured. He told us that our enemies had embarked more than two hundred men in four vessels to go in search of our fleet. God, our father, sent suddenly so great a tempest that these men must hav been destroyed, for since their departure has occurred the worst tempest I ever saw. The following Sunday we saw a man approach who cried out loudly, 'Victory, victory! the French fort is in our hands!' I hav already stated that the enterprise that we hav undertaken is for the glory of Jesus Christ and his Holy Mother. The Holy Spirit has enlightened the reason of our chief in order that all may be turned to our profit, and that we might gain so great a victory. The enemy did not perceive them until they were attacked, most of them being in bed. Many of them arose in their night-clothes and begged for quarter. Notwithstanding this one hundred and forty-two were killed; the rest escaped. In an hour's time the fort was in our possession (Fort Caroline).

"A few days after this some Indians came to our fort and informed us by signs that a French vessel had been wrecked on Anastasia Island. The admiral and many followers repaired to the coast, and taking with him a Frenchman who had accompanied us from Spain, he called to them to come over.

"A French gentleman who was a sergeant brought the reply to the summons to surrender, for they had raised a flag as a signal of war. He said that they would surrender on condition that their lives should be spared. The general demanded an unconditional surrender. Seeing that no other resource remained to them, in a short time they all surrendered themselvs to his discretion.

"Seeing that they were Lutherans, his excellency condemned them all to death, but as I was a priest I felt a sympathy for them. I begged him to grant me a favor—that of sparing those who would embrace our holy faith. He granted me this favor.

"I succeeded in thus saving ten or twelve. All the rest were executed because they were Lutherans and enemies of our holy Catholic faith. All this took place on the day of St. Michael, Sept. 22, 1565. There were 111 Lutherans executed without counting fourteen or fifteen prisoners" (Bloomfield's Guide, pp. 13, 14).

The above letter is a fair exposition of Christianity in 1500 and back of that for eleven hundred years. The idea that the Catholic church advances (and all other evangelical Christian churches, for that matter), that Christianity has been the source from whence we drew our civilization, science, arts, and literature, is the greatest mistake that could be made. Indeed it is the direct opposit of the truth, and it is only necessary for the honest inquirer for the truth to inform himself on this subject, and he will find that it has ever been a block in the way of advancement, only as it could make it to subserve its purpose. But I must close, hoping to be remembered to all our truth seeking friends.

S. D. MOORE.

Poetry.

Can It Be True?

An Appeal to Roman Catholics and all Christians.

From the Secular Review.

Can it be just as the Catholics say—
A woman the mother of God?
Does it appear quite a rational way?
At least it seems mighty odd!

Can it be true that a chalice of wine,
A dishful of wafers or bread,
Conjured by man in commission divine,
Are the blood and the flesh of the dead?

Can it be true that the people believe
In stories so silly as these?
Peters and Pauls still combine to deceive,
And pocket the plentiful fees.

Jesus, his mother, and many queer "saints,"
Intercede with the Father aloft;
Tell him the wishes, the woes, the complaints,
Of victims so piously soft.

Following fiction the fathers received
(They suck it as milk from the breast);
Why should we doubt what our mothers believed?
With the millions gone to their rest?

As for a creature whose sire was a ghost—
The thing were a mule and no man,
Never a region, a climate, or coast,
Could furnish a different plan.

Where there's a mother there must be a sire,
Whatever the species may be;
Absence of fuel means absence of fire—
At least it appears so to me.

Artists produce what the gods may desire—
A fact that is easy to see;
Doctors decide as their cases require—
Thus three must be one and one—three!!!

Blood! how ye Christians glory in blood!
From the brute and Immanuel too;
Blood is your passport in crossing the flood,
No other commending will do.

As to your eating the flesh of a friend,
And drinking his blood from a cup;
Curses of devils, hell-fire without end,
Hav frizzled your reason right up.

What of a cardinal, what of a pope—
How better or stronger than you?
Oh, what a butchering, barbarous hope!
To reason and manhood be true!

Why cannot ye teach the pope and the priest—
Not lore of the sages, maybe—
Plain common sense, which they cultivate least,
Ye need not exact a large fee.

Shun ye the altar and never go there,
But lay up a store-house of wealth;
Find out the reading-room, seek balmy air.
How precious are knowledge and health!

Show me the Infidel!—he is the true—
The only true man of to-day;
Turn then your backs on the priest and his crew,
And hasten, Oh, hasten away!

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last word penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

BENNETT affirms; MAIR denies. This is an exhaustiv discussion. Price, $1.50.

Trial of D. M. Bennett in the United States Circuit Court upon the charge of depositing prohibited matter in the mail. This givs a full history of this celebrated case, and shows what monstrous injustice was perpetrated upon MR. BENNETT. Price, cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

"VICTORIA"

MAGNETIC APPLIANCES

Are surer and quicker in action than any other Magnetic Garments.

They are made out of lace or netting which makes them the coolest and lightest appliance made.

Their magnets have on them an armature or keeper which makes them continuously curative. No others have this necessary addition. See any work on Natural Philosophy to see how necessary the Armature is.

The VICTORIA is so constructed that the patient can remove the magnets at pleasure and wash all the goods. This cannot be done with any others.

Paralysis, Asthma, Catarrh, Incipient Consumption, Female and Spinal Diseases, Rheumatism, Sick Headaches, Dyspepsia, General Debility and all diseases arising from deficient nerve force, there is no other treatment that is as successful as the wearing of VICTORIA MAGNETIC GOODS.

All other garments are slow in action.

VICTORIA is quick and sure. All other appliances oblige the patients to hope for to-morrow.

VICTORIA gives help to-day.

Send for circulars, price lists, etc., before you buy of others!

For the cure of Disease without Medicine or Medical Treatment. The Statement made by him at that time that his Magnetic Clothing, if worn for any form of Disease (and as advised), would cure ninety per cent of the so-called Incurables, has been verified, he having Clothed and Cured Thousands of Persons of all Forms of Disease. Positive proof of this has appeared in all the leading Newspapers by Testimony of many of our most Prominent and Wealthy Citizens, who, having been Cured by the

Wilsona Magnetic Garments

After all other Treatment h failed, were pleased to assist the Inventor in giving confidence to the Suffering Invalids of America by allowing him to use their well-known and respected Names as Reference; and it is now admitted by many most highly accomplished Scientists and Physicians that the Success and Cures attending the introduction of "Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing has been unprecedented in the history of Electrical Therapeutics. In the face of such Positive Proof as given by us no person can doubt the value of this Invention in all cases.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in cut. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.

☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

Gems of Thought.

IT is difficult to understand how the belief in any form of error can be of great utility to the race, or how the floundering of mankind for thousands of years in the fogs and mists and darkness of superstition and delusion was the greatest good the race could hav had under the circumstances. It is the nature of error—however firmly planted in sincerity—to hamper, clog, and fetter its adherents, and we cannot understand how it can, under any circumstances, be the greatest good the race could enjoy. Truth is better than error; reality than imagination.—D. M. Bennett.

IF there are but five persons in a town free from superstition and well disposed, they should begin something there that would finally reunite the extremes of society and restore human feeling to both. . . . . Let us, Liberals, not expend all our force in demolishing Joshua. Suppose Joshua out of the way (and he is going fast), the problem of human life remains. Here we are, a thousand million of us [the estimated population of the globe], upon this "bank and shoal of time," alone, alone, alone, with none to help us but ourselvs. Let us help ourselvs and one another. And that is the whole of the coming man's religion.—James Parton.

WHEN the architects of Egypt began their work, there was another polar star in the northern sky, and the Southern Cross shone upon the Baltic shores. How glorious are the memories of these ancient men whose names are forgotten, for they lived and labored in the distant and unwritten past. Too great to be known, they sit on the hight of centuries and look down on fame. The boat expands its white and pointed wings; the sailors chant a plaintiv song; the waters bubble around us as we glide past the tombs and temples of bygone days—the days o' lang syne; the men are dead, and the gods are dead. Nought but their memories remain. Where now is Osiris, who came down upon earth out of love for men, who was killed by the malice of the Evil One, who rose again from the grave and became the Judge of the Dead? Where now is Isis, the mother, with the child Horus on her lap? They are dead; they are gone to the land of the shades. To-morrow, Jehovah, alias Yahweh, you and your son shall be with them.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

YOU do look, my son, in a mov'd sort
As if you were dismayed. Be cheerful, sir;
Our revels now are ended. These, our actors,
As I foretold you, were all spirits, and
Are melted into air, into thin air;
And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
The cloud-capp'd towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself—
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve;
And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind. We are such stuff
As dreams are made on, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep. —Shakspere's Tempest.

GOVERNMENT exists for the purpose of keeping the peace, for the purpose of compelling us to settle our disputes by arbitration instead of settling them by blows, for the purpose of compelling us to supply our wants by industry instead of supplying them by rapine. This is the only operation for which the machinery of government is peculiarly adapted, the only operation which wise governments ever propose to themselvs as their chief object. If there is any class of people who are not interested, or who do not think themselvs interested, in the security of property and the maintenance of order, that class ought to hav no share of the powers which exist for the purpose of securing property and maintaining order. But why a man should be less fit to exercise these powers because he wears a beard, because he does not eat ham, because he goes to the synagog on Saturdays instead of going to the church on Sundays, we cannot conceive.—Macaulay's Essays.

POETRY is the source of every enjoyable feeling; mirth, at least in its refinement, is poetry; admiration is poetry; devotion is poetry; all sentiment is poetry; everything in the heart that rises above brute, sensual satisfaction is poetry:—and more than all this, I will take upon me to affirm that no man was ever truly great, or truly devout, or truly admirable in any but he was a poet, in posse at least if not in esse [i.e., the man had the poetic spirit though he may not hav been able to giv it expression.]—Self-Formation.

OH, many are the poets that are sown
By nature; men endowed with highest gifts,
The vision and the faculty divine,
Yet wanting the accomplishment of verse.
. . . . . .
Nor having e'er, as life advanced, been led
By circumstances to take unto the hight
The measure of themselvs, these favored beings,
All but a scattered few, liv out their time,
Husbanding that which they possess within,
And go to the grave unthought of.
—Wordsworth.

THERE are many that believe—or believe that they believe—in God and immortality without being virtuous; on the other hand, there are not a few who, though torn by doubt and without faith, are nevertheless virtuous.—Alamontada.

LAST fall I made the journey between Boston and New York. The autumn winds were sighing among the trees, the red leaves were dropping to the ground, and here and there were piled up in masses to be carried away by the blast. All was desolate and wild and dreary; all spoke of gloom and disaster. Yesterday I made the same journey, and merry loveliness covered the hillsides, the meadows, and the forest trees; there was beauty and life everywhere. Where did it come from? From incessant and indomitable elements that beat into the ground those dead leaves that had fallen. All summer long they had worked, disinfecting the atmosphere and cooling the ground, and now their task was over and they fluttered down into their beds, to be forgotten. And yet, unless this thing were done every autumn of every year, the glorious splendor of the year would never greet mortal eyes. Which of all the martyred leaves that fluttered down and rotted in the ground made the summer? Every leaf.—Frothingham's Radical Pulpit.

Odds and Ends.

Can such things be? An advertisment in the London Times calls for "a wet nurse, single and respectable."

HOW A COUNTRY BOY PLAYED UPON THE CREDULITY OF YOUNG MULKITTLE.

A farmer who livs in the Flat Rock neighborhood, a religious community not far from Little Rock, wrote to the Rev. Mr. Mulkittle the other day, requesting that, at his earliest convenience, he should visit the Flat Rock neighborhood and preach a telling sermon in the antiquated log church of that locality. Mr. Mulkittle decided to comply, especially as the farmer, in his communication, had added: "We hav sum fustrate pigs which I will giv you won to bake if you come."

After much persuasion and a thousand promises, Mr. Mulkittle agreed that the boy might accompany him.

It had been arranged that services should be held after dinner, and Mr. Mulkittle, after having received an introduction to every member of the family, walked out into the woods to draw from budding nature the inspiring flow of soothing words which carry hope to the hearts and souls of men. The boy, who had been quiet, no sooner found himself, by courtesy, master, than he began to look around for themes upon which to build.

"That corn ought to be planted this next week," said the father to the son, "for the season is comin' along."

"Is that the kind of corn that the apostles went through?" asked the boy.

"I reckon it is," replied the old man, who was not very well posted on ancient agriculture.

"When they went through the corn an' rubbed off the ears, the corn couldn't hear, could it?"

"Wall, I don't know. Don't 'pear to me the corn could hear nohow."

"But if it had ears to hear, it could hear, couldn't it?"

"Sorter think it could, but am a leetle shaky on such p'ints, myself."

"Was Solomon a good man?"

"Sorter got my doubts about him bein' good, but he had a powerful chance of sense."

"Was Jonah good?"

"I'm a leetle shaky on his record," and the farmer, an evident descendant of the squatter family, grinned with extreme satisfaction.

"Hav you got a sword?"

"No, but I hav got the rat'lin'est six-shooter you ever seed."

"Do you try to do what the Bible says you must?"

"Yes, I make a mighty stagger in that direction."

"Well, why don't you sell your shirt and get a sword?"

"'Cause I don't need a sword, and the shirt comes in mighty handy."

"But the Bible says if you ain't got a sword, you must sell your shirt and get one. Why don't you do it?"

"'Cause I don't want to."

"Why don't you want to?"

"Ain't got no use for the sword."

"Why haven't you?"

"Cause I ain't,"

"Why hav you ain't?"

"Great sprouts of sassafras an' high water, youngster, I can't keep up with you. I hoed my row for a while, and chopped down weeds like the old boy, but blamed if I don't pass. Silvy," turning to his wife, "hav dinner on time, an' if the preacher axes for me when he comes back, tell him I'm hangin' 'round somewhar."

Shortly afterward Mr. Mulkittle came and dinner was announced, but the old farmer had gone so far away that they had to blow a horn for him.

When the old man arrived he gav instructions to his sons that while the dinner was in progress of destruction, they should go over and sweep out the church. The "meetin'-house" is a very small establishment of worship, with low roof and pole rafters. While the boys were at work, one of them noticed a wasp nest on a rafter, just over the rude table which served as a pulpit, and behind which many a man had stood and hurled hallelujahed defiance at the awful embodiment of sin. Bill, one of the boys, suggested a plan for amusement, and, cautiously climbing up, he tied a twine string around the nest, passed the string under a rafter, and carried it across the room, passed it under a bench, and tied it to a nail.

The church was crowded. Young Mulkittle, invited by the boys, took a seat with them. The city preacher arose and began his sermon. The congregation listened with breathless attention.

"See that ar string?" asked Bill of young Mulkittle, pointing to the nail. "Wall, if you pull that you'll catch a fish."

"Where will the fish come from?"

"He'll come outen the pond out yander an' flop on this bench."

"Will he bite?"

"No; he'll lay right still an' you can take him home with you. Pull the string," and Bill moved away. Mulkittle took hold of the string and looked at his father. He wanted a fish, but he had his doubts as to the practicability of Bill's suggestion, but he could see no harm in the experiment. Mr. Mulkittle was lifting his voice in a kind of glorified shout that in town he would not hav attempted. The boy pulled the string and the wasp nest fell.

"Yes," exclaimed the preacher, "standing there in the wilderness, John lifted up his voice and said—what the devil is this!" Zip, zip. "What's the infernal—whoo!" and he hopped over the benches. An old bald-headed brother, who had been deeply interested, rushed forward through the panic. Zip! He clapped his hands on his head, squatted and squalled. Old Mrs. Popney set up a howl and "broke" for the woods, while Miss Bigley ran away, jumping over the bushes like a deer.

It was not long until Mulkittle and his boy were riding rapidly toward home. The preacher's face looked like a cornfield pumpkin. He did not suspect the child. When he reached home his wife eyed him and asked him what was the matter. A fly came across the room and the preacher "ducked" his head and replied; "Don't question me; don't look at me; but giv me a wet blanket."—Arkansaw Traveler.

Published by PETER ECKLER, 35 Fulton Street, N. Y.

The Labarum of Constantine. "By this sign thou shalt conquer!"

This history contains Gibbon's theological writings, separate from his historical and miscellaneous works. It shows when, where, and how Christianity originated, who were its founders, and what was the character, sentiments, manners, numbers, and condition of the primitive Christians.

Gibbon's Vindication of the 15th and 16th chapters of his History from the attacks of his Christian opponents, is reprinted verbatim from the original edition of his Miscellaneous Works, edited by Lord Sheffield in 1796. It effectually and forever silenced his detractors; who, being vanquished in argument, unhesitatingly accused Gibbon of infidelity.

All that can be said by Christians in regard to the origin of Christianity, is reprinted from the valuable notes of DEAN MILMAN, WENCK, GUIZOT, and other eminent Christian historians who have edited editions of Gibbon's works; and the pious but scholarly remarks of the learned editor of BOHN'S edition of Gibbon, are also given in full.

Among the illustrations will be found representations of the principal divinities of the Pagan mythology.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Lord may call a man to preach, but he goes out lecturing on his own account.

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL boy who, when asked by his teacher what made the tower of Pisa lean, replied: "On account of the famin in the land."

A HORSE thief in an Arkansas prison objects to having a Presbyterian chaplain in the institution. He says he has been brought up a Methodist, and wishes to remain in the faith of his fathers.

WILLIAM HARDWICK, of Decatur, Ill., a young student for the ministry, has been crazed by excitement, engendered, it is supposed, by Brother Harrison's revivals. He has been sent to an asylum.

A SICK person in Massachusetts tried the prayer cure and died of the subsequent excitement and exhaustion. He must hav taken an overdose. One cannot be too careful with such powerful remedies.

LITTLE Arthur has been to church. "How did you like the sermon?" asked his sister. "Pretty well," responded the youthful critic. "The beginning was very good and so was the end, but it had too much middle."

"TO-MORROW'S Sunday, isn't it, mamma? Mayn't I play with the cards and build castles with them?" "Certainly not, my dear! But you may play with the prayer-books, if you will build nothing but churches with them."

"YES," said the deacon, "the organist certainly did play opera bouffe airs and the can-can in his voluntary yesterday. But, dear me, I can't kick up a row about it without giving myself away by showing that I recognized the music."

THE British Association for the Advancement of Science will probably meet next year in Montreal. There is a movement to make it an international conference by inviting the American association to assemble at the same time and place.

AN English bishop querulously remarked to his servant that he was dying. "Well, my lord," said the good fellow, "we are going to a better place." "John," replied the prelate, with an air of conviction, "there is no place like old England

IT is a mean man who will pass a counterfeit quarter on a deacon, for it is sure to drop into the collection-box and make some benighted heathen forget that he has been converted when he finds it won't buy him two straight drinks and a cigar.

A SERMON at a revival service at Roulsville, Pa., sent Jesse Wilheim to an insane asylum. The minister said that all members of the Reformed and Lutheran churches were condemned to eternal punishment. Wilheim's mother and sister had died in that faith.

A TORONTO preacher drew a great crowd of curiosity-seekers to his church by advertising that a woman, formerly a notorious sinner, but now a convert, would be exhibited. She turned out to be a myth, and the principal feature of the occasion proved to be a collection.

A DAUGHTER of Mrs. Victoria Woodhull has made her debut on the stage of the Savoy Theater in London, in a matinee performance, She played the Princess in Gilbert's "Palace of Truth," and naturally failed to do much in so difficult a part, though she is described as promising.

AN old man would not believe that he could hear his wife talk a distance of five miles by telephone. His better half was in a country store several miles away, where there was a telephone, and the skeptic was also in a place where there was a similar instrument, and on being told how to operate it, he walked boldly up and shouted: "Hello, Sarah!" At that instant lightning struck the telephone wire and knocked the man down; and as he scrambled to his feet, he excitedly cried: "That's Sarah, every time!"

THE Erie Dispatch says it is a fact that a Mercer, Pa., minister had a dog rheumatically paralyzed in the hind legs, and thought he would try the prayer cure on it. He devoted an hour to the performance, at the end of which time the dog was walking on all fours, and, with one of the lately useless hind legs, scratching fleas on his ear.

JUST because a Pittsburgh pastor persisted in reading the names of parishioners who gave money to keep the church going, and the amount of their gifts, the majority of his people got mad and asked him to resign. They were perfectly willing to get their preaching for nothing, but they didn't want the whole thing given away in that manner.

IT seems that the "hand that rocks the cradle" in Philadelphia attends to other matters also. "Woman's rights!" exclaimed a man from that city, when the subject was broached. "What more rights do they want? My wife bosses me; our daughters boss us both, and the servant girl bosses the whole family. It's time the men were allowed some rights."

PATRIOTIC Irish pupils in a Boston school, where the succession of English sovereigns is taught by the repetition in concert of the well-known rhymes beginning: "First William the Norman, then William his son," and ending with, "God sent them Victoria; may she long be the last," were caught dropping the adverb from the last line, so as to make it say, "God sent them Victoria; may she be the last."

A CORRESPONDENT thinks that the minds of persons who go to a theater and witness a tragedy on Saturday night are not in a condition to absorb a sermon the next morning. Perhaps not; and yet some tragedies fill a man's mind with more pious thoughts, and make him think more seriously of his latter end and the wrath to come, than many of the sensational sermons of the day.—Norristown Herald.

A BAPTIST preaches in Northern Texas made his congregation laugh for half an hour without stopping. He intended to rebuke the female members for extravagance in dress, and thinking that garbage was a more elegant form of the word garb, he used it a number of times with great effect. He said, among other things, that it was displeasing to the Lord for Christian women to be carried away with their garbage.—Texas Siftings.

THE New England Fast Day has long been falling into disfavor among religious people, owing to the worldly way in which it has been celebrated. The quarrel between the ministers of Massachusetts and Gov. Butler has made the institution of the day more distasteful than ever before. The Baptist ministers of Boston and vicinity say by a large majority that they will hav nothing more to do with Fast Day, and that they think it ought to be abolished.

GEORGE AUGUSTA SALA, in his "America Revisited," thus writes on the American Sunday: "On more than one occasion I hav taken the liberty to observe that the American Sunday, so far as I hav had an opportunity of observing it, was socially a day of tribulation. . . . In the Northern and Middle states, so it seems to me—but I am, of course, as in all things, open to conviction—the rigid Puritanical or Mosaic observance of Sunday is prescribed by the laws of the state. Those laws are in the highest degree acceptable to a class who, by right and custom, are socially by far the most influential in the United States—I mean the ladies. Women do not frequent bars or barbers' shops; they are not given, in this country at least, to driving fast horses; they do not smoke cigars, and they are extremely fond of going to church, of wearing their finest clothing thereat, and of listening to emotional music, or comic, or sometimes both. The sermons of the most popular of the New York clergymen are literally as good as a play; and plenty of stirring music and pulpit oratory appealing either to the risible or the lachrymose faculties, there is surely no reason, so far as feminin New York is concerned, why the theaters should be opened on Sundays."

AN English newspaper of authority on all matters connected with scientific subjects says: "Electric lighting is at present under a cloud. The shares hav run down to a very low figure in the market. Paid-up shares in Edison, Brush, or Pilsen stock going at half a crown each is a sign of the indisposition of the public to buy them. There is no demand for electric light shares at the present time. Whatever their actual or possible value, people will not buy them; neither will they subscribe money to float a new company. Six months ago the very name of electricity was a word to conjure with.

A MEMORIAL to Mr. Gladstone is being signed by a number of the clergy of the church of England protesting against the Affirmation bill, on the ground that "the deliberate removal of the name of the supreme being from the form of affirmation proposed in this bill, for the purpose of admitting as a member of the legislature, by its retrospectiv action, an open and avowed Atheist, who has admitted that he has no religious scruples, is dishonoring to almighty God and contrary to the spirit of our laws and constitution." Among those who hav attached their names to this petition are the bishops of Newcastle and Dover and the bishop-designate of Truro, the deans of Manchester and Canterbury, Archdeacon Denison and Canon Fleming, Professor Stubbs and Dr. Kennedy, Canon Gregory and Prebendary Cadman.

A CURIOSITY of literature in New York exists in the form of a Chinese newspaper called the Chinese-American. Mr. Wong Ching Foo, a political refugee, who left China to avoid the inconvenience of having his head cut off, is the editor and business manager. He is said to speak the English language with as much purity and elegance as an American. As there are some 18,000 characters in the Chinese alphabet, type for printing it is out of the question, and the news is copied by a scribe and lithographed by being transferred to a stone. The columns are horizontal and read from right to left. The Mandarin language is employed, which is the official tongue of China. The paper is made up of domestic and foreign news, the latter being especially from the Flowery Kingdom. Romance also enters somewhat into its composition, and it has a good advertising patronage. It is printed on yellow paper, and circulates in both the old and new worlds.

PRESBYTERIANISM on Long Island does not seem to be enjoying a high degree of prosperity. In the Presbytery of Nassau the church at Babylon is unhappy over the alleged worldliness of some of the trustees and the inability of the pastor to get along with them. The church at Woodhaven refuses to render any report to the Presbytery, because it says that the Presbytery takes no interest in its affairs. A leading member of the Presbytery says that the two principal members of the church are such men as he would hold no fellowship with. The church at Whitestone has for three years been supplied by a minister who preaches without pay. He says that a former pastor ruined this church. He considers Infidelity to be the great trouble with the Whitestone people. The church at Christian Hook needs $400, and one or two of the other poor churches need from $200 to $250 each. The pastor of the Smithtown church died some time ago, and the Smithtown pulpit is still vacant. In the Presbytery of Brooklyn the Committee on Church Extension reports that this Presbytery is behind almost all other religious bodies in establishing new church enterprises to keep pace with the growth of the city. The aggregate indebtedness of the churches of this Presbytery is stated by this committee at more than $200,000. Besides this the Presbytery owes a debt which has for some time been carrying, and which it has no means of paying except by taking subscriptions from wealthy brethren who feel disposed to pay. The opinion was expressed at last week's meeting of the Presbytery that these debts are a formidable obstacle in the way of church extension.

The Hive of Nations and of the Great Religious Ideas.

A vast region of Asia, west and north of China, six hundred miles wide in some parts, wider at others, and in length about three thousand, trending around the borders of the Celestial Empire proper in a semicircle, was by the ancients called the Hive of Nations. A more thorough acquaintance with its history leads us to believe it is the original home of all the great religions. It is a wondrous land of vast boundless prairies, lofty plateaus, mighty rivers, great lakes, mountains that are ever white with snow, and awful deserts. From immemorial time it has been occupied by the same people as those that are there to-day. Herodotus describes them; pictures of them are found on the oldest monuments of Egypt. Occasionally, because of some convulsion among them, several tribes would be driven forth to precipitate themselvs upon the nations to the west or south. Many a raid like Attila's, doubtless, prehistoric times hav witnessed. Living in tents, encompassed by flocks and herds of catttle, camels, and horses and sheep, following the sun, these people may hav been leading the same life for countless ages that they do to-day. It is the life of nature, and its artless children find nothing to render them restless and impatient of existence. Huc, in his Travels through Thibet and Tartary, with his glowing pen brings the whole life of these countless nomads visibly before our eyes.

Having journeyed for days amid absolute solitude over dreary wastes precisely like our Nebraska plains before they were settled, you may suddenly come upon a break in the scenic monotony, where gentle swells, bordering some rushing river, are surrounded for leagues by richest pasture valleys. Here, perhaps, has temporarily encamped some nomad tribe, whose tents occupy the most eligible sites far as the eye can search. Here are all the din and uproar of that peculiar life, the lowing of kine, the neighing of horses, the bleating of sheep and barking of dogs. Here the women are busy about the affairs of the dairy, while the little children are running about gathering up argols for fuel and piling them against the tents. Around, but far off, are the men tending their herds, driving hither or thither, gathering or separating, as the case may be. Among these simple, honest, artless people the stranger is always welcomed and kindly entertained. No sooner is your tent placed than you are visited by one or more of the chief men. "May heaven be propitious to you! May all your paths be joyful! Can we assist you in any way? We pray you to do our poor tent the honor of a visit," etc., etc. All this is done sincerely, and not with the empty politeness of Chinese and European manners. Suddenly, as by enchantment, when the time arrives, all this busy scene is changed—tents are struck, and men and herds hav disappeared, leaving the vast region to its wonted solitude. Better pastures elsewhere hav allured, or changing seasons hav driven them onward with the annual course of the great master of life, the sun. The people thus occupying these immense regions are about forty millions in number. Few towns are found to blot this fair life of nature. "Occasionally the traveler is amazed on coming to some splendid temple of Buddha, whose immense proportions, solid construction, and costly decorations outrival anything our greatest potentates of Europe can erect." These are surrounded by lamaseries—just as in Roman Catholic lands cathedrals are encompassed by monasteries and nunneries. Lama means priest. About one-third of all the men of Mongol-Tartary are lamas. The lamas do not necessarily reside in lamaseries, but remain at home with their families.

Homer speaks of these people as being the most just of all the people on earth. They are to-day as they were then, three thousand years ago. From immemorial time these people hav had a religion whose gist is this: "There is one God only. God, to enlighten and direct man, sends his spirit into some persons of peculiar holiness occasionally at various times and places. All mankind are brothers, and God has not chosen any one people to be special favorits." Therefore if you tell them of your Jesus they will acquiesce, thank you for the information, and in return tell you about their Dalé Lama, or Guison Tamba, and the Buddha Sakia Mouni. If you should tell them that your Jesus was the only person of the kind, politeness would keep them silent, but among themselvs they would pity you for conceiving of the creator of the universe the, to them, monstrous notion that he waited until eighteen hundred years ago to thus incarnate his spirit, and then limited the revelation to a small, obscure people on a little corner of earth, not even informing the noble Mongolian race, let alone the abominable Kittats (Chinese) and Hindoos who swarm like yermin all over the low, marshy, unwholesome regions near the seas. What? Neglect the finest race of the best and loftiest regiou of the world to reveal himself in that way to a puny race of slaves around the Dead Sea, that rotten pond 1,300 feet below the level of the sea! O dear strangers! you are in a deplorable error. It must hav been some god or devil of their own that did so—not the father of all the children of men.

The religion of this people is pure Buddhism (god or lord worship), not the monstrous form it has assumed in inferior regions among inferior people. Who has not noticed how every religion partakes of the spirit of the age or people where it is found? Thus Christianity among the Romans was paganism; among the semi-barbarians of the Middle Ages in Europe was a war declaring bloody, torturing doctrin; not content with tormenting the body to death on earth would damn its soul to hell in everlasting flames; among the enlightened people of our eighteenth century free democracy, it was a woman-whipping, cradle-robbing slaveholder, upholding the divine institution from all its orthodox pulpits; among the Abyssinians of Africa, where it has flourished as the universal religion for fourteen hundred years, it is little better than a base, cruel fetichism. Civilization is the cause of Christianity as we find it to-day in its very highest caste among the Unitarians of North America and England and the noble reformers of the rostrum, the outspeaking, freethinking truth seekers, the Ingersolls, the Wakemans, and others. Civilization has its evils, its drawbacks, its ruts and its blots, and we see its effects in the Christianity of blackmailers, spies, informers, Comstocks, Pharisees, and hypocrits, who, for salary and hire, hound honest, truth-speaking men and women to prison and death.

But back to Mongolia! The great Buddh or Lord has likewise his representativs here on earth. There is the grand lama of Thibet, who answers to our pope of Rome. His most celestial majesty, the emperor of China is, par excellence, defender of the faith, just as is the king of Spain, his most Christian majesty. Then there is the Tsong Kaba, the Guison Tamba, etc., who may be compared with the patriarch of Constantinople, the primate of Great Britain, etc., etc. One thing may truly be said of all these, that, lacking the seed of that infernal intolerancy among ourselvs which we inherit from that narrow, conceited race, the Jews, who had and hav the sublime impudence to conceive that God Almighty is there especial president, king, and father—lacking this, all these various sects of Buddhism are harmonious and friendly.

Says the learned Abbé Huc (vol. i, ch. v, Thibet and Tartary): "We talked long with a learned lama of Thibet, and what he told us astonished us much. He was not surprised at what we told him of Christianity. He said our views differed little from those of the grand lama of Thibet. Said he: 'You must not confound religious truth with the superstition of the vulgar. The Tartars, pure, simple folk, prostrate themselvs before anything they see. With them everything is boran (holy)—lamas, prayer books, temples, lamaseries, stones, bones, etc. 'Tis all the same, down they go on their knees, crying, Boran, Boran.'

"'But,' said I, 'the lamas themselvs call innumerable things boran.'

"'Let me explain,' said our friend, smilingly; 'there is one sole God of the universe, creator of all, alike without beginning or end. In India he is called Buddha, in Thibet he is Samti Mitchiba (all-powerful, eternal); in China he is Fo; in Tartary, Borhan.'

"'You say that Buddha is sole. In that case,' said I, 'who are Tale Lama of Lahsa, the Baudchau of Diachi Lumboo, the Tsong, the Kaldan, the Hobligan, Chaberon, Guison Tamba, etc., of other countries?'

"'They are all equally Buddha.'

"'Is Buddha visible then?' I asked.

"'No, he is without body—a spirit.'

"'So,' said I, 'Buddha is sole and a spirit. Yet there are innumerable Buddhas—the grand lamas are seen—hav bodies. How is this?'"

Had the Thibetan lama been versed in controversy he could hav replied: "And you too—you say God is one and invisible, yet you hav Jesus Christ, Holy Ghost, devil, angel Gabriel, pope, innumerable saints. Your Jesus Lord was in a body, and got killed. Your Jehovah ate mutton with Abraham, who called him and two others, 'My Lord.' How is this?" But he was not versed in Christian-like disputation, so the poor man could only reply, as often our good priests do when confounded, "It is a huge mystery; I tell you it is the doctrin of the West, but it is of unfathomable profundity—it cannot be sounded to the bottom." Such profundity is like that of some one of whom Talleyrand spoke when told, "Mr. So-and-So is a very profound man."

"'Ha! profound indeed! A perfect vacuum.'"

Then does the good Abbé Huc moralize and wonder at the great resemblance between Buddhism and Christianity. As to the honesty, gentleness, simplicity, kindness, and hospitality of the millions who profess Buddhism in Mongol-Tartary, he relates fact after fact, each one more convincing than tons of declamation. He says they are the most religious people on earth. Religious pilgrimages are common—nothing more so. On one occasion, meeting the queen of Mourgravin leading a great procession thousands of miles, he breaks out: "Our minds were deeply excited on beholding these people making their long pilgrimage through the desert. No dangers, no distances, no expense, no privations and exposures, deter the Mongols from these pilgrimages." "The Mongols are indeed an essentially religious people. With them the future life is everything, the things of this world nothing. They liv in this world as though not of it; they cultivate no lands, build no homes; they regard themselvs as foreigners traveling through life, and this feeling, deep and universal, develops itself in the practical form of incessant religious pilgrimages. Wherever faith remains—faith earnest, simple, unquestioning, these pilgrimages are in vigor."

One might well ask, then, Why attempt to convert these people? Life to the believer in the immortal hereafter is indeed but a pilgrimage—a brief journey from a cradle to a grave, illusory in the morning of its little day, sad and unsatisfying at its noontide, and toward its eve weary, woful, wan, and desperate, but for the gleams of hope that streak up from skies beyond this vale of tears. Why, then, convert these true children of nature to our civilization and its religion, with their pomp, strife, fever, and heaping up of beds of dross only to die upon them? Much better as they are, if there be a hereafter, and oh, how infinitly better—best of all—if there be none! "For if of the hope of the life beyond we are deceived, then are we of all men most miserable."

These Jesuit priests, firm in the faith, enduring all imaginable hardships, facing privations, and frowning upon death to spread that faith, coming into these lands to convert heathen, as they call them, full of bitter scorn and mockery at all other religions, admit without exception the superior virtue of these people, and, what is most wonderful of all, the superior spiritual powers of their priesthood. They declare, but not in such terms, that all the signs that follow believers are to be found among them. Jacolliot, meeting in Thibet and Hindostan with certain priests who professed to be able to do signs and wonders, he himself being utterly incredulous—an explainer away of all such mysteries—after most careful testings where and when collusion was impossible, became convinced, and lost faith in all religions.

Huc and Gabet, entering Mongolia with all their prejudices sharpened, both learned, shrewd men, familiar with every phase of human life, say that as they approached a certain region they heard much of the wonderful spiritual powers of certain priests called Bokte lamas. Diabolical rites were performed by them, 'twas said. Of course, these Catholic priests sneered at this.

Thousands go to see the performances done in open day on a high, raised platform, the operator surrounded by spectators. "A lama kills himself, yet dies not. He cuts himself open, takes out his entrails, places them before him, then replacing them returns to his former condition." His utterances during the performance are listened to with close attention. They are prophecies and the occasion is deemed extraordinary. Suffice it to say that our two Jesuits, despite their contempt and utter incredulity, became convinced that these performances are really genuin. But what do they conclude? They say: "We are persuaded the devil has a great deal to do with the matter, and in this view we are upheld by the most intelligent Buddhist priests. Very few can do these rites—only a very low order of priests. The regular lamas avow their horror of the devilish spectacle."

While on this subject of wonders let me refer to a standing one that cannot be disputed by those who are familiar with weighing testimony. Talk of the seven wonders of the world! This surpasses them all. In the country of Amdoo, south of Kokouer, there is an aged tree. Near to where it stands was born in the year 1357 one of these numerous incarnations of Jehovah, who was named Tsong Kaba, born with a long white beard, a majestic countenance, capable of speaking clearly and precisely as soon as he saw the light. One day his mother shaved his head and threw the hair outside the tent. Forthwith sprang up a tree which dispersed an exquisit fragrance, growing rapidly. As it grew on it was observed that each leaf bore on it a letter in the sacred language of Thibet—a language whose alphabet is far more varied and complex than our own. This Tsong Kaba introduced various reforms among the Buddhists of Thibet and Mongolia, and has millions of adherents to-day. The Tree of Ten Thousand Images, as it is called, is carefully guarded. The emperor of China caused a vast dome of solid silver to be erected over it. As our two priests came toward the Amdoo region they heard more and more of the tree. Deeming it some fraud of the priests they paid little regard to hearsay. I quote their words: "It will be expected that we say something of this tree. Does it really exist? Hav we seen it? What about it? etc. Yes, the tree does exist. At the foot of a mountain on which the lamasery stands is a great square inclosed by brick walls. On entering we were able to examin at leisure. Our eyes were first fixed earnestly on its leaves, some branches extending out over the walls. And we were filled with absolute consternation and astonishment at finding that there were on each of the leaves well-formed Thibetian characters, all of green color, some darker, some lighter than the leaf itself. Our first impression was a suspicion of fraud, but after minute examination of every detail we could not discover the least deception. The letters all seem to be portions of the leaf itself, equally with its veins and nerves. The position was not the same in every leaf. On one leaf they would be at the top, on another at the side or bottom, or in the middle. The younger leaves had them in a state partly formed. The bark of the trunk and branches, resembling the plane-tree, are also covered with these letters. When you remove a bit of bark you will see the letters in indistinct outlines as though in a germinating state, and often different from the letters they replace. We examined with closest attention to find traces of trickery, but could find nothing of the sort, and the perspiration absolutely trickled down our faces under the influence of our sensations at the amazing spectacle. More profound intellects than ours may explain this; we giv it up. Our readers may smile possibly at our ignorance. We care not so that our sincerity and truth be not suspected. The tree seems to be of a great age. Its trunk is not over eight feet high. Three men can scarcely embrace it. Its branches spread out like a plume of feathers, and are very bushy. The leaves are evergreen. Its wood is reddish in color, and has an exquisit odor. In summer it produces large, red flowers of a most beautiful appearance. They say that no other tree of the kind is in the world. All attempts to propagate it by cuttings, seeds, etc., hav failed. Explain this who may."

Before leaving this branch of the subject let me recall the attention of readers to what Marco Polo said. He lived in China during the thirteenth century, traveling and observing closely. He was a man of lofty character and brilliant intellect. At that time Kublai Kahn was emperor—the inheritor of the genius, generosity, and other lofty characteristics of his illustrious grandfather, Ghengis Kahn, who created and governed the most extensiv empire of historic ages. Kublai, like his great ancestor, was simply a Unitarian, and kindly tolerant of all religions. The Christians had a stronghold in China during his time. The great city of Cambalac, now Peking, was his capital. Now while Marco was there the Christian missionaries earnestly besought the emperor to adopt Christianity. He replied to them in terms as follows: "Why adopt yours above all the other religions in my kingdom? In principle they are nearly all the same. The religion of the people is not to be disturbed on light grounds. Moreover the priests of the Buddhist (or common) religion hav more power than yours. You yourselvs admit it. You cannot do what they do. You yourselvs hav seen how that on occasions at our banquets we are waited upon by invisible agents—unseen hands hav conveyed to us cups and dishes, with other actions performed by invisible powers. When your priests can perform these things through such agencies, come to me and I will adopt your religion." This great man, remarkable for his keen, practical intelligence, expressed himself as really afraid to offend the priests on account of their manifest powers of sorcery. We of the present time and place can no longer laugh at heathen ignorance, for here and now like wonders are certified to by thousands, among whom are some most eminent in all the walks of life, scientists, lawyers, business men, and jugglers included. Those of us who know they are deluded can congratulate ourselvs over our own intellectual superiority in being able to maintain a negativ, in a matter of which experimentally we are ignorant, against their affirmation upon crucial tests.

Strangest of all is this: The priests of that very religion whose Buddha or Lord said, "These signs shall follow them that believe," on witnessing these signs cry out, "These are signs of the devil!"

This vast region, peopled by about forty millions of these Mongolian tribes—this hive of nations and religious sects occupied to-day, as it doubtless has been for tens of thousand of years, has few towns and very few large cities. Around some great temple gather some lamaseries, enough at some points to accommodate twenty or thirty thousand Buddhist monks, or lamas. These vast and sumptuous monuments so often met with in the deserts are due to the free, spontaneous zeal of the Mongols. So simple, economical in their dress and manners, these people are generous, even astonishingly prodigal in all that pertains to worship. When a temple is to be built the properly authorized priests come around to every tent throughout the regions of Tartary. They are received with joyful exclamations—no one but givs something; the rich their ingots of gold and silver; others offer oxen, camels, horses; the poorest giv as able, butter, ropes of camel hair. Thus immense sums are soon collected. There in the desert apparently so poor you see rising up as by enchantment edifices where grandeur and richness would defy the richest potentates. Thus in Europe during the middle ages were erected these structures whose stupendous beauty is an abiding reproach to our modern selfishness. The lamaseries you see in this region are all of brick or stone—the temples are built with elegance and great solidity. When time for worship comes a lama proceeds to the great gate of the temple and blows a sea-conch that is heard a league round. Enters the grand lama. When he is seated on the altar all the other lamas lay aside their red boots and pass around prostrating themselvs before him (as the representativ of God). Then they all sit cróss-legged around. Then the master of ceremonies begins by tinkling a little bell; each lama murmurs in a low tone a preliminary prayer whilst he unrolls on his knees the prayers directed by the rubric. After a profound silence the bell is again tinkled, and then begins a psalm in double chorus, grave and melodious. The prayers are generally in verse in metrical, well-cadenced style, and are marvelously adapted for harmony. At certain pauses the musicians execute a piece of music little according with the tremendous gravity of the psalmody, being a confused noise of bells, trumpets, cymbals, tambourines, pipes, etc.

The interiors of these vast temples are usually filled with ornaments, statues, pictures representing the life of Buddha and the transformations of holy men; vases of copper shining like gold are placed to receive gifts, censers in which are ever burning aromatic plants, rich stuffs ornamented with gold embroideries for canopies over statues. There are many very great temples and lamaseries all through Tartary and Mongolia. The most celebrated is the Grand Kouren (inclosure) in the land of the Kalkas. The lamasery stands on the slope of a mountain on the north bank of the river Toula. The various temples inhabited by the Guison Tamba and other grand lamas are distinguished from the other structures by their elevation and bright, gilded roofs. Thirty thousand lamas dwell in the lamasery or in the smaller structures around it. The vast plain adjoining is always covered by tents of pilgrims who resort thither from all parts to worship Buddha. Here you may find the Ta Dzi, or fish-skins, encamped by the Torgots from the top of Bokte Oula, or sacred mounts; here are the Thibetans and the Pebouin of the Himalayas with with their long-haired oxen mingling with the Mautchens from the far-off banks of the mighty Amoor. There is an incessant movement of tents set up and taken down, and of pilgrims coming and going with horses, camels, oxen, mules, wagons, and on foot. Viewed from a distance, the white cells of the lamas built in horizontal lines one above another on the sides of the mount seem steps of a grand altar, of which the tabernacle is the temple of the Guison Tamba. There in the depths of that sanctuary all resplendent with bright colors, "barbaric pearl and gold," sits the lama king. The holy receives the homage of the faithful ever prostrate before him in succession. There is not a Kalka Tartar who does not glory in the title of the Holy One's Disciple. Whenever you meet a man in the district of the Great Keuren and ask him who he is, the proud reply comes, "I am a disciple of the Holy One." Like the priests from France we cannot but be struck by the great resemblance between the Buddhism of Thibet, Mongolia, and Tartary and Roman Catholicism. The beads, the ceremonies, pictures, statues, chanting psalms, and lamaseries with shaven-headed priests, with numerous other characteristics, are the same or very like.

So far back as we can investigate into the religions of India we find that at a time whose antiquity carries us beyond all tradition in that land of old traditions Brahmanism had already grown out of the old myths of ages before. Thousands of years before the year one of our era, there were dim prophecies among the Hindoos of a savior of men to come from heaven, just as later a like idea arose among the Jews. He came as an incarnate son of deity, and played his part in prehistoric ages. He was to come again. On his leave-taking he always promised a comforter of some kind.

Of several such incarnations that of Christna, 1200 B.C., is perhaps the most interesting. His utterances are in the Bhagavad Gita, and his doctrins therein found will compare favorably with those of the New Testament. Many of the ideas of it may be found running through the Christian story. Of the date of Christna's birth and of the Mahabarata, from which the Bhagavad is an extract, says Sir Wm. Jones, "there can be no doubt. We are as sure of it as we are that Julius Cæsar preceded Constantine the Great." It is with as much positivness as this that Sir Wm. Jones, eminent for his great oriental learning as much as for his Christian piety, speaks on this subject. Such being the case, and no person of intelligence can doubt it after a little examination, whence came these ideas? Whether it is more probable that they were disseminated among the Hindoos, Japanese, Chinese, and others, from these lofty table-lands, where from times prehistoric and antedating the oldest traditions man has led the same life he leads to-day, no serious interruption from war being possible; or did they originate among the people of the lower lands, where incessant changes and revolutions hav taken place? But passing from the consideration from whence orientals of the maritime and lowlands received them, from where did the comparativly new races of Greece, Syria, and Asia Minor get those ideas of incarnation, virgin-born sons, and the like? As to the Jews, although they are an ancient people, or rather sect, as compared with the populations of Europe, yet every one who is at all posted knows that they are new as compared with the people we are speaking of. The Hebrew language is to the Sanskrit a thing of yesterday. Pythagoras, Apollonius of Tyana, and others, undoubtedly received their ideas from the East. Apollonius returned from India learned in the doctrins of Buddhism. He was born in the very year of Christ's true birth, which was four years prior to the year 1 A.D. That is, if we accept Matthew's statement, "Now in the days of Herod the King." For Herod died almost immediately after, and Joseph while in Egypt heard that "the young man, Archelaus, reigned in his stead." Josephus says, speaking of an event just before Herod's death, "That very night the moon was eclipsed." Astronomical calculations show that the eclipse was visible there on a night of March four years before Christ.

Archelaus reigned ten years, and was banished when Cyrenius was made governor. But Luke says Christ was born when his parents went up to be taxed, which tax was first made when Cyrenius was governor; so there are over ten years difference between the two dates (see Josephus, Matthew, and Luke).

Apollonius's doctrins were Buddhistic. Now, as Josephus says, there were ten thousand confusions, false Christs, and uprisings in Jerusalem and vicinity about this time. No doubt among them appeared one Jesus Christ among others who led the crowd, just as Joe Smith has done in our day, and possibly died as a malefactor. He did some mesmeric or spiritualistic wonders, and really believed in himself. Amid the darkness and confusion of the next century the doctrins and churches of Apollonius became welded to this little sect of followers of Jesus Christ. In that age the tendency was to a belief in some kind of religion, and sects easily united. To-day the tendency is to disbelief, and sects divide.

Essenism also at that time naturally combined with such a sect. Essenism has been aptly defined as "Christianity before Christ and without Christ" by such a keen, logical Christian warrior as De Quincy, who was so enraged at the possibility of the fact that he declared its proof would totally overthrow Christianity, and calls the author of the statement, Josephus, "Old Jo, that liar and scoundrel." He little suspected that Philo Judeus had devoted much of a volume to a full account of these very Essenes who resided in large numbers near him before Christ's era.

Perhaps the most celebrated of those men who are deemed incarnations of the divine spirit (at least prior to our era) was Arddhi Chiddi, who was born 960 before Christ. The Jesuit missionaries to Thibet and India generally admit that to be the true date. "He was born of a virgin named Maya, who conceived by divine influence." This conception and birth, instead of depending on the tradition of an uxorious old man's dream, was positivly witnessed by a multitude of chosen ones. It had been foretold by prophecies long before; the exact time fixed, the maternal body became crystallized. This divine personage assumed the name Gautama, left his high station, chose disciples and wild retreats, was tempted by devils, addressed multitudes by the seashore, announcing the same doctrins as did Jesus Christ long after, was questioned by cunning men sent to ensnare him, associated with the humble and lowly, was rebuked for encouraging a poor abandoned woman. He had five special disciples; he fasted long. Once when his disciples adored him "immediately there shone a glory round about him." He rode around Benares, made a solemn entry into that city, ascended the holy throne, where he took the name Sakia Mouni—the penitent of Sakia. Thence he sent forth his disciples on apostolic missions. It is all told in a great ancient book. How wonderfully history repeats itself! One would think that the honest missionaries from whose account the foregoing is taken were mocking their own religion. But having read it, we easily understand why we are told in the gospels so many things in an abrupt, disconnected way. Thus the story of the temptation, the fasting, the transfiguration, the scene with the lost woman, the puzzling questions of the lawyers, etc., are all part of the same old story that had been floating for centuries disconnectedly and gathered up and applied to Jesus. The Lazarus story is perhaps taken from an incident strongly authenticated in the life of Apollonius, who had the good fortune to convince emperors and kings and the shrewdest messengers sent to detect his frauds, and to hav temples built to him in his lifetime. This Gautama, of whom we hav been speaking, when he left the world told his disciples that another would come after him, a greater Buddha, and ordered the faithful to retire to the summits of Thibet. His Buddhism is a protest against the strait-laced Brahmanism—Hindoo-Protestantism, in fact—just as Christianity was a protest against old Mosaic Jewry. We can see the dawnings of this protest in Isaiah and Jeremiah. Indeed, we can hardly believe our eyes when we read in Jeremiah where the Lord says that when he brought the Jews out of Egypt he never asked for burnt offerings and sacrifices. "Love the Lord—obey him," is all he asked.

Buddhism, driven from India, retired to Thibet, where its ideas originated, and where traditions of prior incarnations and prophecies of future ones made it welcome. Being apostolic and activ, it spread thence over all Asia. Thence also hav spread the peculiar doctrins of other sects that hav originated there through other incarnations and transformations. Speaking of Buddhism, even our Protestant missionaries hav agreed that "it is the best and purest religion ever devised by man," their own religion and its dogma of incarnations, Holy Ghost, and the like, being of God.
